The engraving below, from a design made for us by Mr. Hill, represents one of the most brilliant exploits of the American arms during the second war with Great Britain—the engagement between the American and British squadrons on Lake Champlain—in which the latter were defeated by Commodore Macdonough, while at the same time, on the land the American General Macomb defeated the troops under Sir George Prevost, Governor General of Canada, with great slaughter. The forces of the British were largely superior to ours. Previous to the 11th September, 1814, the British general had been strengthening his works at Plattsburg, and only awaited the arrival of the British squadron to undertake the annihilation of the American fleet and army. The British fleet consisted of the following vessels: frigate Confiance, 39 guns; brig Linnet, 16; sloops Chab and Finch, 11 guns each; and 13 gun-boats and row-galleys, mounting in all 95 guns, and carrying 1050 men, under the command of Captain Downie. They made their appearance round Cumberland Head, on the morning of the 11th, and immediately engaged the American squadron, under Commodore Macdonough, then moored in Plattsburg Bay, consisting of the ship Saratoga, the brig Eagle, the schooner Ticonderoga, the sloop Preble, and 10 gunboats, mounting altogether 86 guns, and manned by 820 men. The first gun from the Confiance was the signal for a general action, and Sir George Prevost, who was posted on one side of the river Saranac, instantly opened his fire on the American works opposite. Heavy firing at this point continued during the day, and frequent ineffectual attempts were made to ford the river. At a bridge about a mile above, a detachment of American regulars repulsed a division of the enemy, and an effort on his part to force the passage of the bridge in the town, was effectually checked by the American riflemen under Captain Gravenor. But the most desperate fighting occurred at a ford about three miles from the works, where a portion of the enemy succeeded in crossing. There was a hand-to-hand fight here, and numbers fell on both sides. But the result of the naval battle decided the action on land, and completely frustrated the plans of the British general. After getting round Cumberland Head, Captain Downie anchored his fleet within three hundred yards of the line formed by Commodore Macdonough, placing the Confiance frigate in opposition to the Saratoga, the Linnet to the Eagle, Captain Henley; one of his sloops and all his galleys to the schooner Ticonderoga, lieutenant-commanding Cassin, and the sloop Preble, his other sloop alternately assailing the Saratoga and the Eagle. The latter vessel was so situated, shortly after the commencement of the action, that her guns could not be brought to bear, and Captain Henley cut her cable and placed her between the Commodore's ship and the Ticonderoga, from which position, though she exposed the Saratoga to a galling fire, she annoyed the enemy's squadron with much effect. Some minutes after 10 o'clock, the starboard guns of the Saratoga being dismounted or unmanageable, Commodore Macdonough brought her larboard batteries to bear on the enemy's frigate with such effect, that the Confiance almost immediately struck, with 105 round shot in her hull, her captain and 49 men killed, and 60 wounded. The Saratoga suffered badly, but not in proportion, though she mounted 13 guns less than her adversary. On the contrary, the enemy's brig surrendered to her 15 minutes after the Confiance had struck her flag. In the meantime Captain Henley, in the Eagle, had captured one of the enemy's sloops, and the remaining British vessel surrendered to the Ticonderoga after being terribly cut up. The principal vessels of the British fleet being now captured, and three of their row galleys sunk, the remaining ten escaped from the bay in a shattered condition. The total loss of Commodore Macdonough's squadron amounted to 52 men killed and 58 wounded. The enemy lost 84 men killed, 110 wounded, and 856 prisoners, the latter outnumbering their victors.

MACDONOUGH'S VICTORY ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MABEL, THE RECTOR'S WARD:

—OR—

TRUTH AND TREASON IN 1777.

BY MAJOR BEN: PERLEY POORE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER VII.—[CONTINUED.]

Another week thus passed away, and on the Saturday which closed it, the main body of troops arrived, and encamped or bivouacked in the long ropewalks at the south end of the town. The people greeted them with hearty cheers, and sent large supplies of fresh meat, with newly-baked bread, to the different companies, putting every one in the best of humor, from the drummer boys to Colonel Arnold himself. That officer fixed his headquarters at Davenport's Tavern; and when Herbert called to report that all the men were in camp or bivouac and provided for, he had an opportunity to study the features of the commander. But he could find nothing about him to enlist his feelings, as Washington's commanding presence had at first sight. Colonel Arnold, while professing an ardent devotion to democratic principles, imitated the extravagant follies of monarchical service, and demeaned himself with an insolent hauteur that would have been envied by many a haughty officer of the "King's Own." Although in the flower of manhood, his florid countenance already bore the premature furrows of dissipation, and budding carbuncles gleamed on his aquiline nose. A bland look, glazed with a constant smile, appeared to struggle for mastery over the natural workings of a compressed mouth, around which the nervous workings of ambition, sensuality and daring were unmistakably stamped. The thick, heavy lids of his eyes drooped with languor, as if to shield them from observation; nor did he ever gaze frankly into the face of the person with whom he conversed. He wore the continental blue and buff, but his coat and waistcoat were heavily embroidered with gold, while his linen cambric ruffles were of the most delicate texture.

"Aha! my young quarter-master," he said, when he turned to address Yancey. "We find everything in apple-pie order."

"Captain Wilder and his company have been very active," modestly replied Herbert.

"Yes—yes! So is my watch active, but without winding it up, not a minute will its hands advance. As the key of Wilder and his men, do me the honor to taste a glass of wine."

The glasses were filled, but ere they were raised, in walked Major Morgan, the commander of the Rifles.

"Well arrived!" exclaimed Arnold. "I was just drinking a complimentary health to your young subaltern here, who has done us such good service."

"Old Virginia, colonel, is always up to time," laughingly responded Morgan, advancing toward the sideboard and filling his glass. A glorious type of the American rifleman was he, from nature's most athletic and well-developed moulds. Generous as a prince of the blood, chivalrous as a knight-hospitaller, and fond of humor as a French cadet, he was prodigal to improvidence, instant in resentment, and bitter in his animosities. Every one loved Dan Morgan, save his enemies, and they had good reason to hate as well as to fear him; for when he once outlawed any one from his heart, language could not convey any sense of the intensity of his scorn, or of the depth of his loathing.

"Gentlemen, your good healths," ceremoniously pledged Colonel Arnold. The glasses were emptied, and he continued: "Now I wish to see you about invitations which I have received to attend church to-morrow. Of course, I am anxious to go."

"You, colonel?" asked Morgan, as if somewhat incredulous.

"Yes. Not that I care a pin for their preaching, but because if we go, the faithful will send lots of fresh provisions on board the fleet. Not a bad dodge, eh?"

"As you please, colonel," bluntly replied Morgan. "But the Rifles are Virginians, and Virginians are Christians; so we can go where there is the smallest hope of provender."

"Good, major,—good! Why, let me congratulate you on your conversion, and you can hear Parson Parsons, who must be double-referred in his faith. Fancy a Captain Captains, or a Major Majors!"

"I shall be proud to attend the Rev. Mr. Parsons's command," replied Morgan, whose honest heart abhorred deceit, and who did not fancy speculating on the well-known principles of the Newbury people.

"For my part," said Colonel Arnold, "I am almost tempted to hear some old Tory here, who continues, on dit, to pray loyally for the king, and takes a pretty girl to church to keep the Sons of Liberty quiet. It must be rare sport."

"I fear, colonel," remarked Herbert, in a hurried tone and with a flushed cheek, "that you will be disappointed, for the Episcopal church is closed."

"Closed is it? Faith, I will have to go to the parsonage, then. Will you talk to the dominie while I make love to the maiden?"

Ere Herbert Yancey could reply (and it was, perhaps, well that such was the case), the door was opened, and a dozen or more men entered, two by two. Ranging themselves along one side of the room, one of them advanced, saying:

"Colonel Arnold, permit me to introduce myself to you as Harry Folansbee, chairman of the vigilance committee of the Sons of Liberty, which committee you also see before you."

"Gentlemen and Mr. Folansbee," said Colonel Arnold, with a low bow, "I am happy to see you. Will you take a glass of wine?"

"Thanks," replied Folansbee, "but we have called upon business which may not be of an agreeable nature. Can we be honored with an interview with you?"

"Certainly, gentlemen. We are but provincial troops, and now that we have thrown off the king's authority, it is our duty to obey the people. What is your pleasure?"

"We would prefer, colonel, that the interview should be private."

"Ah! but these gentlemen are my advisers. One my right hand warrior, the other my less experienced but equally zealous quarter-master. I have no secrets from them."

"We should prefer, colonel, your private ear."

"Do not think that I intend remaining," said Morgan; "a nod is as good as a wink to a blind horse. Good-morning. Come, Yancey."

"Let me see you early in the morning. Good-day," remarked Colonel Arnold, as he bowed them to the door. Then advancing toward the committee, he asked, in rather a pompous tone: "Your business, gents?"

"Flints and ramrods!" said Major Morgan, as they went down stairs; "those fellows look as solemn as a coroner's jury, and Arnold will find it hard work to manage them, if they have any unreasonable request to make of him. I have no idea that he will grant it, whatever it may be, for he is fond of snubbing these citizens."

Herbert made some brief reply, and when they arrived in the street, he pleaded an engagement, and left Major Morgan.

"A gallant young fellow!" muttered the major, as he watched Yancey's retreating form; "but he acts strangely. Never mind, though; he's no hypocrite, and that's more than I can say of our commander-in-chief. Hullo! Here comes the delegation down stairs, looking black as night at that. Wonder what they wanted? None of my business, though." By this time, the soliloquizer had lighted a clay pipe, and sitting down, he gave himself up to the luxury of smoking it.

Ere he had given many whiffs, down came Colonel Arnold, his face flushed with anger.

"Where's Yancey?" he asked.

"Don't know," replied Major Morgan. "He walked off just now."

"Do you know Yancey?" asked Arnold.

"Not much. But I used to know his father when I was a wagoner, and I think the son is a chip o' the old block."

"No Tory blood?"

"Tory blood?—not a drop. What makes you ask that question?"

"Never mind now, major; I may inform you to-morrow."

Arnold returned up stairs, and Morgan, as he puffed forth a cloud of smoke, said to himself: "Tory blood indeed! It is not the Virginians, above all the Virginia riflemen, who have Tory blood in their veins, Mr. Peacock."

Herbert Yancey, on leaving the tavern, repaired at once to the parsonage, where he found Mabel awaiting him, and they were soon earnestly engaged in animated conversation. The young soldier, animated by her presence, described to her his southern home and the picturesque scenery of the mountains near it, and often when he turned to look on his auditor, he saw her star-like eyes glistening with the lustre of the self-same feeling that suffused his own. Those who know not love may assert that hours are of equal length, but to fond hearts the movement of time is as irregular as the beating of the pulse. A week of ordinary life, if counted by hopes, fears and fancies, is an age; and when Herbert rose at ten o'clock to say "good-night," he knew Mabel better, and she saw deeper into his heart, than many who hold familiar intercourse for years.

CHAPTER VIII.

MAN PROPOSES, BUT WOMAN DISPOSES.

"There are moments in life—though alas for their fleetness!—As brilliant with all that existence endears, As if we had drained the whole essence of sweetness That nature intended should last us for years. They pass—and the soul, as it swells with emotion, Believes that some gem had been swallowed the clue; For never were pearls from the bosom of ocean So precious and dear as those moments of time."

SUNDAY morning; but what a difference since the last "day of rest," when almost every animate object was at rest. Now, the rattle of the drum and the shrill notes of the fife echoed the church bells, and the streets were filled with curious gazers at the various companies, as they marched to church. There were the Virginia riflemen, in whose haughty, determined look, and picturesque hunting shirts, was an air of careless strength and success,—the continental infantry, already in a good state of discipline,—the volunteer companies, with their handsome uniforms, exchanging, as they marched past each other, glances of friendly yet critical scrutiny, which seemed to indicate a spirit of latent and gallant ambition. These were the men who were to win the liberty of their native land, and to become immortal upon the brightest pages of her glorious record. Like the chivalric Bayard, they were sans peur and sans reproche.

The riflemen marched to the Rev. Mr. Parsons's church, and Herbert Yancey accompanied them, not caring to swell the staff of Colonel Arnold, who went to the Second Congregational Church. His own chaplain preached there, the Rev. Samuel Spring, who made such a favorable impression that when the war was over, years afterwards, he was invited to become its pastor.

Mr. Parsons selected as his text: "Zebulon and Naphtali were a people who jeopardized themselves unto death, in the high places of the field." There was a wide difference between his denunciations of England and his appeals to the warlike spirit of the people, as compared with the discourse of Parson Gwynne the Sabbath previous, but Herbert paid little attention to it. His thoughts were with Mabel, and he was anything but pleased when, after services, Major Morgan accepted an invitation for his officers to dine with a party of citizens. After dinner, which was prolonged by the usual toasts, there was an evening dress parade, so that it was sunset ere Herbert Yancey could leave. Need it be chronicled that, after exchanging his uniform for plain clothes, he hastened to the parsonage. Madame Ordway was alone in the parlor, and informed Herbert that he would probably find Mabel in the garden summer-house.

Hastily traversing the walks, Herbert found the object of his search in a rustic bower, over which rich masses of luxuriant woodbine intertwined in one magnificent tissue, through which pierced the rays of a full moon. Never had he thought Mabel so lovely as when she rose from her seat and welcomed him within the leafy portals.

"Mabel."

"Herbert."

Not another word was exchanged, and silently they sat down side by side, enjoying that true repose of feeling—that certainty that we are understood without the effort of words—which is the intoxication of intercourse. True, they had not known each other but a few days, yet each of their hearts had been well prepared by virtuous education, by loneliness, by previous absence of all ardent emotions, to become immediately possessed with that powerful spirit which "never loves but one," and each willingly yielded to its rapture. Love such as this, when the dew of innocence yet sparkles freshly from the virgin blossoms of the soul, is happiness indeed. We may be pleased with fame, proud of rank, overjoyed in the acquisition of wealth, elated by the possession of power, but we are never blessed until we know that we are beloved, nor ever, in after life, do the delights of "first love" return.

Thus far, Herbert never "told his love." Nothing had he said, for the heart, when full, does not easily find words to express its emotions; there had been no interchange of vows, for vows were not needed, and now they sat in happy silence—a silence which, like the banquet of a fairy dream, was lighted by constellation after constellation of pleasant thoughts, which shed their blessed radiance far into the future. Glorious is it, in after life, to look back upon such a scene as this, which casts its halo vista from the spring of youth to the deeper, more bitter waters of life.

The notes of the "tattoo," as drum after drum struck the car-few note, aroused Herbert to a sense of his duty. The crisis of his fate was approaching; love and happiness were to be staked upon the decision of the coming hour. Wait—why, the word was impossible. He was to leave the next day.

"Mabel," he at last exclaimed, with an effort, "we leave to-morrow."

"Is it certain?" she replied in a tremulous tone, and looking up into Herbert's face with one of those glances that can neither be given nor interpreted until the heart is illuminated by the flame of pure affection.

"Too certain. Ah, Mabel, you cannot imagine how I hate to leave—to leave Newburyport!" stammered the young officer, who, brave as a lion, felt powerless and cowardly.

A combined expression of love and maidenly delicacy struggled for the mastery on Mabel's countenance, and though a tender smile gleamed upon her lip, her vein-traced eyelids trembled as they drooped over her luminous orbs.

"Perhaps," she replied, "you will find it even more agreeable at Quebec. Soldiers, I have heard it said, are fond of change."

"Change!" exclaimed Herbert. "Name it not. Can the flower close its petals to the kiss of the golden sunlight, or the lake refuse to reflect the rays of the overhanging moon? Can the green bough turn aside its leaflets from the rain drops for which the noontide sun makes it pant? or can the silvery beach-sand but yield to the impress of the ocean wave? Does the sun change, or does time halt in its career? Ah, do not attach that word change to man—at least, to me!"

As he spoke, Mabel raised her eyes, but drooping with the weight of tenderness, they soon sank again beneath their long silken lashes, which threw a shade upon her blushing cheek. Yet the young lover's heart took courage from the look that gleamed upon him with momentary radiance, and the burning enthusiasm within his breast found voice:

"Mabel—dearest Mabel, need I tell you that you are the idol of my soul, my matchless divinity. Day after day have I basked in the sunlight of your smiles, and at night the very stars to me look dim, for my adoration of them has been transferred to your angelic form. Pure and good emotions hitherto unknown have welled forth in my soul, realizing all that poetry has dreamed and that love has defied. Mabel—fairest, gentlest, dearest Mabel! That glorious name is the magic spell of my life; can it be my own? Can I regard you, dearest one, as my pledged bride—as my betrothed? Light of my heart, life of my existence, will you be mine?"

Mabel shuddered, as if pierced by an arrow, and tears of which she was consciousness stole down her beautiful face. Leaning forward, she joined her hands convulsively together, and seemed to hold her breath that she might drink in every sound of his voice. She made no reply, for her heart was too full for utterance. Neither did she resist when Herbert clasped her in his arms, imprinting upon her statueless brow, her downcast eyes, her pure and rosy mouth, vehement and long-lingering kisses.

"Mabel—dearest Mabel, speak! Tell me that you love me. Say that I may look upon you as my plighted bride."

"Herbert," she replied, in tones which refreshed his heart, as cool water in an oasis refreshes the desert pilgrim,— "Herbert, my heart is yours!"

Joyous words—a rainbow of promise, which brought joy into the young man's heart, where the music of hope kept merry pace with his thoughts. He could not see her eyes, for they were fringed by their long lashes, but he could feel the workings of her heart playing upon her lips like delicious joy.

There they sat, his arm yet lingering about her waist, and she not being loth to have it linger there—each "the ocean to the river of [the other's] thoughts." There he told her of his home, where the storms of winter are seldom felt, and where—blessed in each other's smiles—they might wander all day long, or recline by the cool spring, listening to the songs of joyous birds. There, too, his dear mother would welcome them; there would be no absences, and the cold world should only come between their hearts in visions of light and of love.

Thus built Herbert castles in the air, as many a young lover has before him, and the fair creature by his side listened and smiled, feeling happier than she had ever felt before. Earth was then to her a paradise, nor did she yearn for a brighter or purer heaven.

The well-known voice of the rector awakened them from their dream, and they sprang to their feet.

"Dearest," said Herbert, "this ring was my father's, and was given to me by my mother as her most precious treasure. Can I not exchange it for that small cross which you wear?"

In a second, Mabel detached the cross from her neck.

"This," she exclaimed, "is all the link between myself and my parents—I mean my own parents. It was on my neck when the good rector took pity on the shipwrecked infant; it has remained there since, and it is now all that I have to give you. Take it, and now farewell. I cannot go with you into the parsonage, and you will find the lower gate open. Good-by!"

Again did Herbert clasp her to his manly breast, and then they parted. The recording angel had registered their impassioned vows in the book of life—ay, and a human witness had been near by, listening to every word, though it felt like a clod of earth upon his coffin hopes. Little dreamed the young lovers that Frank Orday had been near enough to touch them, crouching like a lion in the foliage, eager to spring upon Herbert and drink his heart-blood, yet restrained by a deep, hopeless love for Mabel. They parted in joy, but they left him in anguish.

"You have been out late to-night," said the rector, as Mabel approached the open door where he stood, a crimson glow flushing her cheeks, and her blue eyes radiant with joy. Yet she did not feel the least apprehension that she had done anything at all reprehensible, for the visits of Herbert had apparently given pleasure to the rector. So looking up in his face with frankness, she replied: "I have been sitting in the summer-house with Mr. Yancey."

"Come into my study, Mabel," said he, in a kind tone. "I wish to have a few moments' conversation with you."

Never before had she thus been addressed with formality, and a nervous apprehension began to take possession of her whole frame as she followed him into the study, where he motioned her to a seat beside his large arm-chair.

"Mabel," said the rector, gazing at his ward with a look of anxiety, "I fear that I have done wrong—that is, I have not done right in sanctioning indirectly this sudden acquaintance with Mr. Yancey."

"O, sir, why?" asked Mabel, imploringly.

"Because I do not know him well enough," answered the rector.

"Not know him well enough?" exclaimed Mabel. "Why, sir, is he not the son of your own friend? Did he not risk his life to save mine?"

"Ah, Mabel," said the rector, in a grave tone, "why this interest to one who is almost a stranger—an acquaintance of a fortnight's standing?"

A shadow appeared to pass over Mabel's face like a cloud which shades a lake from the sun for an instant; then did her deep blue eyes appear more animated than before.

"You have never deceived me, Mabel; I know that you will not deceive me now. Do you think, or have you reason to believe, that Mr. Yancey loves you?"

"Sir," replied Mabel, turning so pale that the tracery of her blue veins was perceptible through her alabaster-like countenance, "I know that he loves me, for he has confessed his attachment."

"And you, Mabel?" asked the rector, in a tone of bitter anguish.

"I return his love," was the firm response.

"God grant that you may receive it!" said the rector, rising and pacing the room. "Think not, my dear Mabel, that I seek to detract from your happiness, or to say a word in disparagement of Mr. Yancey. His father was a high-minded, honorable man; and he, by rescuing you from a watery grave, has strong claims upon our gratitude. Still, my dear girl, I fear that I may rather have encouraged too rapid an acquaintance, and hope that, for my sake, you will be guarded how you place your affections in the hands of one of whom, personally, we know but little. May our heavenly Father watch over and bless you! Good night."

Mabel's heart was too full for utterance, and as she rose to receive the pure kiss which the rector implanted upon her forehead, she feared that perhaps she had been hasty in suffering her feelings to be enlisted. But no. It was wronging Herbert Yancey to doubt him for an instant, and mastering her emotions for an instant, she exclaimed, "Good-night!" then listened up stairs.

After she had left the room, the rector, taking a letter from his table, scanned it with great care. It was evidently written in a disguised hand, and read thus:

"HONORED SIR,—Are you aware that a wolf is in your flock—that a heartless libertine is seeking to do you a wrong—that the affections of your ward are to be trifled with, her life rendered miserable? Beware! Profit by this admonition, which comes from A FRIEND."

"And yet," muttered the rector to himself, after he had read this missive at least a dozen times, vainly endeavoring to detect some familiar feature in the handwriting,—and yet it is wrong even to attach suspicion to a fine-looking young fellow, the son, too, of an old friend. He saved Mabel's life; why should she not love him? But O, if he should deceive her!"

Many were the doubts that crossed the rector's mind, and it was late in the night ere he extinguished his lamp and retired to rest.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SONNET.

BY MARY CORRIENNA CLAIR.

The walling wind of autumn, sad and drear,
Comes to my ears to-night; all day the sun
Pours down intensely, warm, and clear,
Fits cheerless hours, and green and gold appear
Nature her children in bright robes of cheer
Has clothed; so soon by pale death to be won,
So soon their course, all regal, will be run,
And trees be leafless, leaves be dank and rone!
Upon thy marble face, my friend, the line,
The hectic flush of death, I plainly see;
I weep, thy unrequited love to view,
Knowing that death, thus gaily, comes to thee;
Winter will pass, spring will earth's robes renew—
Thou shalt be clothed with immortality.

CURIOUS FACTS ABOUT WATER.

The extent to which water mingles with bodies apparently the most solid, is very wonderful. The glittering opal, which heavily wears as an ornament, is only that and water. Of every twelve hundred tons of earth which a landholder has in his estate, four hundred are water. The snow-capped summits of Snowdon and Ben Nevis have many million tons of water in a solidified form. In every plaster-of-Paris statue which an Italian carries through London streets for sale, there is one pound of water to every four pounds of chalk.

The air we breathe contains five grains of water to each cubic foot of its bulk. The potatoes and the turnips which are boiled for our dinner, have, in their raw state, the one seventy-five per cent., the other ninety per cent. of water. If a man weighing ten stone were squeezed flat in a hydraulic press, even and a half stone of water would run out, and only two and a half of dry residue remain. A man is, chemically speaking, forty-five pounds of carbon and nitrogen, diffused through five and a half pailsful of water.

In plants we find water thus mingling no less wonderfully. A sun-flower evaporates one and a quarter pints of water a day, and a cabbage about the same quantity. A wheat plant exhales, in a hundred and seventy-two days, about one hundred thousand grains of water. An acre of growing wheat, on this calculation, draws and passes out about ten tons of water per day. The sap of plants is the medium through which this mass of fluid is conveyed. It forms a delicate pump, up which the watery particles run with the rapidity of a swift stream. By the action of the sap, various properties may be communicated to the growing plant. Timber in France is, for instance, dyed by various colors being mixed with water, and poured over by the root of the tree. Dahlias are also colored by a similar process.—New Orleans Delta.

BURIED TREASURES.

The Tiber is not only rich in historic associations, it is rich in treasure. An English company has actually offered to turn the current of the stream far above the city and around it, provided the government would give them what they might discover in its present bed. This would be attended with a vast expense, but it would pay. Treasures of art from age to age have found their way into the stream, which would bring in the market a perfect remuneration. In the museum of St. John Lateran, a magnificent column of stone is lying, which was taken not long since from the Tiber, a portion of which has been polished to display its beauty, and no one can see it without wishing to have more of the secrets of this river revealed. Statuary more perfect and perhaps more beautiful than any of the ancient works of art now seen in Rome lies embedded in groups beneath the stream. Agostino Chigi, the famous banker in the time of Leo X., once gave a splendid entertainment to the pope and his cardinals, at which the dishes were all precious metals. The price paid for three fish was 250 crowns. It is said that the dishes were all thrown into the Tiber by order of the rich banker, in order that no less illustrious guest might ever use them. The sacred vessels brought from Jerusalem by Titus, among them the golden candelstick, are reported to have been lost from the Milvian bridge, and if so, are still lying there. The present government of Rome will suffer nothing belonging to ancient art to pass from her territory, nor is it able to carry on such an investigation on its own account.—New York Observer.

BEAUTIFUL PETS.

The Baltimore American describes in enthusiastic language the beauties of the beautiful little deer which were brought from the island of Java by the United States frigate Macedonian, and are probably the only ones of the kind ever seen in the United States. They are described as about the size of the ordinary rabbit, but resembling the American deer in shape. The American says that "the limbs are very delicate, and the hoof, which is cloven, is almost transparent. In color they are reddish brown, with white breast and stomach. From the nose, and extending back to the ears, is a tan colored stripe on each side, and under the lower jaw a white stripe, forming a trident. They feed like cattle, and chew the cud, like that species of the animal creation. They are easily domesticated. The eye is large and projecting, but the ears are short and oblong. They are said to be very swift, and their appearance would indicate it, as they are found precisely like the red deer of this country."

THE RAINING TREE.

The island of Fierro is one of the largest in Canarie Group, and it has received its name on account of its iron bound soil, through which no river or stream flows. It has also but very few wells, and these not very good. But the great Preserver and Sustainer of all remedies this inconvenience in a way so extraordinary that man will be forced to acknowledge that he gives in this an undeniable demonstration of his wonderful goodness. In the midst of the island there grows a tree, the leaves of which are long and narrow, and continue in constant verdure, winter and summer, and the branches are covered with a cloud which is never dispelled, but resolving itself into a moisture, causes to fall from its leaves a clear water, and cisterns at its foot to receive it are never empty.

A MAGICAL MANGO.

Everybody has heard of the Indian juggler's trick of producing a young mango tree from a seed which he takes from his bag, and submits to your examination. The seed is sound, and fit for planting. The juggler collects a quantity of earth, moistens it with water, and, taking a mango stone from his bag, plants it in the earth he has prepared. Overall, he places a moderate sized round basket, upon which he spreads his cloth or a native blanket. After an interval of discordant music and incantation, the cloth and basket are removed, the muddy seed is taken from the earth, and you observe that long, slender, white fibres, forming the root, have suddenly shot out. Again it is planted, and covered as before, and the music becomes more discordant and the incantation more furious. At length the charm is complete, and the removal of the basket displays a young and tender shoot, with two opening leaves at its summit. Exclamations of surprise from the bystanders, and satisfaction from the hand of jugglers, complete the second act. Again all is covered up anew, and the ear-splitting music goes on. Suddenly the coverings are removed, and, to the amazement and delight of all, the first shoot of a young mango-tree, with its small light colored leaves, makes its appearance.

"Seven years ago," says a correspondent of Chambers' Journal, "I was the spectator of such a scene at Madras, where I had gone on sick leave, and was glad of any amusement to relieve the monotony of a forced confinement to the house. I had a shrewd suspicion that, if I could examine this tree of miraculous growth, it would turn out a very simple affair. Acting on this idea, I suddenly seized it, and, in spite of the clamor of the jugglers, bore it off. It certainly had the appearance of a real mango-shoot. There was the dirty stone, wet and discolored, with the earth clinging to it. From its lower part, the white fibres of the recent root streamed out with a most natural appearance, whilst from the upper side sprang a perfect young shoot, six or eight inches in height, with the leaves in their earliest growth. A basin of water solved the mystery, for, on washing the stone, I found it old and dry, and split down on one side. From its cavity I took out a small bundle of grass roots, one end of which was tied with thread, and withdrew the young shoot of the mango from the top of the stone. Here you have only one part of the apparatus of deception. It is perfected in the following manner: The mango, an evergreen, grows in almost every large garden in India. A confederate first pulls a sufficient quantity of the roots of grass which are white, long and fibrous, and resemble the first growth of roots from the mango-stone. He ties them up, inserts the thread in the cleft stone, and gives them secretly with the cloth to his chief, who plants a mango-stone with the roots. The moist earth in which it is buried removes all appearance of deception. Again the confederate is ready with his progressive slips of mango, which, at every removal of the basket, he contrives to place within reach of the operator without being seen; and the latter, in his manipulations whilst covering up the basket with the cloth, slips them into the upper part of the slit in the mango-stone. The same process may be continued so as to give you the fruit growing in its various stages, but this of course must depend on the trick being performed in the fruit season. I was twenty-three years in India, and never met with anybody who could explain the modus operandi of this trick, though almost all—not all—felt satisfied that it was a trick."—Travels in India.

PICTURES.

A room with pictures in it and a room without pictures differ by nearly as much as a room with windows and a room without windows. Nothing, we think, is more melancholy, particularly to a person who has to pass much time in his room, than blank walls and nothing on them; for pictures are loopholes of escape to the soul, leading it to other scenes and other spheres. It is such an inexpressible relief to a person engaged in writing, or even reading, on looking up, not to have his line of vision chopped square off by an odious white wall, but to find his soul escaping, as it were, through the frame of an exquisite picture, to other beautiful, and, perhaps, idyllic scenes, where the fancy for a moment may revel, refreshed and delighted. Is it winter in your world?—perhaps it is summer in the picture; what a charming momentary change and contrast! And thus pictures are consolers of loneliness; they are a sweet flattery to the soul; they are a relief to the jaded mind; they are windows to the imprisoned thought; they are books; they are histories and sermons—which we can read without the trouble of turning over the leaves.—N. H. Patriot.

THE ROYAL PALACE AT MADRID.

If the head that sleeps beneath the crown is uneasy, it is not because it is laid upon its pillow in uncomfortable lodgings. Crowned heads generally look out for the best quarters, and the pretty head of Queen Isabella of Spain has certainly a most magnificent shelter. The engraving on page 325 gives an accurate view of her superb palace, one of the finest in Europe, or rather, in the world. It is an undisputed model of architectural taste, beauty and grandeur, and its effect is most striking to the eye. It is situated at the western extremity on the site of the original Alcazar, or castle of the Moors, which was burned down on Christmas eve, 1734. Its extent is enormous, being 470 feet each way, and towering, a perfect mountain of masonry, to the height of 160 feet. The rustic base is of granite, and the window work is of white Colman stone, which glitters in the sunlight like marble. The architecture is a combination of Ionic and Doric. It contains a small but splendid Corinthian chapel, a library of nearly 100,000 volumes, and has one of the finest armories in the world. Our picture is drawn from the most favorable point of view, and the proportions of this remarkable edifice have been faithfully presented by the artist. The foreground is enlivened by the introduction of a military detachment marching into the courtyard over the lofty bridge. A regiment of infantry are passing in, and behind them comes a squadron of heavy horse. Some of the citizens are grouped together, watching the military pageant. The royal troops are not regarded with particular favor just at present, for they have but recently shed the blood of the people in the streets, and proved themselves the obedient instruments of O'Donnell in the late suppression of popular liberty. There are several other fine buildings in Madrid, such as the Chamber of Deputies, the Palace of the Councils, the Post Office, the Custom-House, the Palacio de Buenavista, and a few churches, but the city, with these exceptions, is not particularly remarkable for beautiful, nor has it any ancient, edifices. The recent date of its becoming the Spanish capital (under the reign of Philip II.), fully accounts for this. During the sway of the Austrian dynasty, which lasted about a century and a half, the only important buildings erected were convents, and these were far from being ornamental structures. Yet Madrid has very much to interest the traveller, as it has a peculiar and unique physiognomy of its own. And this interest in the capital of the nation may be somewhat enhanced when the former power and splendor of the Spanish people is remembered, which have been waning for centuries. The present critical condition of the nation seems to foretell a still greater decay of its national strength.

FOLSOM &amp; BOWKER'S BAG MANUFACTORY.

We take pleasure in presenting to our readers views of the manufactory and ware-rooms of Messrs. Folsom & Bowker, 122 Commercial Street, in this city, widely known in their connection with the manufacturing by machinery of the various kinds of bags now so generally and extensively used in putting up flour, grain, hams, spices, and hundreds of other commodities in daily use. It may not be generally known that machinery is made to lend its powerful aid in their manufacture—that by its use bags are made faster, stronger and neater, and much more uniform in size and finish than they can possibly be by hand, and that formerly thirty or forty grain bags unevenly and very roughly made with the needle, was considered a good day's work; while now, the sewing machine, with its never-tiring arm, urged to its work by the ceaseless power of steam, and fed by the immense cutters and folders, rests not pauses not till from 600 to 800 are made in the same time, and the printing presses finish nearly as many thousands. It is no wonder, when we consider these advantages and the gradual increase of the demand for the article for many years past (until now it is almost incredible), that these gentlemen should extend their means to meet this call; and we will endeavor to explain to our readers their modus operandi, which the engravings connected with this article will greatly assist us in doing. The first engraving gives a view of the Cutting and Sewing Room. In this department are some twenty sewing machines, attended by females, who are now seen at their work; here each bag is cut into proper dimensions, folded and sewed, or packed on long shelves, until the hungry maw of the sewing machine shall call for them. The third engraving is the same room viewed from the opposite end, where the bags are pressed into compact bundles for transportation, and the same being delivered,—the whole forming a busy and animated picture. The largest engraving displays the Printing Department, where three presses are almost constantly employed. The great variety of purposes for which the bags are required, and the various inscriptions to be imprinted, describing what they are to such an extended notice of this business as we could wish; we shall, therefore, satisfy ourselves with a few hasty and general remarks. It is a fact not generally known that, during the late high price of flour, thousands of the poorer classes were forced, in the absence of larger means, to purchase the article by the bag. This extended over nearly every portion of our country; and in addition to the ker Sewing Machine Company, whose extensive manufactory on Washington Street, near Waltham Street, is an ornament to our city. It is always a matter of pleasure to us to record individual instances of success which are the results of perseverance, energy and tact; and the firm whose name heads this article is deserving of more than this passing notice. They are always at their posts, ever ready to make a bid or to contract for the making of from one to thousands of pieces of the goods they manufacture; and having all the advantages of new and improved machinery, can compete with any other party in the business successfully, while their dealings are characterized by honesty and fairness. We were happy to observe that their employes were many of them females, some of whom we were informed, had been in the employ of the firm since the commencement of its business. A visit to their pleasant ware-rooms and manufactory would amply repay any who make it, whether from curiosity or on business, and we can assure all that they will be politely attended to in either case.

CUTTING AND SEWING ROOM.

MESSRS. CHICKERING'S GRAND PIANOFORTE.

The highly beautiful and tasteful Enamelled Grand Pianoforte, exhibited at the late fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association in Boston, by Messrs. Chickering & Sons, which the engraving on next page represents, was made by the Messrs. Chickering more for the purpose of showing to what a state of perfection their art had arrived in this country, than with the expectation of finding a purchaser for so costly an article. It is in the pure style of modern French furniture, and would grace any of the most recherché salons even in Paris. The body and legs of the instrument are made of the finest white maple, and the whole finished with a degree of art unsurpassable for mechanical excellence and delicacy of construction. The exquisite carvings upon the case and legs, from drawings made by the principal designer of the manufactory, attracted all eyes during the exhibition, and are of equal merit in the conception and performance, both of which were the work of one individual. No one who is not conversant with the process can be contain, rendering this absolutely necessary. In the fourth picture, we have a view of the Counting Room, through which the bags are finally despatched, properly put up according to the distance they are to be transported, and where samples of the many kinds and styles manufactured are constantly on view. It is almost impossible in an article like this, and where our space must be properly divided to suit the tastes of our many thousands of readers, to give regular call, created an almost inconceivable demand for this variety of bags, which are made by tens of thousands at this establishment, the proprietors of which find a ready market in New England, at the same time shipping largely to the South and West, the latter particularly. It is curious to note how large results are often attained by small beginnings. Mr. Folsom (the senior partner and now the oldest manufacturer of bags in this city) was, some four or five years since, engaged in the making of clothing, in which he employed two or three sewing machines. The hearty and strength of the work attracted the attention of a gentleman who wished to have a few hundred bags made in an exceedingly strong and superior manner. This person made Mr. Folsom a proposition to sew them with his machines. After some demurring on his part, he consented; and when the work was finished, it gave such good satisfaction, a contract was offered Mr. Folsom by the gentleman, was accepted, and from using two or three machines in tailoring, the firm now use upwards of twenty, as we have shown, always at their highest speed, and running every working hour. We may as well mention, in this connection, that these sewing machines are all of the patent of the Grover & Ba-designs, may with the same justice be lavished upon its interior, which is equally unexceptionable in all the requirements of a grand piano, in the fullest sense of the term. Its tone, its power and its sweetness were equally the theme of admiration from the admiring crowds that constantly surrounded it, and had it been entered with the other superb instruments of the Chickering for competition, it would doubtless have obtained as flattering an approval. When we look back some fifteen years, and refer in our memory to the perfect (as it was then called) piano of the elder Mr. Chickering (of kindly memory), and then cast our eyes upon this magnificent evidence of the advancement of the art, we cannot avoid the conviction that the motto of the new firm, "Excelsior," is not an assumption, but a reality, which is still more strongly shown by the recent announcement in the Transcript of an award of one gold, two silver and two bronze medals for superiority in all the various departments of their business. Our engraving not only delineates the superb instrument above referred to, but the manner in which it was exhibited on a high platform, enabling visitors to see it to advantage from all points. Grouped in various parts of the picture are sketches of the wares of other exhibitors, the whole forming an agreeable souvenir of the great Mechanics' Fair, one of the "institutions" of which Boston is justly proud. We have alluded above to the contrast between the enameled grand piano under notice and the pianos turned out a few years since from the same establishment, as representing a prodigious improvement; but how much greater the contrast between this work of art and those manufactured forty years ago! We should like, for the curiosity of the thing, to see this Chickering piano and one of the date of which we speak placed in juxtaposition. It would speak volumes. The little spindle-shanked oddity, with its few jingling notes, would be a spectacle of fun. What an amazing advance in mechanical and musical science has taken place in this country within a quarter of a century! When we think of the number of pianos made, we fancy that the market must be glutted, and yet, to our astonishment, we learn that the principal manufacturers, with all their facilities, cannot meet the growing demand.

THE PRINTING DEPARTMENT.

CUTTING AND SEWING ROOM.

THE COUNTING ROOM.

MESSRS. CHICKERINGS' GRAND PIANO FORTE.

THE ROYAL PALACE AT MADRID, SPAIN.

[For description, see page 323.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

FORT NIAGARA.

BY JAMES F. FITZ.

[An accurate sketch of this locality is presented in Vol. X., No. 13, of Ballou's Pictorial.]

Old fortress! still thou standest sentinel,
Where swift Niagara meets Ontario;
Thy massy walls seem frowningly to tell
Of former strife and foe.

Thy ministers of death, the cannons black,
Look now as warlike as in days of yore;
When hostile columns marched to the attack,
Along Niagara's shore.

A superstitious air doth hang around—
Strange scenes thou'st witnessed in departed years;
And still thy wall appears.

Thou art a monument of former age—
A relic of a generation past—
A place of former war, of strife and rage,
Where peace prevails at last.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

NELLIE KENT.

BY ESTHER BEUNE.

FRANK LAYTON came down stairs, whistling a popular tune—e always whistled when he had nothing else to do. The library door half opened, and his father's voice said:

"Frank, my boy, come in here a moment, I want to speak to you."

Frank went in, closed the door after him, sat down in a chair, and gazed listlessly at the fire. He wondered what was coming.

"Are you never going to get married, Frank?"

There it was, the question direct, without any preliminaries.

"To tell you the truth, father, I have entertained the idea for some time. But I have seen nobody that suits me as yet."

"I have two in my mind now, Frank, either of whom would make you a splendid wife."

"Indeed—do I know them, father?"

"I think not. They are the nieces of your mother's old friend, Mrs. Moxey. They have both come here to live with her, lately, and from what I have seen of them, I should call them very beautiful girls."

"Well, father, supposing that I should see fit to propose to either of these young ladies and should be rejected, what then?"

"Pooh! no danger of that—not in the least, Frank."

Frank passed his hand over his curly hair. One of his greatest and by no means unpardonable weaknesses, was vanity.

"I suppose Mrs. Moxey will try to marry off her nieces, so that they may not be dependent upon her," said Frank, after a pause.

"There you are wrong, Frank. Both of these girls will have splendid fortunes when they come of age. Mr. Bernard was as rich as a Jew, and left all his money to be divided between his two children, Julia and Lucy."

Perhaps the old lawyer was thinking of some will he had drawn up. But it is certain that Frank winced a little as he guessed his father's motive for mentioning the subject to him. He had almost made up his mind that he wouldn't like either Miss Julia or Miss Lucy Bernard in spite of their splendid fortunes.

"My dear fellow, let me introduce you to the beautiful sisters," said Alfred Dale to his friend Frank Layton, as they met a few evenings after Frank's conversation with his father, at the house of Mrs. Moxey.

The sisters were indeed beautiful. Frank, as he chatted merrily with them, hardly knew which he liked best—Julia with her black hair and her splendid form, or the brown-haired Lucy with her sweet smile. He quite forgot that he had almost vowed not to like either of them.

"Take care of yourself, Frank," whispered Alfred, as they passed close to each other in the dance.

Frank blushed a little—for with all his vanity he had not forgotten how to blush. Suddenly his eyes fell upon an elfish-looking little figure in a corner of the room. The little face was shaded with a profusion of dark brown hair combed plainly back, and the eyes wandered restlessly over the room. Frank gazed wonder-ingly, but the next minute was entirely engrossed in a conversation with Miss Julia.

Once more, in the course of the evening, as he stood near Alfred Dale, he caught sight of the plain little figure.

"Here, Dale," said Frank, whispering, "don't look round abruptly now, but tell me if you can, who that elfin lady is in the opposite corner."

"My dear fellow, don't bore me with your elves. You know I am not in that strain."

"But just tell me,—who is it?"

But Alfred had already retreated, and was half way across the room.

As Frank wended his way homewards that night, he tried to think which of the two sisters had pleased him most. But though he examined his own mind carefully, he found that he admired them both equally.

And so weeks went on, and Frank's admiration had changed into love. At least he acted like a man who is attacked with that disorder. But still the problem remained unsolved. For the life of him he could not tell which of the ladies he liked best. Julia he had discovered to be a coquette, but that only fascinated him more. Then Lucy always agreed with him in everything he said.

And every one knows how pleasant it is to have one's opinions always acceded to.

He was leaning back in his chair, hearing the wind blowing without, and thinking how comfortable the fire was on a cold day.
Then he began to whistle, but stopped suddenly, with the wise reflection that he was a vain fellow after all. Even if he proposed to Miss Bernard, he might be rejected. But then as a good son he would run the risk, and besides that, he was desperately in love —with which, Julia or Lucy? He certainly didn't know which to propose to.

A bright idea entered Frank's head. He would draw lots—that would be just the thing. And by way of improving this bright idea, he selected two slips of paper, and was proceeding to arrange them fastidiously, when the door burst open, and Alfred Dale rushed in quite unceremoniously. Frank wished him an hundred miles off. The fellow always came where he wasn't wanted.

Instead of taking the offered seat, Alfred walked excitedly about the room without speaking a word. Frank looked at him in astonishment. He was certainly insane.

"Frank, how I wish I wasn't poor."

"A fine expression for a man who said only a short time ago he was glad he was poor, because he wanted to work his way up in the world."

"What a memory you have. But then, you know, there was no Miss Bernard in the case."

Frank longed to ask which Miss Bernard was in the case, but hardly dared to.

"I tell you, Layton, I was never more sorry for anything in my life, than when I heard that girl had a splendid fortune."

"Why?"

"Because if Julia had been poor, we should have been on an equality. You must know, Frank, I am over head and ears in love with her."

Frank set his teeth together. From the instant the name of Julia had escaped Dale's lips, Frank was quite sure that it would have been her to whom he should have decided to propose, if he had drawn lots.

"Frank, are you going to strike me?"

"No, Dale,—you are a good fellow. What say you to a saunter down the street?"

"And a call at Mrs. Moxey's," added Alfred.

And away the two young men went, arm-in-arm, Frank inwardly vowing that he would propose to Julia that very day.

Just before they reached Mrs. Moxey's residence, a graceful little figure ran up the steps.

"Who is she?" asked Frank, suddenly interested,—the very same face that I saw some weeks ago at Mrs. Moxey's."

"So that is your elfin lady, is it? I heard she was some poor relative of Mrs. Moxey's. That estimable lady seems to have a countless number of relations."

"Did you hear her name, Dale?"

"The elfin lady's—yes, I think it was Kent, though I am not quite sure."

Julia looked splendidly on this particular day, and Frank became more decided than ever. He was consequently quite mortified when he found that Alfred entirely engrossed her attention, and that very little was bestowed upon himself. He seated himself by Lucy, but somehow her serenity ruffled him to-day. He longed to have a downright quarrel with some one.

His eye suddenly caught sight of the elfin lady, as he had christened her,—and he watched her as she glided across the room, and seated herself in a corner with her work. She certainly looked as if she might enjoy a quarrel, and Frank had half a mind to provoke one some way or another with this unknown lady. But then nobody introduced her to him, and therefore he had no opportunity.

Julia was holding a very animated conversation with Alfred Dale about a book she had been reading lately. There was a laughing dispute about some passage, and Julia proposed to get the book to show who was right.

"Ah, I forget," said she; "Nellie will do just as well as the book. Just repeat the passage for us."

The elfin lady quietly did as she was bidden, and the result was that Julia was declared to be in the right. Frank thought that the poor relative was of some use after all.

Day after day went on. Frank had not proposed yet to Julia, even though that lady had exerted all her powers to fascinate him, and treated Alfred with coldness. After all, Frank was not certain but what he liked the serene Lucy better. Besides that, Alfred had scarcely spoken to him lately, and had acted as if possessed by some demon. A certain old-fashioned rule came into Frank's head, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." Alfred to be sure was miserably jealous, but then Frank would be magnanimous, and give up forever the idea of aspiring to Miss Julia's hand.

This momentous sacrifice once concluded upon, Frank put on his overcoat, for it was quite a chilly day in spring, and prepared to find Alfred. But he was neither to be seen at his office nor his home. No one knew where he had gone. Just as Frank was about to give him up in despair, he saw his well-known figure in a cross street. Hastening, he soon caught up with him.

"My dear fellow, how are you?"

"Well enough," growled Alfred, evidently not much pleased with the interruption.

"Where are you going?"

"Nowhere."

"A very indefinite locality."

"Well then," said Alfred, angrily, "it is none of your business, to speak plainly."

Frank's good humor was growing wonderfully less, but he managed to speak bravely:

"Now Dale, don't be angry with me. You know we have been friends since we were boys, and I should like us two always to be friends. Don't you remember when all the other boys in school were against me, you took my part?"

"What is the use of recalling those old stories?" And Alfred turned moodily away.

"Because I never want to forget what a good, generous fellow you are. Why, I am not the least bit in love now with Miss Julia Bernard,—Miss Lucy is more to my taste."

"Why, Frank, I thought you had entirely supplanted me with your father's money and your good looks. I am not quite sure you haven't now."

"My dear fellow, I am not so vain that I cannot see that the lady does not care the least for me."

"If that is the case, there is hope for me yet. And I don't care if I am poor, I will work my way up yet. Frank, I am sorry I spoke so to you; I had no right to be angry with you."

"Never mind that. Are you going to Mrs. Moxey's select party this evening?"

"Yes, to be sure. I didn't think though of going a little while ago."

The young man parted at the door of Alfred's office, Alfred looking quite pleased with himself and all the world. Frank wended his way homewards in a spirit of cheerful martyrdom.
There were no longer two to choose between, and the state of glorious uncertainty he had been in for the last three months was quite done away with. As he opened the front door, he met his father with coat and hat on all ready for going out.

"Come into the library just one moment, Frank."

Frank followed his father a little reluctantly. He would like to have been excused.

"Have you proposed to either of those young ladies yet?"

"No," said Frank.

"And when do you mean to?"

"I cannot possibly tell."

"Cannot tell, when you have been dilly-dallying these six months. I tell you it is of the greatest consequence that you should marry one of them. If you don't, you young rascal, I'll marry one myself, and leave you nothing in my will."

The old gentleman paused a moment to take breath, and then went on.

"I am going to Mrs. Moxey's—she is as anxious as I am that you should marry one of her nieces. Just see what you subject me to, Frank. Mrs. Moxey actually thinks that my calls on your behalf, are really on her account. There is no limit to the vanity of women."

And the old lawyer departed, leaving his son to rather uncomfortable reflections. In the first place, Frank disliked the idea of marrying any one for her money. As much as he admired Lucy Bernard, he almost resolved to forget her, rather than that it should be said he married her for her wealth. Then there was the disobedience to his father's express wishes—an act he had never been guilty of before. However, he determined that that evening should decide his fate one way or another, and in the morning he would give his father a direct answer.

Mrs. Moxey's party was quite a brilliant affair. No one knew better how to get up a party than the widow. And her two beautiful nieces were quite an attraction. Alfred Dale was present, of course, and Julia and he were exceedingly good friends. Frank almost envied Alfred his happiness. As for himself, he took a seat by Lucy Bernard with the uncomfortable feeling that his father's eye was fixed upon him watching his every movement.
He became quite silent, very different from the usually agreeable Frank Layton. Lucy Bernard, after rallying him a little on his apparent dullness, left him to his own reflections. He watched her conversing gaily with some gentlemen in another part of the room.
After all, it would be a frightful thing to marry a person who would never differ with him from one year's end to another, even if that person were rich and beautiful. He would have liked a passionate person better.

Quietly passing through the brilliantly lighted rooms, he went through the door that led out on the piazza. Something dark on the floor attracted his attention. Stooping down, he discovered a bunch of violets; which from the fragrance they retained, seemed to have been freshly gathered.

In an exceedingly sentimental turn of mind, he stood gazing at the moon, as the "queen of night" suddenly emerged from a filmy cloud. One by one he dropped the violets over the railing of the piazza, counting a year with each one. Twenty-four violets he had dropped into the darkness, and just twenty-four years had he lived. Twenty-four years of idleness; but from that night forth, he would commence to work out his own fortune.

"Will you spare me a few of my violets?"

The voice quite startled him; he was certain no one had passed through the door since he himself had. He looked around the piazza—a black object was just observable on a bench in the corner. Then the figure slowly arose and came towards Frank—there was no mistaking Miss Nellie Kent.

"Pardon me the use of your property—were they so very valuable to you?"

"Everything is valuable that we toil for. I climbed a steep hill for those violets this afternoon."

"I'm very sorry; I did not know they belonged to any one in particular." It was certainly a very odd, elfish little figure, and a very pretty face that the moon shone upon. "Did the moon attract you, too, Miss Nellie Kent?"

"No, I came here because it was so warm and so tiresome in there."

She had brushed past him, and re-entered the lighted rooms. With the remnant of the violets in his hand, he soon followed, and a few minutes after took his leave of Mrs. Moxey. Frank's dreaded explanation with his father came sooner than he expected. As he opened the outer door that night, his father was pacing the hall, his face looking pale and careworn.

"Is it all settled, Frank?"

"No, father," was Frank's resolute answer.

"And why not?"

"Because I find I have no stronger feeling than admiration for either Miss Julia or Miss Lucy Bernard. And I can never bring myself to marry any one merely for her money."

"Then, Frank, we are ruined."

"How so, father?"

"If you will have the circumstances, you must know that I invested all my property in a speculation and failed. That is, I have lost everything, and find myself as poor as I was thirty-five years ago. I did hope that my son would retrieve my fortune by marrying Miss Bernard."

"He will do better than that, father—he will work for you."

"Work! I believe little in a son who goes contrary to what he knows are my express wishes."

"I could not do what I should regret all my life; but I can and I will work hard."

"Nonsense, you never worked in your life."

"The more reason that I should now, father."

But the old lawyer was already slamming the door after him, muttering to himself, "ruined, ruined entirely." Frank could hear his father pacing his room all through the night. Once and awhile the sound ceased, as if he were resting. But in a few minutes the walking re-commenced. It was so painful for Frank to hear, that his resolution almost wavered. Once or twice for his father's sake he almost came to the determination to marry Miss Bernard and her splendid fortune. But then he could not lose his own self-respect, which he should certainly do, if he married with such a mercenary object in view. No, he would rather work night and day.

He walked out early in the morning before his father was up. The cool, fresh air was quite reviving, and more for the sake of forgetting his anxieties than anything else, he climbed a hill and saw the sun rise over the water. Coming down, his attention was attracted by some violets, that brought back to his remembrance one scene of the previous evening. He gathered a bunch of the fragrant flowers, determining to send them to Miss Nellie Kent in place of those he had destroyed. Consequently, as he passed Mrs. Moxey's house, he left them at the door, and then went home to breakfast and an angry father.

In due course of time, the misfortune of Mr. Layton, senior, became widely known, and friends fell off accordingly. Mrs. Moxey grew a little colder, though all the rest of the household remained unchanged. In spite of the freezing reception he received from that respectable lady, Frank still was a constant visitor; for out of the affair of the violets had grown quite an acquaintance with Miss Nellie Kent. In fact, the clan lady occupied his thoughts much of the time.

The marriage of Alfred Dale with Julia Bernard was quite a settled affair; the chief regret of Alfred being that Julia was not as poor as himself. Now, it is a strange thing, but an actual fact, that Frank Layton made the proposal to Miss Nellie Kent, that he had thought of making to two other ladies before her. And he was accepted; and more than that, it was arranged that he should be married at the same time as his friend, Alfred Dale. After that, Frank was to commence in earnest to work out his fortune.

The wedding-day came and turned out like a great many others, to be the best day that could possibly have been selected. The brides were certainly beautiful. One knew not which to admire most. But the ceremony was over, and the party returned from church, and Nellie stood by the window looking out.

"Mrs. Nellie Kent Layton—how does that title sound?" asked Frank.

"Not quite right, Frank. It should be Mrs. Nellie Kent Bernard Layton—though everybody use to call me Nellie Kent."

"I thought that was your name."

"No, Bernard was my father's name. But I never told you of your mistake, Frank, because I wanted you to think me poor."

"But you were poor, Nellie—at least, I thought it was Julia and Lucy who were rich."

"No, they have each of them only a little property. My father was very rich, and left me all his property." Frank stood silently looking out of the window. "Are you so terribly sorry that I am rich?" asked Nellie, timidly.

"No, my dear," said Frank, drawing her towards him. "But I was thinking that I should still adhere to my plans for working, so as not to be dependent upon my wife. Besides that, Nellie, you know that 'everything is valuable that we toil for.'"

WILKING EXTRAORDINARY.

A Yankee skipper is at present in Manchester for the purpose of getting two rifles of a very peculiar character made by Mr. Whitworth, the eminent mechanical engineer. They are each forty pounds weight, and are intended to shoot whales that cannot be approached and killed in the ordinary method. The barrel is only thirty inches long, rifled polygonally to describe one turn in length. The projectile is a shell of three pounds weight, six inches long, fired from the shoulder with 2 1/2 drachms of powder, and having a charge inside of four ounces. The skipper states that he killed three whales last season out of forty fired at with a bomb, in the shape of an arrow twenty inches long, and having Julia rubber wings to guide its flight. The rest spouted blood, but got away, owing to the length of the bomb detracting from its destructiveness. They are one hundred feet long, and weigh two hundred tons. The ship and crew are now waiting at Cork until the rifles and shells are completed.—London Times.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WEENONA.

BY WALTER BYRGETT.

Hail, thou bright majestic river!
Sporting with the summer gale;
Where the sunbeams arrows quiver,
In the peaceful, smiling vale!
Here once dwelt an Indian maiden—
Fair Weenona! blithe and free,
And her step was like a sunbeam
Dancing o'er the playful sea!

Young and handsome was Weenona,
Light and graceful as a fawn;
And her cheeks were like the rose—
Like the crimson blush of morn!
Like the diamonds brilliant sparkle,
From their jewelled realms of light,
Were her eyes,—her silken tresses,
As the darkness of the night.

One there was—a dark-eyed warrior,
Proud and noble, and a kinsman;
He had seen the queenly maiden,
Heard the young Weenona sing,
One bright evening she sat musing,
Near her wigwam, by the stream;
Bright the star-beams shone above her—
Lovely was Weenona's dream.

Suddenly there stood before her,
One she loved—a warrior bold
"Fair Weenona, has Abenakee Dared to you his love unfold?"
"Ay, he has," the maiden answered,
"Hail, the villain!" and he frowned;
Darkly as the storm-cloud's threatening,
Ere the rain-drops pierce the ground.

Clearly shone the moon above them,
Near them rocked their light canoe;
"Let us fly!" Weenona whispered—
"Fie! Bird, I will follow you!"
Like an arrow from its quiver,
Swift they sped across the stream;
Ah, they saw not their pursuers,
Nor the tomahawk's pale gleam!

O'er the cataraet's mad waters,
Through the white and seething foam,
They were wafted safely onward,
To their far-off forest-home.
There they lived and loved together,
In their wigwam—happy twain!
And Weenona's song of gladness
Echoed through the hills again!

In the Valley of Wyoming,
Years ago, one lovely night,
Languished gentle, young Weenona,
And her spirit took its flight!
Soon her husband followed after,
To the silent land of shades;
Never more their songs of gladness
Echoed through the valley-glades.

Near the river, where a willow,
Drooping, weeps o'er grassy mound,
There they laid the Indian lovers—
Sacred be that spot of ground!
In the silent "Valley of Waters,"
There is fair Weenona's grave;
Underneath the fringing osiers,
By the blue and shining wave;
And the violet lifts its head
O'er the long-forgotten grave.

MONACO.

Upon the southern shore of North Italy, between the Sardinian States of Genoa and Nice, washed by the rolling waters of the Mediterranean, is situated the independent principality of Monaco—a principality containing fifty-three square miles of territory—which is more than twice as much as that possessed by the world-renowned republic of San Marino. The principality of Monaco was founded as early as the tenth century, in favor of the house of Grimaldi, under whose rule, with partial interruptions, it has ever since remained—the prince usually residing in Paris a considerable portion of the year. It has a population of about seven thousand inhabitants, who are prouder of their little State than Napoleon is of his empire. Their capital, built on a rocky promontory, is a town of twelve hundred people, defended by fortifications erected by Louis Fourteenth. The entire principality is under the protection of Sardinia. The people of Monaco, conscious of the inferiority of their State in point of size, have adopted the policy of attracting attention by making a great noise in the world, and it is said that for more than a century, this little principality, not eight miles square, has not ceased for a single day to disturb all Europe with its protests, its proclamations and declarations of right. In this manner it has thus far escaped the encroachments of its more powerful neighbors.—Pottsville.

SHIPS AND THE SEA.

I do not know of anything that shows more evidently the limitless capacity of man, and his prerogative to conquer the dominions of nature, than a ship. Even the first rude bark, creeping timidly from the shore, was an indication of this delegated lordship over the material world—the first pushing out of those atoms of the human mind that were to dash around the globe, and stretch out their measuring lines among the stars. And now follow this adventurous achievement, from that simple boat to the vessel that bore Columbus stretching out beyond all ancient landmarks, and beating onward, like the energies of his own dauntless heart, through the gray mystery of the deep—follow it to the deck of a modern steamship condensing in its enormous and beautiful model the art and science of six thousand years, and whipping its surges with its lash of fire, and you will understand how this great and wide sea has accomplished the purposes of wise and benevolent design, by developing, through its very difficulties, the mind, and elevating the social condition of man. Yes, the sea is a great civilizer that carries round the world tokens from land to land, and binds together the destinies of the race.—E. H. Chapin, D. D.

AN UNFAITHFUL STEWARD.

The Duke of Devonshire was once rambling over his estates, and had prolonged his walk to an unusual distance, when he perceived that one of those sudden showers, so characteristic of sultry summer, was about to burst above him. He dashed a drenching, and hoping that he might possibly discover some farm-house or other means of shelter, he hurried to the top of a hill not far off, when his eye was arrested by a scene in the valley below which he could compare to nothing but one of enchantment. It was a little Gothic farm-house, nestled among the trees, and surrounded by the greenest and most beautiful meadow lands he had ever seen. The duke was perfectly transported by the air of dreamy quietude which hung about it, and he fancied he could almost hear the hum of innumerable bees in the clover-blossoms. When he reached the door, he discovered a middle-aged woman spinning, and a young girl of fourteen or fifteen years employed at the churn. The man had just commenced to patter down in large drops, so that the duke had a good excuse for entering. The poor women knew the duke only by reputation—he had never seen him before; but she knew from his look and bearing that he was no ordinary person, which of course created considerable trepidation in the heart of the simple matron. The duke said:

"Be not concerned, my good woman, for the sudden shower coming up is the sole cause of my intrusion in the midst of this little paradise." The woman curtsied and stammered out some sort of reply. "I am quite famished," said the duke, "and if you will be so good as to give me a mouthful of something to eat, I will endeavor to intrude on your hospitality no longer than the shower continues."

"I have nothing in the house, your honor, but some bread and cheese, and a drink of ale," replied the woman, reddening.

"O, that will do very well," answered the duke, who had never tasted a morsel of coarse bread in his life. "I think I will try some—anything to stay my appetite."

While he was partaking of the homely fare which the poor woman spread before him, he inquired if she owned the cottage and the few acres of beautiful green meadow land which surrounded it.

"We did once, sir—that is my husband did; but—" here she hesitated.

"Go on!" said the duke, who saw in a moment that some trouble was lurking at the bottom of it. "I am always interested in the distresses of the poor—of that is your condition."

"It was, sir, till the Duke of Devonshire's steward came to me one day, and said the duke wanted it, and that he would give me sixteen acres away yonder on the hill-side, which was good for naught (I could never keep one sorry cow on it but it would look like it were starved), for my five acres here at home, which would keep two sleek and fat."

"But my good woman," said the duke, "do you suppose the Duke of Devonshire would be guilty of so base an act? Why did you not apply to the authorities for redress?"

"Alas!" answered the poor woman, bursting into tears, "the steward assured me if I made any resistance, the duke would take away everything I had, and send me straight to the work-house. Indeed, I used to think the duke was a good man before this, and my husband, honest man, believed it also."

The duke was sensibly affected, and turning to the window, said:

"I am a friend of the duke's, and at present am stopping at Chatsworth Hall; but I doubt if the duke, till the present hour, has ever heard a word of what you have been telling me. Indeed, I am so confident of this, and am so much interested in your grievances, that you shall accompany me on my return, and shall learn from the duke's own mouth the falsity of what the steward has told you."

At first the poor woman hesitated. But the duke assured her that no harm should befall her; that he would stand by her to the last; and that she should soon have the satisfaction of having all her former rights restored to her. Thus reassured and encouraged, the poor widow, after the shower had subsided, started off in company with the duke on his return to Chatsworth.

When they arrived at the Hall, the steward was sent for, and was completely thunder-struck on beholding the poor woman whom he had so basely defrauded of her rights, in company with the duke his master. He was questioned, and without attempting to deny the charge, he fell on his knees and confessed his iniquity. The duke was perfectly calm during the confession, and when he was done, he turned to the woman and inquired how much her five acres of land were worth to her a year. He then figured up the amount, adding interest and compound interest, and then turning to the steward, said: "Pay this woman the amount, and then I have a settlement to make with you for the remaining sixteen acres which you have appropriated to your own use, which I shall likewise confer upon this poor woman. It is now sixteen years since you commenced to serve me as steward, and this is the second of your offences known to me; and I warn you, as you value your situation, that you never be guilty of a third."

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE POETRY OF THE EAST. By WM. HOLMESVILLE AUGER. Boston: Whitehead, Nichols & Hall. 1875. 12mo. pp. 280.

In this elegant volume, the Rev. Mr. Auger, who is fully competent to the task, has collected a mass of Eastern poetry, ranging from the simple and primitive to the most refined and polished, and giving a full and complete history of the poetry of the East, and a full and complete history of the poetry of the East, and a full and complete history of the poetry of the East.

THE FOLD TEST OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM. By WM. B. GORDON, D.D.

The second author of this volume handles the exciting subject of spiritualism in a novel manner, and argues its in its stand-point with considerable force. It is a book which will provoke much controversy. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

GENIES OF CHRISTIANITY. By the VISCOUNT DE CHATEAUBRIAND. Translated by CHARLES F. WILKIE, D.D. Philadelphia: J. P. Lippincott & Co. 1875. 8vo. pp. 758.

A complete translation of De Chateaubriand's great work, with a biography of the author, and copious critical and explanatory notes. Apart from the purpose of these essays, which spring from the result of a devoted spirit against the atheism of the French revolution, they are models of style, and the translator has given in pure English the equivalent of the pure and brilliant French of the original. For sale by Sanborn, Carter & Bazin.

THE REVISED SON, AND OTHER STORIES OF THE HEART. By Mrs. CAROLINE LEE HENST. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson. 12mo. pp. 271.

There are twelve of these charming stories, now to be read with a mournful interest since the death of their gifted author. The perfect purity and wisdom of her writings enhances the effect of their power and brilliancy. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE IN THE FAR WEST. By S. N. CARROLL. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1865. 12mo. pp. 589.

The author enlisted as an artist in Col. Fremont's last expedition, shared the adventures of the party, and also passed through a variety of perils of his own. With a wide field for description, he has managed his materials with skill, and made a very readable book. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

PASSION AND PRINCIPLE.—T. B. Peterson has published this fine story by Mrs. Grey in pamphlet form and it may be obtained of A. Williams & Co.

NEW MUSIC.—From Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington Street, we have received "L'Inquietude," "Kiss Schottisch," "Di Pravezza il Mar," "La Traviata," and the "Messenger Polka." Also from G. P. Reed & Co., 13 Tremont Street, the "Riguetto Polka Redowa," "Love Chase Gallop," and a new version of "Pop goes the Weasel."

CAPE COD.

On this and the next page we present a series of faithful sketches, drawn for us on the spot, by Mr. Kilburn, and delineating some of the most striking localities on Cape Cod, a portion of Massachusetts exhibiting many features of interest. The second view in this series depicts the town of Provincetown, originally a part of Truro, but incorporated as a township in 1727, with the investiture of peculiar privileges, the inhabitants being exempted from taxation. At this time, and for ten or twelve years thereafter, it was a flourishing place, but at the expiration of this period, the people began to forsake the town, and before the year 1748, it was reduced to two or three families. In 1755, it contained about ten dwelling-houses, and in 1776, about twenty houses and 203 inhabitants. After the Revolutionary war, it gradually rose from its state of depression. The town of Provincetown is situated on the end of the peninsula of Cape Cod, and lies in the form of a hook. It averages about three and a half miles in length, and two and a half in breadth. The entire township consists of beaches and hills of sand, and a few shallow ponds. The harbor is completely landlocked, and very capacious and safe, and is a place of great importance to navigation. This was the first harbor at which the Mayflower touched in her passage to Plymouth, in 1620. Provincetown stands on the northwestern side of the harbor, on the margin of a beach of loose sand. Immediately behind the town is a hill or cliff of sand, as seen in our view, upon the summit of which stands the town-house, making a very conspicuous landmark, which may be seen for miles from every point of the compass. The houses are mostly situated on a single street two miles in length, and running near the water's edge, provided with a good plank sidewalk for the entire distance. The street is very narrow and irregular, and upon stepping from the sidewalk, the foot sinks into the sand, which is so light that it drifts about the houses like snow in a driving winter storm. Although surrounded on every side by the ocean, good water is obtained by digging at a moderate depth a short distance from the shore. In our view, the town house is seen upon the cliff; the building immediately beneath the flag-staff is the bank; the church to the left is the Methodist; the next is the Orthodox, and the remaining one seen is the Universalist. Provincetown has a large shipping interest, and a great many whalers are owned and fitted out here. It has become during the summer the resort of a great many strangers, for the purposes of fishing and inhaling the invigorating sea breezes. It is about fifty miles east-southeast of Boston. In the extent of the mackerel fishery carried on here, this port ranks as the fourth in the State, being surpassed only by Gloucester, Wellfleet and Newburyport. In 1851, sixty vessels, with a tonnage of 4332 tons owned here, were engaged in the mackerel fishery, employing 688 men and boys. During the year 1852, 17,640 barrels of mackerel were inspected at this port. The population, by the last census, was 3157. The remaining sketches of our series were made in and about Truro. The settlement of Truro was commenced about 1700. Its Indian name was Pamet, and it appears to have been purchased in 1697. In 1705, it was erected into a township called Dangerfield, and in 1709, it was incorporated by its present name. The town is situated on the northern extremity of the peninsula of Cape Cod. It is about fourteen miles in length, and three in breadth in the widest part. Excepting the salt marshes, the soil is very light and sandy, and free from stones or the growth of wood. No hay, with the exception of marsh or salt bay, is produced, and the appearance of the depicted in our first engraving, occupies the inside of the cape. The view we present gives a good idea of the scenery and general appearance of the villages in this part of the cape. The hills, which rise in graceful and regular swells, are entirely destitute of trees or shrubbery, which gives them a peculiar and barren appearance. Truro Beach, which forms another of our pictures, is quite near Pond Village. It forms no harbor, but vessels lie in the offing and communicate with the shore by boats; the fish-houses, etc., make a picturesque appearance. Provincetown is connected with Boston by the regular packet Olata, Capt. Young, and other packets, and by stage, which runs through Truro, Wellfleet, Eastham, Orleans, Brewster and Dennis to Yarmouth, fifty miles, where it connects with the Cape Cod Railroad. Truro is about 110 miles by land, and 55 by water from Boston. The inhabitants derive their chief support from the fisheries. In 1852, 52 vessels and 581 men and boys were employed here in the mackerel fishery; 2541 barrels of mackerel were inspected in that year. In the great gale of 1841, this town lost 57 men, whose homes were in a circuit of two miles—27 of them married, and only eight over thirty years of age. The population at that time was about 1900; the number of widows, 105. In 1850, the population was 2051.

POND VILLAGE, TRURO, MASS.

VIEW OF PROVINCETOWN, MASS.

THE CASHMIRIANS.

The Cashmirians are a handsome race, with the oval faces and aquiline nose peculiar to the Afghans, somewhat of the Jewish type, but of a more open expression: they have fair complexions, with a slight blush of red upon the cheek. The Mussulman population seemed to me to have the finest features; but the Hindoos (almost all Brahmins) have fairer skins, more white and pink—some would be reckoned fair even in England—and the tint of the skin is to me more beautiful than that of the generality of my own countrymen. The men are broad-shouldered and stoutly built, of a middling height. One sees fewer of the extremes, neither very tall nor very short men, as in most other countries. The dress of the lower classes consists of a loose wollen frock, reaching below the knee, gathered in round the waist by a piece of white or colored cloth, and a white turban on the head. The better classes wear the same style of dress, but made of a much finer material, the fine wool or Pashmeem, from which the shawls are made. This is usually either of lilac or fawn color, and is very expensive. Mahomedans and Hindoos wear the same dress, and all have the face unshaven. Some of the children are lovely; and along the banks of the river the little girls, seen playing and dabbling in the water, called forth our warm admiration. The women I am not able to describe. It is the custom in the East for all respectable women to conceal the face and figure as much as possible; and distance it has a very pretty effect, but the coarseness of the material injures very much the appearance when seen too closely. The higher classes of ladies, in their houses, wear loose silk trousers, and a kind of silk skirt, all generally of a red color. The taking style of their dress gives a romantic effect to their personal beauty and natural symmetry of form which has always attracted the notice of travellers; and they have become the ideal models of natural grace and perfection the world over. Nowhere else in Asia, if in the world, are to be found so close resemblances to the statuary of the ancient sculptors whose fidelity to nature was unrivalled, as the natives of Cashmere exhibit in the outlines of symmetrical elegance of mould. The refinements of modern life do not seem to have developed a greater degree of physical beauty.—London Literary Gazette.

HIGHLAND LIGHT, TRURO, MASS.

RACE POINT LIGHT.

although this is less the case in Cashmere than perhaps any other part of Asia, still an Englishman cannot become acquainted with the appearance of many. The girls of a marriageable age, and all those at all remarkable for personal appearance, are kept shut up. We could therefore form our opinions only from the few of the commoner classes met about the town and surrounding country. The young women do come down to the river to wash their feet and clothes. But our boat, with its gay pavilion and numerous rowers, was a marked object wherever we went; and, I suppose from fear, whenever we approached, the young ladies ran off as quickly as they could. On a few occasions, turning sharply round a corner, we surprised a fair bevy of damsels, and a glimpse thus obtained, confirmed the opinion generally entertained of the beauty of Cashmirian women. They better deserve the name of fine than pretty. They are tall, stoutly limbed, with a majestic walk; the nose and upper lip beautifully formed; the dark eye large and soft, like that of the gazelle, with the long, silken black lashes and magnificently arched eyebrows. The hair is parted in the centre, gathered into several plaits behind, which are again collected into one and worked with worsted into a tail reaching to the ankles. A red or white fillet is bound round the head, and the dress consists of a large, wollen, loose frock of red color; this reaches a little below the knee, and sometimes they gather it round the loins with a white scarf. At a little

TRURO BEACH, MASSACHUSETTS.

RAILROADS IN EUROPE.

The great railroad line from Paris to Marseilles, a distance of 335 miles, is now completed, except the bridges at Lyons, across the two rivers, the Saône and the Rhône, at the junction of which the city stands. These bridges, when finished, will be as fine specimens of workmanship as can be anywhere found. The one across the Rhône is already nearly done—built of cast iron—and it presents a most beautiful and picturesque view, as seen from a point about half a mile above it. The piers of the bridge across the Saône are now building in water forty or fifty feet deep. Great cylinders of cast iron are first planted on the bottom of the river—by some means, I know not how—which reach above the surface of the water. From these the water is pumped out, and the workmen descend in them as in a well, and carry on the work of rearing the piers from the bottom of the river. This bridge across the Saône is approached by a tunnel five or six miles in length! How far it is below the surface of the earth I cannot tell. But it is no uncommon thing in this country to travel for a mile or two at a time through a tunnel, and that, too, at the rate of about forty miles per hour. But the railroads in this country are so delightful! There is scarcely any perceptible motion. The roads are beautifully graded, and then covered with pebbles or small fragments of rock pounded in so as to make them firm. The sides of the embankments are turfed. The tracks are always double, so that there is no danger of a collision. The coaches are elegant, and the whole management of the roads is conducted with the strictest reference to the convenience, comfort and safety of the passengers. Travelling by rail in England, and especially on the continent, is much more pleasant, and vastly safer than in the United States. The express, and the direct trains, as they are called, make but few stoppages on the long routes, and ordinarily not more than one or two minutes at a station. Then everything is so quiet. There is no bustle nor noise at the station. In obtaining tickets, but one person can approach at the same time, and he must get his change and retire before another can apply. In a word, there is perfect system about everything. The coaches are not like ours. They are divided into apartments that resemble elegantly furnished private carriages. On the continent there are eight seats in these apartments; in England only six. The first class on the continent is far superior, in point of comfort, to the first class in England. In England they have no means of warming the coaches in cold weather. In France they warm them by means of cylinders of hot water, which are changed two or three times during the night or day. They keep the coach very comfortable. How unlike are these careful and thorough regulations to those generally enforced on the railroad routes in this country, where comfort is often sacrificed to speed.—New Yorker.

WINDMILL NEAR HIGHLAND LIGHT, TRURO, MASS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

IMPROMPTU.

[On returning the ashes of documents dedicating me to Ambition.]

BY DIANOR D'ARTOISE.

Ha! there's Fame's winding-sheet! gaze on it now!
 Methinks the flames are writhing round my brow.
 I send thee embers! the mere earthly part;
 Their spirit message burns upon my heart.
 Soft, magic lines—that wake the spirit lyre;
 Wild, burning lines—that set the heart on fire!
 Behold the dregs!—the cup is drained full well;
 Yet am I sane, the thrilling tale to tell.
 Thou deemest not oblivion fanned the fire?
 Nor canst thou truly view the act with ire!
 Again I say—my lyre is not for fame;
 And when I die—then with me dies my name!
 I burn thy missives! with them—burn the lays
 That wake within my soul such hankering after praise.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE RIVAL LOVERS.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

THE unclouded moon of a June night was shedding its radiance over a rocky cliff, which frowned darkly on the waters of a stream which washed its base. A well-beaten footpath passed over the brow of the cliff, and about midway, springing from its scanty soil, was a clump of bushes.

A little before nightfall, a man, apparently about twenty-five, who, although not wearing the garb of a sailor, showed by his swart visage and the peculiarity of his gait, that his home was on the deep, walked rapidly along the path, which, for a considerable distance, previously to reaching the cliff, passed over an open plain. He did not slacken his pace till he reached the summit of the cliff, where grew the bushes. He then stopped, and with looks of eagerness peered through the gathering gloom, in the direction he had just come. As he stood, the outlines of his lithe though muscular figure were clearly defined against the western sky, from which the red glow of sunset had not yet entirely faded. Even his handsome, well-cut features could be seen in profile, though not the sinister expression which marred their beauty.

"I am certainly in season—he cannot yet have passed," said he to himself, and after carefully scanning the landscape on every side, he crouched down behind the bushes in such a manner that they would have concealed him from the view of any one who might approach the spot, even without the aid of the increasing darkness.

Minute after minute crept away, but the stillness remained unbroken.

"He is a laggard, and I wish I could say a coward," he muttered impatiently, as compressing the spring of his gold repeater, he found that an hour and fifteen minutes had passed, since he had been on the watch. He half rose, but quickly shrunk back again, for at that moment he imagined he heard distant and hurried footsteps. He was not mistaken. They came nearer and nearer, nor did the steep ascent scarce check their celerity. He who was lying in wait would already under any circumstances have known them from all others, for love even fails to render the hearing more acute than the bitter and deadly hate by which he was animated. He did not move an inch, until he who was approaching was within three or four paces of where he lay concealed, when he suddenly rose, sprang into the path and confronted him.

"You walk as if you were in a hurry, Phil. Marsden," said he. "If you think so," was the reply, "courtesy will teach you not to attempt to detain me."

"Do you know who I am?"

"I do. He who has once met with Ryan Hinkson won't be likely to forget him. Good evening, sir."

"Softly—softly—not so fast. You leave not this spot, till you promise to make no further attempt to win the affections of Mary Enfield."

"First make it appear by what right you demand such a promise, and I shall be better prepared to give you an answer."

"In the first place, you basely stepped in between her and me, and with your honeyed words stole her heart from me."

"That which was never yours, couldn't be stolen from you."

"Say that again, Phil. Marsden, and you'll be sorry for it!"

"You know it to be the truth, as well as I do. The character of the man Miss Enfield honors with her choice, must not be open to such infamous charges as have been cast upon yours, or if it does, he must not shrink from adopting such measures as will be likely to disprove them."

"I leave it to such as you, to try to silence every vile cur that barks."

"When a man is suspected of sailing under the black flag, if the means of exculpation be within his reach, it can be no disparagement for him to avail himself of them."

"Dare you say that you believe I have been guilty of what you mention?"

"Yes, for I believe it to be the truth."

"And you have tried to make Mary Enfield believe it?"

"For such an attempt there is no occasion. It came to her ears before it did to mine, and if you would avoid getting into trouble, you will leave this neighborhood at once."

"Your advice will be more welcome when it is asked. I shall remain here as long as suits me, and in the meantime, I defy you, or any one else, to prove that I am anything more or less, than the captain of the Sea-Gull, soon to sail for South America, and now lying eight miles below here, where she has been taking in her cargo."

"If you have been slandered, I sincerely hope that it will be made to appear. And, now, once for all, good night. This is an unprofitable discussion, and can result in good to neither of us."

"Is it your intention to call on Mary Enfield?"

"And if so, what then?"

"Simply that you went go there to-night."

"I know of nothing that should prevent me."

"Advance a single step in the direction where she lives, and you are a dead man!"

"That remains to be proved," said Philip Marsden.

Ere the words had left his lips, there was a flash of steel in the bright moonlight, but before the uplifted hand of Ryan Hinkson had had time to descend, the poniard was wrenched from his grasp, and hurled into the stream below.

"You won't escape me so!" exclaimed the ruffian, and exerting his strength to the utmost, he attempted to push Philip over the edge of the cliff.

For a few moments, the struggle was a fearful one, and he seemed likely to effect his purpose; but at the instant Philip felt that his strength was forsaking him, with a desperate effort he shook himself free, at the moment he had again dragged him to the very verge of the precipice. This triumph of strength on the part of Philip having been unlooked for, Hinkson was off his guard. He had no time to plant his feet more firmly, and the frantic attempt he made to clutch at a sapling, when by the sudden recoil he found himself swayed downwards over the brow of giddy descent, proved unavailing. There was a wild, piercing cry, a sullen plunge, and then all was still.

Philip crept to the edge of the precipice and looked down, but the black shadows, thrown half across the stream, rendered the darkness impenetrable. He loudly and repeatedly called Hinkson by name, but received no answer. As the cliff sloped inward towards its base, offering no projection against which he could have struck as he fell, he could not think that he was anything more than stunned, and if so, there was not a moment to lose. At a short distance, the bold shore dropped abruptly down almost to a level with the water. There in the morning he had moored a small boat, and thither he now hastened with the celerity of one who felt that a human life depended on his speed.

It was the work of only a few moments to unfasten the boat and propel it to the place where Ryan Hinkson fell; but the water sleeping in the shadows of the cliff, presented a dark, unbroken surface, which the eye could not penetrate. At a little distance down the stream, there was a small cave, the entrance to which lay basking in the moonlight, though all beyond was hidden by a thick copse which lined the shore. As the eye of Philip was for a moment directed towards the mouth of the cave, some dark object glided like a shadow from the sparkling expanse and was lost to view. It must have been a boat, he thought, and yet, he knew of no other, except the one he was in, which belonged in the neighborhood.

It was useless to remain longer where he was, for without doubt, Hinkson, stunned by the fall, had at once sunk beneath the waves. His first impulse, as he sprang to the shore and secured his boat, was to seek for those who would assist in searching for the body, and make known to them the particulars of what had taken place. But he was withheld by a sudden fear. Ryan Hinkson, as was well known to all in that vicinity, had done his best to supplant him in the affections of Mary Enfield, and though he had been unsuccessful, he had publicly boasted, that if his life was spared, she would never be the wife of Philip Marsden.

Though Philip had been called away on business before Ryan Hinkson's arrival, and had only two days previously returned, he had already been apprised of all this, as well as the bitter taunts and reproaches which the rival lover had heaped upon him, on account of what he pleased to term his underhanded attempts to gain Mary Enfield's love, who, he said, as Marsden undoubtedly well knew, had, when they were children, promised to be his wife. This was true, for Ryan, a handsome, bold and fearless boy, was during childhood her constant playmate, and in one of his imperious moods, which frightened and overawed his gentle companion, he had really exacted from her such a promise. Though at the time she was frightened at his violence, she subsequently thought of it as only a part of the play, for he was accustomed to act the tyrant, and when at the age of nineteen, she herself being five years younger, he decided to go abroad and seek his fortune, she experienced a sense of relief which she could not disguise.

When three years afterwards Philip Marsden became her accepted lover, she certainly did not consider herself under any obligations to the bold and overbearing youth, whom she had not heard from since his departure. It was after an absence of full five years, no one knew whither, that he suddenly made his appearance, as the captain of a merchantman, he said; but it was whispered from one to another, that neither the rakish-looking craft of which he was the commander, nor the reckless, outlandish-looking men composing the crew, made good his assertion, any more than the quality of merchandise of which the cargo consisted. It was certainly, for the most part, of the choicest and costliest quality, and several articles ornamented with embroidery so rich and delicate as to make them worth more than their weight in gold, had been literally forced upon Mary Enfield by Ryan; for as she refused to accept them, he had contrived to leave them in some place, where after he was gone, they would be sure to meet her eye. He imagined that he was sufficiently acquainted with the tastes of the sex, to know that they would exert a silent eloquence in his behalf. They doubtless had their attractions for Mary, the same as they would have possessed in the eyes of any other handsome girl of eighteen, though when weighed against the suggestions of prudence, they were not powerful enough to induce her to appropriate any of them; not even a pearl necklace of such rare beauty, that a duchess might have coveted it.

As has been said, Philip Marsden was assailed by a sudden fear, for he had been indiscreet enough, after listening to Ryan's boast that Mary Enfield should never, while he himself lived, be the wife of Philip, as to say that he had better look to himself then. It certainly, as he was now aware, sounded like a threat, though in reality it was merely an idle outbreak of passion, such as persons of an ardent temperament will sometimes indulge in, and to which they attach little or no meaning. His words, he imagined, would doubtless be remembered by others as well as himself, so that few would be willing to believe that Ryan's fall from the cliff was accidental.

So much time would be consumed before he could procure the necessary assistance, that even if the body could be found, it would be too late to restore vitality. The only way he could, to prevent suspicion from being directed against himself, was to remain silent. Even to Mary, he would not breathe a word of what had taken place, who during all this time had been impatiently expecting him, he having found means to let her know that he had returned.

When she first took her seat at the open window, looking out on a smooth, green lawn in front of the house, the shadows of a few majestic oaks were thrown nearly across it; but they had continued to creep along towards the trees, silently and steadily, and now would soon gather themselves up beneath their branches. She started, bent forward with an eager look and listened. In a few moments she fell back into her former attitude.

"It was nothing," she murmured to herself—"nothing but my own imagination. If I only knew what that wild and frightful cry meant."

She was mistaken in thinking it nothing but imagination, for the words had scarcely left her lips, when, emerging from a part of the path which had been concealed by some shrubbery, into the moonlight, she saw some one coming. It needed no second look to tell her that it was Philip Marsden. He advanced with hurried, unequal steps, and instead of approaching the door, turned aside from the path and went directly up to the window. He looked pale and haggard, an appearance which was heightened by the white moonlight which shone into his face.

"What makes you so late this evening, after having kept away two whole days since you returned?" said Mary. "But I see now—you are unwell."

"What makes you think so?"

"You look pale."

"Do I? Hark! Did you hear that?"

"Yes."

"What did it sound like?"

"I can hardly tell, but it seemed to me as if some person hailed another who was at a considerable distance."

"Did you know the voice?"

"No, I don't think I ever heard it before."

"I thought it sounded like Ryan Hinkson's."

"It wasn't his—I am certain it wasn't."

"No, I might have known it couldn't have been his."

"You have seen him since he returned?"

"Yes, a dozen times, though he wasn't always aware of it."

"Have you seen him to-night?"

"No—rather I did see him for a few minutes."

"Where?"

"Why should you care where I met him?"

"I was thinking of that wild cry I heard a while ago. It appeared to me to proceed from the cliff."

"Whose voice was it?"

"I couldn't tell. I thought it might be yours. At any rate, it sounded like a cry of distress, and just as you appeared in sight, I was on the point of going to see if I could ascertain the cause of it."

"It was the cry of a loon—nothing more."

"No, I can distinguish between the cry of a human voice and that of a bird. But who is that coming this way at so late an hour? I hope it isn't Ryan Hinkson."

Philip turned and saw a man hastily approaching. At first sight of him, he experienced an emotion of joy, for he thought it might be Ryan, who after all, had escaped drowning. He soon saw that he was mistaken, for the man he saw coming was shorter and stouter.

"I don't know who it is," said Philip, "but, of course, you would rather he wouldn't come here, and I see no way to prevent it, unless I go to meet him."

He turned away abruptly without waiting for her to reply, for the man was already within a short distance of the house.

"I was right in supposing I should find you somewhere about here," said he, stopping short, as Philip met him. "I have a few words to say, which it will be well for you to listen to."

"Very well, I am ready to hear you."

"I am first mate of the Sea-Gull, and I was a witness to what took place on the cliff. There was one with me who witnessed it too, and in less than an hour from now, unless you make your escape, you will be arrested for the murder of Capt. Hinkson."

"But he fell accidentally. I would have saved him if it had been in my power."

"That will be more easily asserted than believed. I am myself inclined to think that you speak the truth, while on the other hand, the man who was with me is willing to make oath that after stabbing him with what he took for a dagger, as it glittered in the moonlight, you pushed Hinkson over the cliff. Be that as it may, he sunk to the bottom as if he had been so much lead."

"And you, near at hand, yet made no attempt to save him?"

"What good would it have done? We knew if there'd been any life in him, the moment he touched the water he would have swum like a duck."

"The body will be found in the morning, and then it will be seen that he received no wound either from knife or dagger."

"You are mistaken in thinking it will be found. The chances against it are more than a hundred to one. The river has a strong current, and there will be time for it to be carried out to sea between this and morning. But all this is to no purpose. Unless you have a fancy for occupying a felon's cell, you had better be casting about for some means of escape."

"It will not be of any use. I know of no place of concealment, and I cannot meet any one within a dozen miles of here, to whom I'm not personally known."

"The night will take care of that. People will be in their beds. I know of a place where you will be safe."

"Where is that?"

"On board the Sea-Gull. We are in want of more men, and if I'm not out in my reckoning, you would make as good a sailor as ever walked a deck. We are all ready for sea, and by midnight the Gull will spread her white wings to the breeze. Come, there's no time for hesitation. You must decide at once, either to leave this place, or stay and abide the consequences."

"A place that is disreputable, can hardly be a safe one."

"I should imagine that the forecastle of so fine a craft as the Sea-Gull would be quite as reputable, and altogether as safe, as the place where you will be obliged to take up your quarters, if you remain here."

There was a sharp and painful struggle in Philip's mind as he thought of Mary Enfield, but the disgrace of the dark crime, which seemed likely to be proved against him if he remained where he was, and which in all probability must be expiated by an ignominious death, soon determined his indecision. He was guiltless, and it was his duty, he believed, to spare himself as well as Mary, the unutterable anguish and terror which must result from remaining where he was. He might, he imagined, if the Sea-Gull proved to be the kind of vessel he feared, soon find some means of escape, while his sudden disappearance, great as might be the anxiety and sorrow it might occasion his betrothed, would be as dust in the balance, when weighed against what must arise from the realization of the revolting and terrible picture which had stamped itself upon his imagination.

"I will go with you," said he, turning to the man who stood at his side.

"That is right; and ten or a dozen years hence, when this unpleasant affair shall have blown over, you can, if you will, return."

"I shan't care to return then," said he, speaking to himself, rather than his companion. "I have neither parents, brothers nor sisters, and there will be no one living then, who will care to see me."

June, in her gorgeous robes, her tresses braided with sunbeams, and her hand still clasped in the dewy fingers of spring, was advancing with timid steps, and with her smiles, warming into richer and more luxuriant life the wide-spread landscape. Mary Enfield was sitting at the same window, where a year previously she sat, when she saw Philip Marsden for the last time. She had not heard a word from him since then. She believed him to be dead, for if he had not been, he surely would have found means to send her some message, either written or verbal.

Six months after Philip's disappearance, Ryan Hinkson made her a visit. This put an end to the fears, which at times she found it impossible to banish, that there had been a quarrel between Philip and him, and that he had fallen by her lover's hand. Hinkson either did not, or pretended not to know anything relative to his former rival. But Mary had no faith in his protestations, and when he renewed his suit, she turned from him with such undisguised abhorrence, that he found, although he no longer had a rival to contend with, his chance of success appeared even more hopeless than formerly.

As has been mentioned, Mary was sitting at the same window, where she sat when she for the last time saw Philip Marsden. As memory dwelt sadly on the incidents of that evening, she saw a man approaching the house, by the path crossing the fields and pastures, which Philip had always been accustomed to take. Her heart gave a sudden bound, for the thought flashed into her mind that he had returned. She rose, and leaned eagerly forward from the window. She listened, for there was no moon, and the ear would be truer than the eye. The step was quick and eager, but it was not Philip Marsden's—worse still, it was Ryan Hinkson's. She drew back, and with a feeling of hopeless anguish, sank into her chair.

"Well, my pretty Mary," said he, coming up to the window and leaning his arms on the sill, "I think you have had plenty of time to forget that renegade lover of yours."

"Even if I have," she replied, "it will make your presence none the more welcome."

"What if I should tell you that I had seen him since I was here last?"

"Have you seen him? Do you mean what you say?"

"I have seen him."

"Then he is alive?"

"He was a few months since, though it would have been better for himself if he had been dead. He had leagued himself with a set of lawless men, and will never dare show his head here again, if he should live to be a hundred."

"That, as well as the rest of what you have said, is as false as your own black heart!" said a voice close by his side.

"Philip!"

Mary rose as she pronounced the name, and extended both hands towards him who had so suddenly made his appearance. But she drew back at the sight of several men who were standing just back of Philip Marsden.

"Mary, you have nothing to fear," said he, and then turning round, he addressed one of the men. "This," said he, "is Ryan Hinkson, the Pirate Captain!"

Hinkson, the moment he comprehended that he whom Philip addressed was there for the purpose of arresting him, attempted to escape. He was swift of foot and seemed likely to succeed, when all at once he faltered, and just as they came up with him stumbled and fell forward on his face. One of the men raised him up, and found that he had broken a blood vessel.

"I've only a few minutes to live," said he, speaking with difficulty, for the blood was gushing from his mouth. "Let me lie here on the turf. Where is Mary?"

"She shall be called," said Philip, who had hastened to the spot when he saw him fall.

"I am here, Ryan," said she, drawing near to the place where he lay supported by one of the men.

"I've caused you a great deal of grief and anxiety," said he, "but I shall cause you no more. I have tried to injure Philip Marsden, and more than once, have attempted to take his life. My wicked designs have been frustrated, and I am glad that they have been. I have accused him of what he was never guilty of. He is good and honorable, and in every respect worthy of you. May you be happy together. As respects myself, I have only one request to make. Bury me near the sea—so near that its voice can be heard in sunshine, as well as in the storm."

"Your request shall be complied with," said Philip.

"And if you and Mary should ever visit the spot, do not curse me, but—"

The next word died away into an indistinct murmur, and the man who supported him, withdrawing his arm, and suffering him to sink back on the turf, said:

"No is dead!"

One day, full six years after the foregoing incidents, Philip and Mary, who had long been cheered by the light of their own hearthstone, stood together in the shadows of some tall pines, in whose branches the wind answered to the moaning of the sea. They were watching a bright-haired boy, who, a few minutes before, had left them, and was at a little distance, gathering shells on the smooth, hard beach, edged with foam, where the flowing tide broke with a low, soft murmur.

Suddenly a small boat shot from out a cove, scarce a stone's throw distant. Its only occupant was a stranger, whose sunburnt countenance showed that he must have long been exposed to the influence of a tropical sun. Rowing swiftly to a place nearly opposite where Philip and Mary Marsden stood, he sprang ashore, and pulling his boat on to the sand so that it could not float, approached them. He raised his hat, bowed, and addressed Philip:

"What is the meaning of that green mound, just back of you, I saw here a few hours since?" said he.

"It is the Pirate's Grave," replied Philip.

"And that pirate was Ryan Hinkson?"

"Yes."

"You don't remember me?"

"I do not."

"I was once the first mate of the Sea Gull. When you made your escape from the vessel, I saw you, and could have prevented you, but I suffered you to go, and raised no alarm. I soon afterwards escaped myself, and since then I have led a better life."

"I am glad to hear it—hearty glad," said Philip, "and hope you will continue to do so. It is time for us to go home now—the sun is getting low. Will you go with us?"

"I should like to, but my course lies in a different direction. I know that Hinkson was buried somewhere hereabouts, and thought that I should like to look upon the grave of one whose tempting tongue caused me to leave an honest life for one beset with danger and stained with crime. Farewell to you, and the lady. We shall never meet again."

As he passed the little Philip, who was still playing on the beach, he stopped and laid his rough hand on his sunny curls. Mary sprang forward a few steps, saying, as she did so:

"What if he should take him and carry him away?"

Her alarm was only momentary. He passed on, as the words left her lips, and in a few moments more, was gliding swiftly over the summer sea.

A MISSISSIPPI STEAMBOAT.

There is a good reason why it is built with so little depth of hold. It is to allow the boats to pass the short water in many parts of the river, and particularly during the season of drought. For such purpose, the lighter the draught the greater the advantage; and a Mississippi captain, boasting of the capacity of his boat in this respect, declared, that all he wanted was a heavy dew on the grass to enable him to propel her across the prairies! If there is little of a Mississippi steamboat under the water, the reverse is true of what may be seen above its surface. Fancy a two-story house, some two hundred feet in length, built of plank, and painted to the whiteness of snow; fancy along the upper story a row of green latticed windows, thickly set, and opening out upon a narrow balcony; fancy a flattened or slightly rounded roof, covered with tarred canvass, and in the centre a range of skylights, like glass forcing-pumps; fancy, towering above all, two enormous black cylinders of sheet iron, each ten feet in diameter, and nearly ten times as high, the funnels of the boat; a small cylinder on one side, the "scape pipe"; a tall flagstaff standing up from the extreme end of the prow, with the "star-spangled banner" flying from its peak—fancy these, and you may form some idea of the characteristic features of a steamboat on the Mississippi.—Capt. M. Myne Reid's Quodiam.

COURTING IN SPAIN.

Should you have occasion of a nightfall, to traverse the dimly lighted streets, you will not go far without brushing past a figure muffled in an ample cloak, and with the sombrero slouched over the eyes, leaning against the iron bars. As you pass, your ears inform you that it is conversing in a low voice with some one within, whom the darkness shrouds from observation. In all probability you will take no further note of the whispering pair; but if you be more curious than wise, and bestow on them more than a passing look, another well-dressed figure will probably step out from some corner, and politely request you to refrain from interfering with other people's business. If this hint be not sufficient, he will prepare to enforce it by other means, and, by displaying his navaja, threaten to appeal to arms. He is engaged in one of the most sacred duties of Spanish friendship. To guard from danger or discovery—or, as it is termed, "guardar las espaldas,"—to guard the back of a friend who may be playing the lover—is an office to be undertaken only by a tried comrade, whose devotion and courage may be proof against the rude trials to which such a position subjects him. If the fair one be noted for her attractions, then there are rivals to be encountered, whose jealous passions, if aroused by witnessing another thus engaged, nothing would so soon appear as a thrust of a knife, given, as may be supposed, without much regard to the rules of fair play. Under these circumstances, the second is summoned to stand, like the knight of old, ready to do battle against all comers, should they approach with hostile intentions. I need not add, that these nocturnal meetings are a frequent occasion of brawls, and that lives are sometimes lost, and usually dangerous wounds are given and received, when the knife is brought into play. This custom, though more prevalent among the lower classes, is not entirely banished from the upper ranks of society. In truth, the mystery and romance attending it have too many charms for Spanish lovers of every degree, ever to permit it to become the exclusive usage of any one rank in life. It is far more congenial to his temperament to throw a veil of secrecy over his attachment, which not unfrequently from the first, wears a certain air of romance. On the Alameda he encounters some dark-eyed beauty, whose glance fires all the susceptible nature of his southern bosom. To follow her footsteps when the gay throng disperses—to linger in the narrow street where her home is—and, by one of those mute but expressive signs known in southern climes, to testify his passion to her as she sits at the balcony that commands a full view of the moving world in the street—or to convey a message by some Mercury familiar with such errands—are the usual steps that precede an interview. This, however, let it not be imagined, is to be sought amidst the shady alleys of the Alameda. No; the fair ones of Spain are too jealously guarded by maids and duchesses, ever to know much of solitude, far less to enjoy them with a companion. But when gates are barred, and the household wrapped in sleep, it is then that the Spanish maiden rises to keep her tryst with her lover.—Murray's Cities and Ways of Andalusia.

LEARNING TO SING.

It is common for teachers of sacred music to maintain the doctrine, that all men, without any exception, can if they will, learn to sing. The following statement, made by Bishop Le Laney, recently at a meeting of the Trustees of the General (Episcopal) Theological Seminary, discloses a case which by no means stands alone. Attendance on musical instruction would not benefit everybody. When he was a young man at Yale College, he heard a sermon preached there, which declared it to be the duty of every man to learn to sing. He accordingly went to a singing-master, who, after some lessons, gave him up, telling him, "Sir, you have no ear!" (Laughter.) Fearing, however, that it might be incompetency on the part of the teacher, he went to another, who tried him patiently for some time, but at length told him one day, "My dear sir, I do not wish to hurt your feelings, but, really, I do not think it worth your while to go on, you have no voice." (Laughter.) Still remembering the fervent exhortations of the sermon, and determined to try once more, he went to a third, who concluded his exertions with the testy, but perfectly correct declaration, "Sir, you have neither voice nor ear, and can never learn music if you should live to the age of Methuselah." (Loud laughter.) We may add, that one of the most eloquent preachers of our country had much the same experience. He studied patiently for several months with a skilful teacher, but at length the teacher gave it up, declaring it was useless to attempt to give him any practical knowledge of the musical scale.—Christian Intelligencer.

ROSES.

The most famous roses were those of Pæstum and Samos, happy localities, where the rose-trees bloomed twice every year. The tallest rose-tree we ever heard of, is the one at Sans Souci, and was thirty feet high; but it was trained against a wall, which certainly diminishes the wonder. To plant the tree in ancient times served for ends that are attained now in various ways—it commemorated the dead, celebrated events, illustrated anniversaries, and had many pleasant significations besides. Whole ship-loads of roses were brought to Rome. There were shops in which nothing else was sold; and the artistically-woven garlands were held in such esteem, and the garland-makers in such honor, that the name of Glycera, of Sicyon, has survived as that of a celebrated artist, with whom, however, we imagine Constantine would not be afraid to enter into competition. Glycera, we must add, was so peculiarly admired, as well as generally celebrated, that her lover painted her portrait, and Lucullus gave no less than £300 sterling for a copy of it.—Notes and Queries.

ONE DOLLAR. WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

- There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.
- Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.
- Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.
- It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.
- In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.
- It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.
- Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.
- Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.
- Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies.
- Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers an eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass

SETH CHENEY, THE ARTIST.

We present on this page a faithful portrait of this artist, from the pencil of Barry, drawn expressly for us from a photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case of this city. The recent decease of Cheney, at the age of fifty, has not only plunged a circle of friends in mourning, but has left a sensible void in the domain of art. He died at Manchester, in this State, whither he has recently erected a convenient studio, in which he hoped to continue those fine crayon drawings which had established his fame, and also to essay a branch of art new to him—painting in oil. We are not aware that his life embraced any of those striking vicissitudes which enable the biographer to impart to a truthful narrative the fascination of romance. As a man, Cheney was known and respected for his moral purity and worth; and we have heard that he declined employing his talents in perpetuating the features of any person, however high in station, whose character did not command his respect. He was a careful and constant student of nature, but he was also familiar with all that art had accomplished in the course of time. A residence abroad gave him an opportunity of studying the master-pieces of art contained in the great European galleries, and also of examining the processes adopted by the best living artists. No man was better acquainted with the literature and theory of art. He did not fall into the common error that patient labor is unnecessary to the development of genius. On the other hand, he believed that genius imposed the necessity of labor. The effects he produced by light and shade alone, without the aid of color, appeared marvellous to those who are not aware that the simplest materials are most effective in the creative hand of genius. Though Mr. Cheney's efforts were confined to portraiture in crayon alone, yet his portraits deserved to rank with those of Stuart, and Copley, and Vandyke. His heads have their characteristics: they are not simply delineations of external form, but of character. He was equally successful with male, with female and with children's heads. His crayon portraits do not challenge attention by elaborate detail in the finishing—they are lightly shaded, and very delicately and openly lined, but every touch has a purpose and an expression. No other hand could add a line without marring the noisy and exquisite harmony of his work. Everything that came from the hand of Cheney was a gem, and the drawings he left behind him will be cherished by their possessors as among the choicest treasures of art. It is pleasant to know that his talent was highly appreciated, and that his labors commanded large and remunerative prices. In his branch of art he was certainly without a rival.

THE GIPSY CAMP.

The engraving given below delineates a part of a camp of English gypsies, with a dark-eyed and dark-skinned daughter of the tribe crouching in front of one of the tents. The artist has well depicted the wild, dishevelled beauty of the gypsy, with the air of cunning almost always inseparable from her expression. These Bohemians generally pitch their tents in scenes of the most exquisite rural beauty—not, perhaps, from a peculiar taste for the beauties of nature, but because their needs require wood and water, and these are rarely unpicturesquely blended. The gypsies, Bohemians, Zingari, or by whatever other names they are known, preserve their characteristics under whatever clime they pitch their tents, and however widely discovered their branches. As they never or rarely marry out of their circle, the physical type, brilliantly oriental, is preserved in all its purity, and their peculiar language, with some local modifications, is the same all over the world. The English gypsy girl speaks a dialect which is intelligible to her dark sister on the banks of the Ganges or the Nile. This language is purely oral, yet a distinguished German servant—we forget his name—has actually reduced it to writing, and published a dictionary and language of the gypsy tongue, so that any young gentleman with a moderate amount of industry can learn to “patter Romany,” if he thinks the accomplishment worth acquiring. The gypsies have many curious and poetical traits, but they are by no means desirable acquaintances. To cajole and to thieve is their regular business. We know not how much honesty they may show in their dealings with each other, but certainly they glory in fleecing the Philistines or outsiders. A year or two since, a colony of English gypsies landed at New York, but we know not whether they are still sojourning in the “home of the brave and the land of the free,” but we do know that they succeeded in “doing” a shrewd Yankee farmer out of a considerable sum of money, by pretending to put him in the way of stolen treasure. Yet gypsies are very useful people—in novels and on the stage, where they run off with noblemen's and princes' children, who turn up in the nick of time to possess immense estates and the like.

THE LATE SETH CHENEY, ARTIST.

AN IRISH DUELLIST.

Pat Power, of Daragla, was a fat, robust man, much distinguished for his intemperance, and generally seen with a glowing red face. He on one occasion fought with a fire-eating companion named Bill Brisco. When taking aim, he said he still had a friendship for him, and would show it; so he only shot off his whisker and top of his ear. When travelling in England, Power had many encounters with persons who were attracted by his brogue and clumsy appearance. On one occasion, a group of gentlemen were sitting in a box at one end of the room when he entered at the other. The representative of Irish manners at this time on the English stage was a tissue of ignorance, blunders and absurdities; and when a real Irishman appeared off the stage, he was always supposed to have the characteristic of his class, and so a fair butt for ridicule. When Power took his seat in the box, the waiter came to him with a gold watch, with a gentleman's compliments, and a request to know what o'clock it was by it. Power took the watch, and then directed the waiter to let him know the person who sent it. He pointed out one of the group. Power rang the bell for his servant, and directed him to bring his pistols and follow him. He put them under his arm, and, with the watch in his hand, walked up to the box, and, presenting the watch, begged to know to whom it belonged. When no one was willing to own it, he drew his own silver one from his fob, and presenting it to his servant, desiring him to keep it; and putting up the gold one, he gave his name and address, and assured the company he would keep it safe till called for. It was never claimed. On another occasion he ordered supper; and while waiting for it, he read the newspaper. After some time, the waiter laid two covered dishes on the table; and when Power examined their contents, he found they were two dishes of smoking potatoes. He asked the waiter to whom he was indebted for such good fare; and he pointed to two gentlemen in the opposite box. Power desired his servant to attend him, and, directing him in Irish what to do, quietly made his supper of the potatoes, to the great amusement of the Englishmen. Presently his servant appeared with two more covered dishes, one of which he had laid down before his master, and the other before the persons in the opposite box. When the covers were removed, there was found in each a loaded pistol. Power took up his and cocked it, telling one of the others to take up the second, assuring him “they were at a very proper distance for a close shot, and if one fell, he was ready to give satisfaction to the other.” The parties immediately rushed out without waiting for a second invitation, and with them several persons in the adjoining box. As they were all in too great a hurry to pay their reckoning, Power paid it for them along with his own.—Ireland Sixty Years Ago.

A WITTY RETORT.

On the day of the baptism of the imperial infant in Paris, a number of ladies were standing behind the ranks of the National Guard, on the line of the procession to the church of Notre Dame, when the Guards, getting tired of the long delay, lit their cigars, and soon the whole line was in a smoke. Some of the ladies began to complain of the smoke. An old soldier, turning around, said, with a smile: “Then they don't smoke in your regiment?” A charming little Parisienne wittily replied: “In our regiment? Sometimes; but never in my company!”—Galvani.

A GIPSY CAMP—AN ENGLISH SCENE.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE MEMORY OF LITTLE SUSIE.

BY CAROLINE WHITWELL.

Our little Susie slumbers
In a dreamless sleep,
And she will never waken
To see the grieved who weep

Locked the lips and eyelids
Of the pale face fair,
For Death has now our darling—
He clasps the treasure rare.

And to his silent chambers,
Hung with gloom and night,
He bids us bear the loved one,
And shut her from our sight.

Yet we enshrine but ashes,
Laying her away,
The light still lives and lingers
To never know decay.

Tender care can do no more,
Love its all has given,
Gazing still a last farewell,
We leave her now to Heaven.

Place the pure and infant form
'Neath the flowery sod,
While hope and faith are whispering,
The spirit dwells with God.

The little ones are loaned us;
Taking them to our breast,
We enshrine them in our hearts,
And dream as mortals blest.

But Death speeds on his mission,
Ere we heed his tread,
He has seized his precious burden,
And with it heavenward fled.

O Life! we muse and ponder
Thy mysteries o'er and o'er
All in vain—'tis still the same—
Ever a hidden lore.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LOVE AND DUTY.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

WHEN Mr. Danforth married Lucy Earle, he pompously said to a friend that it would have been very great presumption in her friends to expect such a match for her, a poor, obscure little school-mistress.

"But I overlooked her circumstances," he added, "and I flatter myself that she knows and feels the distance between us on that point too well ever to allow her family to presume upon the connection."

Lucy Earle's father was a gentleman—a gentleman in the best and truest sense of the word. He was poor, it is true, but no man had ever found Walter Earle deficient in politeness or self-respect. He wore his threadbare coat with an air as dignified as if it had been an emperor's, and he bowed more respectfully to the gray hairs of a beggar in the street than he did to those of Mr. Danforth. For, truth to tell, Mr. Danforth was originally a low, mean man, and his rising in wealth and power had only cast a little gold dust in the eyes of those who worship wealth, even when unaccompanied by worth.

Mr. Earle was a schoolmaster, on a slender salary, in a country town. Mr. Danforth owned a summer residence there, and in one of his seasons of leisure, he had been attracted by the uncommon loveliness of four sisters, who passed and re-passed his house every day, as he afterwards found, to give certain lessons assigned to each in their father's school. He had condescendingly made their acquaintance, and had successively offered to Jane, Kate and Matilda his fortune and hand. He had no heart, and they knew it; and it was almost with a thrill of horror that they learned from their father that he had asked consent to pay his addresses to Lucy, the youngest, and many thought, the loveliest of Mr. Earle's lovely and interesting daughters.

"And does Lucy consent, father?" said Jane, who, having been first on the list of Mr. Danforth's expected wives, felt qualified to open the matter without unnecessary delay.

Almost sadly, Mr. Earle answered:

"Lucy is a child, and Mr. Danforth's carriage and horses are filling her fancy completely, and then his town house and country house! And indeed," added he, "what can I do? If she likes him, how can I refuse him? God knows, I do not know what is to become of any of you. I am dying, Jane. A few months longer and you will have no father. Every day finds me weaker, and soon I must give up my school. Dear Jane, will it not be a comfort to me, in dying, to feel that one of you is provided for, and that, if worst comes to worst, you can claim a home surely, in a sister's house?"

"Never, father! No foot of mine shall ever enter the door of that pompous fool, who, having a spite against me and my sisters for refusing him, has absolutely forbidden little Lucy—for I must still call her so—from having any intercourse with us after her marriage, and she, poor, blind, simple child, has promised to obey him."

Mr. Earle gasped for breath.

"Separated you! Jane, is this possible? Can it be that Danforth would do this?"

"Ask Lucy, father. She will tell you."

"No, Jane; I will not ask any one. If this is so, why, let it go on. Lucy, poor child, will soon see her folly."

"My poor father, you had enough to struggle with before, what with poverty and sickness, and a large and unproductive family! How will you bear it, to be separated from her who was so long the pet and darling of us all?"

"Only for a little while will it disturb me, Jane," said her father. "It is for you only that I think how hard it will be. But we will not talk of it. Both are eager for the wedding to take place, and Mr. Danforth urges hard for next week; and if it must be, why, do not let us delay it."

And this was the way in which Lucy Earle, in her beauty and youth, came to be married to the rich Mr. Danforth, who numbered five times her age, and who had nothing but that same wealth to recommend him. It was near winter, so he whirled her off to town, scarcely intending ever to bring her back to her native place again, to be troubled with poor relatives.

The winter commenced cold and blustering, and on Christmas morning, when the bells were ringing for church, and the organ was just pealing out, "For unto you is born this day!" Walter Earle's spirit was born, a new angel, into heaven.

Jane wrote to Lucy, but Mr. Danforth answered the letter, saying, in brief terms, that he could not think of his wife being compelled to travel at so inclement a season, that she was grieved for her father, sent love, etc.

Jane tore his answer in pieces, and stamped upon it. "Cold-hearted, selfish being," she said, to Kate, "to refuse her this, when her heart is longing, no doubt, to be with us! How mean and cruel!"

So Lucy never saw her father, after her wedding day, and the three girls mourned as much for that as for their father's death. In three weeks, they removed from the house which was no longer theirs, and before the spring opened, they had gone to town, and opened a small school in a hired house. They would not go to see Lucy, nor send for her, nor even send to inform her of their coming, but left it to chance to unfold it.

Frequently they saw the carriage which was recognized as Mr. Danforth's driven past, and once they caught a glimpse of Lucy. She wore no mourning, but looked sad and pale.

All day, after this sight, the sisters were wretched about her. They feared that she was ill. Unhappy they knew she must be. How could it be otherwise—tied for life to that tyrannical and pompous being to whom she had sacrificed her youth and beauty, and the affections of her family? The poor girls cried and sobbed through the evening, after their pupils had departed, and retired to dream of their father and of their lost sister.

One day, Lucy came to the door, evidently unconscious that it was their name, although the same, that was engraved there. The simple announcement, "The Misses Earle's Academy for young Ladies," did not suggest a passing thought that they could be her sisters who taught there. She brought a lady in her carriage, who, it seemed, was looking for a school in which to place a little girl. It was Mr. Danforth's sister, and it was, perhaps, dangerous that she should witness the burst of passionate love and grief that Lucy exhibited. Nature, however, has nothing to do with conventionalities, and she would not be repressed in the embrace of the sisters. It was their first meeting since the death of their dear old father; and even Mrs. Arlingham could not look on unmoved. But she shortened the scene by reminding Lucy that Mr. Danforth was waiting for them, and the obedient wife immediately prepared to depart. She lingered after Mrs. Arlingham had stepped out, to say a few loving and tender words, and to promise to come again alone.

It was a sad pleasure which the sisters felt, in seeing Lucy; they loved her too much to have it other than sad, when they felt how large a barrier separated them.

Lucy exacted, with difficulty, a promise from Mrs. Arlingham that she would not acquaint Mr. Danforth with the fact of her sisters' residence in town. She would prefer his not knowing it, she told her, because he would think it was foolish to spend her time with them. She was not quite candid here, for she did not tell her how much he felt above her family.

So she would pass a stolen hour or two with them, while he was taking his afternoon nap; and recalling old memories, she would seem to be weeping at them, while in reality it was the thought of her own bitter wrongs which she was mourning. He found it out; the fact of her visits was revealed to him by the servant who drove her down often in the one horse carriage. He was amazed that his authority should be set at naught. "Leave your family, or leave me!" was his swelling sentence, uttered in his most grandiose tone. And almost Lucy wished that she could do so. But his riches and position were too weighty to resign without a struggle, and she reflected that, except in this instance, Mr. Danforth had never treated her positively ill. Had she been bound to him by a single tie of love or reverence, her bondage would have been easy; but she was not.

Lucy, however, was not very sensitive. Had it been Jane, it would have been a perpetual martyrdom. To Kate, Mr. Danforth would have been an object of mirth and ridicule; and Matilda would have borne down his grand airs by still grander ones of her own. But Lucy had married him before her character was half formed, and she had nothing but indifference, and a false show of respect which she did not feel, but which the custom of society compelled her to observe, to set against his arbitrary rule.

What wonder, then, was it, that when Alfred Harwood became an inmate of Mr. Danforth's family she should rebel against the fate that had chained her to a man like her husband? He was the son of an old friend of Mr. Danforth, and he availed himself of the opportunity thus offered him, of spending a winter in town.

He had been too close a student for his health, and his father had extorted a promise that he would abandon his books for some months. Lucy was interested in him, at first, on account of his ill health, and then from his evident sympathy with her state of mind. He saw she did not love her husband, as, indeed, how could she?

Her heart was constantly whispering to her, what a different woman she might have been had she not sacrificed her youth as she did. And purely because Alfred Harwood was the only man with whom she had ever been domesticated, or shared any home feeling with, her thoughts were perpetually recurring to him as to the one with whom she might have shared even poverty, and yet have been blessed above all other women.

In the midst of these thoughts, her husband fell ill. Then indeed she showed herself a true woman. Night and day she watched by his side, never leaving him except for the sleep which outraged nature resolved upon claiming. She tended him most faithfully, and even his seared and selfish heart acknowledged her as unrivalled in a sick room.

She was so much afraid that she should not perform her duty to him! She dreaded so much that her feelings toward Alfred Harwood might make her willing to have her husband taken away; in short, there was nothing that the most refined and tender love could have performed for a dearly loved object, that Lucy did not voluntarily perform for Mr. Danforth. He liked, too, to have Alfred near him; and in the quiet hush of the darkened room, the student sat for hours, holding the sick man's hand, and basking his hot forehead.

His pride and haughtiness towards his wife had disappeared. He was as dependent and humble as a child; and Lucy thought often that she could have loved him, despite his age, had he always treated her with the consideration and gentleness due to her youth.

The days thus spent were in reality the happiest she had known. Mr. Danforth was more thoughtful of her comfort, more considerate of her ease, than ever before; and she felt more truly grateful to him for this than she had ever done for his marrying her from her poverty, and raising her to wealth and station.

Not a word nor a look ever betrayed to Alfred Harwood that he had ever been in her dreams; and on his part, he was merely kind and respectful. What was it, then, that prompted Mr. Danforth's thoughts? No one could tell; but as he lay there, subdued and humbled by pain and sickness, looking for sympathy into the eyes of both alternately, a sudden thought sprang to his mind. It returned as often as he awoke, and saw the two sitting apart, each engaged in a different pursuit, and apparently without a thought of each other; for even Lucy's dreams, brought on by her husband's arbitrary sway, were all over.

One would hardly think that a man like Mr. Danforth could be magnanimous, and yet he showed a degree of magnanimity that few could follow. When the sands of life seemed to be fast running out, he told them, separately, that he was dying, and that he wished them to be united, as soon as a decent respect to his memory would permit. He also made his will, giving Lucy his whole property, unreservedly.

Mr. Danforth lingered many weeks after this. Lucy was worn almost to a shadow with watching, and her health seemed to be failing; but she would not forsake the bed of the sufferer. "I have never given him love," she said to Jane, who was now almost constantly in the house, "but I can and will give him duty to the last."

He insisted on Harwood remaining in the family until he should have passed away; and with his last breath, he pressed his hand, as if to assure him that he was glad to leave his wife in his care. Lucy felt thankful that she could have her sisters with her through this scene; and they, with the readiness of sisterly affection, gave up their school to others, during the period of her trial.

"And why not give it up altogether?" said Lucy, one morning, to Jane. "Why should you toil, when I've enough for us all?"

"Do not name it, Lucy. I could not live upon the bounty of any one. I must be free and independent. Let us be glad that we can have the privilege of seeing each other, so long denied to us. When Kate and Matilda are married, I will then give up teaching, and stay alternately with you all; but now you must allow me to continue as I am."

When Mr. Danforth died, Alfred Harwood set out upon his travels. He had really abandoned study, and now proposed to travel for a year, or perhaps longer. At the end of fifteen months he returned, with renovated health and spirits, and a heart devoted to Lucy Danforth.

The life, hitherto so tried by wayward circumstances, seemed to be brightening up as the sun was declining towards the west. People wondered that they had never known Mrs. Danforth's real good qualities before. As Mrs. Harwood, she shone upon them with a new light, not dazzling, but serene.

"Who were those three ladies in mourning at Mrs. Harwood's, last evening?" asked an elderly man of fine appearance, with two young girls hanging around him.

"Papa, those were our teachers," said Caroline and Julia together. "They are the Misses Earle."

"Indeed!" said Mr. Denton. "You must introduce me to-day when I call at your school."

He went; and in less than three months, Jane Earle was situated as happily as Lucy was, and very near her, too.

"At evening time, there shall be light," said Matilda, reverently. Her own life, and that of the merry, laughing Kate, proved this.

"If our dear father were but living to witness the happiness of his children!" said Lucy.

"And can you think that he does not see it, Lucy?" asked Harwood. "I reverently believe that, while the material body is not with us, the spirit is never absent, but ever watching above those whom it loved on earth."

Foreign Items

WHEELER & AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Bayard Street, New York; A. Widen, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 162 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roy, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Buel, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

REPRESENTATION OF A WILD BOAR HUNT IN ALGERIA

[For description, see page 333.]

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM | VOL. XI, No. 22 —WHOLE No. 282.
6 CENTS SINGLE

STATE OF KENTUCKY.

The fine emblematical picture on this page is from the pencil of Billings, and was designed expressly for our Pictorial. In the circle in the centre is delineated a scene in one of the wildest passes of the Mammoth Cave, the greatest natural curiosity in the State, and one of the wonders of the world. On the right is seen one of the world-renowned "Hunters of Kentucky," in his forest garb. On the left are a party of Indians on the war-path. In the lower part of the design is a group of deer, and above, the State arms, representing two citizens joining hands, with a scroll containing the memorable motto, "United we stand, divided we fall." Kentucky was originally included within the limits of Virginia, from which State it was separated in 1786, when it was organized as a territorial government, and so remained until its erection into a State in 1792. No extensive exploration of the State is known certainly to have taken place until about 1770, when the celebrated adventurer, Daniel Boone, penetrated into its then remote and inhospitable wilds. Four years afterwards, a permanent settlement was effected at Harrodsburg, but the early settlers were constantly engaged in fighting the Indians, whose hostile operations gave to the State the title of the "dark and bloody ground," until the conclusion of the treaty with General Wayne in 1795. The State is bounded on the northwest and north by Illinois, Indiana and Ohio (from which it is separated by the Ohio River), east by the Big Sandy River and Cumberland Mountains, dividing it from Virginia, south by Tennessee, and west by the Mississippi River. It includes an area of about 37,680 square miles. In Kentucky are found bituminous coal, iron, lead, freestone, gypsum and other minerals. Salt and medicinal springs are peculiarly numerous in this State. In her climate, Kentucky enjoys a happy medium between the extreme severity of the far Northern States and the extreme heat of the Southern States. In fertility of soil it rivals the most favored parts of the great Mississippi valley. Its staple products are Indian corn, tobacco, flax and hemp, besides which large quantities of wheat, rye, oats, wool, peas, beans, Irish and sweet potatoes, barley, fruits and market products, butter, cheese, hay, grass seeds, maple sugar, beeswax and honey, and some buckwheat, rice, wine, hops, cotton, silk and sugar cane are produced. In 1850, there were 74,777 farms in the State, occupying 5,963,270 acres of improved land. Kentucky, when first settled, was one of the best wooded of the Western States, and boasts of a great variety of forest trees. Cultivated fruits abound here. In 1850, there were in the State 3471 manufacturing establishments, producing goods worth $2,487,493. In January, 1854, there were 233 miles of railroad in operation, and 552 miles in the course of construction, and 486 miles of canal. Kentucky carries on an active trade with New Orleans and other large places on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. Most of her rivers are navigable to a considerable distance for steamboats, and still further for flatboats. In 1854, the State school fund was $1,400,720. There are many colleges and academies in the State. The population is about 1,000,000.

large quantities of wheat, rye, oats, wool, peas, beans, Irish and sweet potatoes, barley, fruits and market products, butter, cheese, hay, grass seeds, maple sugar, beeswax and honey, and some buckwheat, rice, wine, hops, cotton, silk and sugar cane are produced. In 1850, there were 74,777 farms in the State, occupying 5,963,270 acres of improved land. Kentucky, when first settled, was one of the best wooded of the Western States, and boasts of a great variety of forest trees. Cultivated fruits abound here. In 1850, there were in the State 3471 manufacturing establishments, producing goods worth $2,487,493. In January, 1854, there were 233 miles of railroad in operation, and 552 miles in the course of construction, and 486 miles of canal. Kentucky carries on an active trade with New Orleans and other large places on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. Most of her rivers are navigable to a considerable distance for steamboats, and still further for flatboats. In 1854, the State school fund was $1,400,720. There are many colleges and academies in the State. The population is about 1,000,000.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MABEL, THE RECTOR'S WARD:

—OR,—

TRUTH AND TREASON IN 1777.

BY MAJOR BEN: VERLEY POORE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER IX.

THE BANQUET AND THE QUARREL.

"Quick in revenge, and passionately proud,
His brightest hour still shone forth from a cloud;
And none conjecture on the next cold form,—
So played the sunbeam on the verge of storm."

WHILE Herbert was enjoying this interview with the idol of his affections, most of his brother officers were at Davenport's Tavern, dining with Colonel Arnold. He had ordered the best dinner that the house could provide, and the best wines in the cellar sparkled on the table, in company with French brandy, Danish liquors and real old Jamaica rum. The landlord was a great favorite with the sea-captains who sailed from Newburyport, few of whom returned without either bringing some present, or well-executed commission, which added to his stock of beverages.

Colonel Arnold, of course, presided, and distinguished himself by an unusual flow of spirits as he plied his guests with the good things provided for them. His ambition was, while in conversation, to astonish by sudden combinations, and to follow with story after story each one, like the forms of the magical kaleidoscope, of a different cast from its predecessor. Only one guest could at all approach him as a humorist, and that one we have already introduced to our readers. It was Dan Holbrook, the man who so unsuccessfully endeavored to abduct Mabel Gwynne, whose horse-whip mark he yet bore on his face. He was even more flashily dressed than usual, and wore a large diamond ring, though the deep mourning of his finger-nails showed that it was not in its proper place. With Colonel Arnold, however, he was on terms of the most familiar equality, and the two alternately set the table in a roar with their stories, the only faults of which were a horrible profanity, and a total disregard of truth. The conversation at length fell solely into their hands, and after illustrating almost every comical phase of existence with graphic vivacity, Arnold exclaimed: "A truce to tale-telling, Dan! Sing us a song."

"Ay, Benedict. What shall it be?"

"Something lively, man."

"Well, shall I give the glee to which we smashed glasses as an accompaniment, last year, at Albany?"

"No, no, Dan. I have to pay the bill, and the item would not be an agreeable one for my exchequer, the emptiness of which may yet seduce me back to King George and his guineas. So give us something less roystering, more sentimental, and equally bacchanalian."

"You're too deep for me, Benedict. Why not sing a sample?"

"Agreed," responded Colonel Arnold; "so here goes." And he sang in a clear, full voice:

"Then fill the cup to-night—to-night,
For the sun hath sunk away;
And let the wine be bright—the bright,
And that shall rule our day.
For when the disk of Phoebus flies,
And hides his golden head,
The star of Bacchus then should rise,
To light the world instead."

"Bravo! bravo!" exclaimed the gay set. "Let's drink to Colonel Arnold, and may we soon follow him into Quebec."

Every glass was drained, and amid the clatter of their replacement on the shining table, there was a knock at the door.

"Come in!" shouted Arnold, who felt vain of his musical abilities, and was gratified at the applause just bestowed upon them. But no sooner had his eye rested upon the new-comer, than the self-satisfied smile was clouded by an ungracious, angry expression.

"So," he said, "our quarter-master is in the land of the living, after all! I sent to your room this morning, sir, to inform you that I had a desire to converse with you."

"I was with the Rifles, colonel," calmly replied Herbert.

"Surely that was where I should be?"

"The Rifles, ha!" retorted Arnold, with a smile which served to render his countenance almost diabolical in expression. "Odds fish, gentlemen, but the Rifles are late on parade."

Herbert's face flushed, but the gallant Morgan came to his relief. "While the Rifles were on parade, Colonel Arnold, Quarter-master Yancey did his duty, and at roll call to-morrow morning, you will find him present. Off duty, his time is his own."

"O, certainly," said Arnold, in a more humble tone. "Take a seat with us, quarter-master, for a few moments. You know the officers present. This gentleman is my friend, Daniel Holbrook, Esq., of New York, dealer in horses, discount of notes and drinker of all potent beverages."

Holbrook rose, and advanced towards Yancey with outstretched hand, but the latter, with a ceremonious bow, took possession of a vacant chair next that of Major Morgan. There was something in Holbrook's appearance that, at the first glance, created a feeling of dislike in the young officer's mind, though he knew not why. Every one has felt, sooner or later, the strange, instantly created power of repulsive antipathy, which, in this case, had no foundation, save an ugly, scoured countenance. Had Herbert known from whom the freshest scar came, and how it was impressed, he could not have felt a more deadly enmity than at once took possession of him.

The slight was noticed. Doubling up his declined hand, Holbrook struck the table with it as he again took his seat, while a black storm of anger swept over his swarthy features, the scars gleaming more intensely red. "Not shake hands with me?" he muttered. "He shall repent that."

But Herbert Yancey took no notice of what was passing at the head of the table, for Morgan was whispering to him that most of the party were just intoxicated enough to be quarrelsome.

"Never fear," replied Herbert; "I am not in a quarrelsome humor."

But hardly had the words escaped his lips, when he heard Colonel Arnold announce: "Fill your glasses, gentlemen. Holbrook has a toast to propose in honor of that rebel belle of Newburyport, the rector's ward."

As Herbert filled his glass, he felt a presentiment that his heart was to be stirred, and his fine eyes streamed fire upon Holbrook, as he rose. Returning the defiant look of the young soldier with a glance of malignant ferocity, he said, with emphasis:

"I give you the health of Mabel Gwynne, ward of the Tory rector of St. Paul's, nor did my arm ever circle a bonnier waist."

"Liar!" shouted Herbert, unable to restrain himself. "Never was Mabel Gwynne's form polluted by the touch of such as you."

"Take this for the word," retorted Holbrook, in a hissing voice of concentrated ire, while as he spoke he seized a bottle from the table, which he hurled at Herbert Yancey's head. But scarce had the missile left the hand which threw it, ere Herbert, with a bound, sprang across the table.

"Yes, liar!" exclaimed he, in a voice of thunder, seizing Holbrook's throat with a vice-like grasp, and tightening his hold until the fellow's eyes began to protrude from their sockets. "I—have—a—mind—to—shake—your—deceitful—tongue—from—your—head." And as he spoke, he accompanied each word by a quick shake, as a dog shakes a kitten, forming a running commentary on what he said.

The moment that Holbrook saw the consequences of his unprovoked assault, he became convulsed with terror, and gave a howl like that of a wild beast, as Herbert's grasp tightened on his throat. Another second, and it was lowered into a mere gurgling sound, while every muscle of his pallid countenance was racked by pain, and his frame writhed in convulsive efforts to escape. Escape—it would have been easier for prey to have escaped from the death-grasp of the enshrouding folds of a boa-constrictor.

"Part them—part them!" cried Arnold. "For heaven's sake, do not let Dan be strangled like a dog!"

"He deserves it," said Morgan. Then stepping behind Herbert, he threw his arms around him, caught his wrists with a grasp yet more powerful than their own, and whispered: "Let the reptile go, Yancey. You've nearly choked the breath out of him."

Herbert relaxed his hold, and others coming between them, the couple were parted, forming a striking contrast. Herbert Yancey, defiant and vengeful, seemed like a knight-paladin, ready to defend a "faire ladye" from wrong accusation. Holbrook, at first bewildered and stupefied by pain, gazed at his late assailant in dogged silence, until his scattered recollections returned. Then turning to Arnold, who had not left the table, he said, bitterly:

"Is this the way, Benedict, that you permit an old friend to be throttled at your table, and that, too, by a traitor?"

Well was it for Holbrook that Morgan had not relaxed his hold, but Herbert struggled in vain to again lay hands on his traducer.

"Yes," continued Holbrook, with a gesture of menace towards Herbert Yancey,—"I told you when you came here how that flitting jade at the parsonage had entangled him, and now you see the proof. Talk about treason and traitors, when you have this popin-jay here!"

"Let me go!" literally shrieked Herbert Yancey, his eyes flashing like steel,—"let me go, I say!"

"Stop—stop!" cried Arnold. "This brawl will ruin us—will stop our expedition. Gentlemen officers, I entreat—I command you, resume your seats. Holbrook, sit here. Order, gentlemen,—order."

The magic of discipline stilled the tumult, and Herbert Yancey seating himself by Morgan's side, cast defiant glances at Holbrook.

"Gentlemen," said Arnold, "I little thought that our evening's festivities would have been disturbed by such a scene. I now have to request that you will retire; and to you, Major Morgan, I commit the custody of Quarter-master Yancey, who will consider himself under arrest until morning parade. At that time, I will guarantee that he shall have a full opportunity to defend his honor, though I regard his conduct this evening with but little favor."

"Colonel," said Herbert; but ere he could utter another word, Morgan whispered into his ear: "Silence now, for your mother's sake." The young officer, disarmed by this talisman, bowed politely, and after saying "good-night, gentlemen," left the room, followed by Morgan. A few moments more, and Colonel Arnold was left alone with Holbrook.

"Now tell me, Dan," said Arnold, when the door closed on the last officer who went out, "what in the name of the sutter made you open on that young fellow ere he'd been a moment in the room?"

"Curses upon him!" muttered Holbrook. "My throat feels as though it was pinched by a blacksmith's heated tongs."

"Take some more toddy, man. But you deserved it, for you had your plans so well laid. There you had made the young mechanic believe that this Yancey shot him, and had also began to open a cross-fire at the parson's by anonymous letters. But you wouldn't let your pear ripen. Worse than all, you began by abusing a pretty woman. What could I do?"

"What could you do, Benedict? What did I do for you when you were set on by the Yale students at New Haven? What did I do when you tried to run away with the Patroon's mulatto wench at Albany? What did I do when you had lost your last pistarene at the 'Green Dragon'?"

"You stood by me, Dan, like a man," replied Arnold, who was somewhat troubled at these reminiscences. "But policy—policy is now necessary, Dan, for us to play the cards in a great game, and pocket long odds. You saw all the Riflemen stood by their comrade, and what could I do?"

"All very fine, Benedict," retorted Holbrook, with a sarcastic sneer. "Yet policy is not pleasant to a man who is being strangled to death. Never mind; I'll fix that coxcomb's flint."

"No murder here," said Arnold, in a beseeching tone, for he felt the reproaches and the recollections of his old associate in crime.

"Murder?—not from me," was Holbrook's bitter response.

"Catch me at sunrise within twenty miles of here! But let me get near him, and he'll repent this night."

"That's it—that's it. I'll send him on some scout, and let you know it. But now as to these Canadians—can I depend on them?"

"Policy again, my foxy Benedict. But now let us leave this young Virginian, and talk of business. Have you your plans and estimate of forces all copied for me?"

"Here they are," replied Arnold, "Washington's instructions and all."

But we will not now unfold this—Arnold's first treason against the infant republic, as he concocted it with his ally. Little thought the hundreds of brave men who that night dreamed of victory and of liberty, that while they slept, their leader was scheming how to profitably betray them and their country.

CHAPTER X.

A SUBTLE PLOT.

"Hope, of all passions, most befriends us here:
Joy has her tears, and triumph has her death;
Hope, like a cordial, innocent though strong;
Man's heart at once inspires and scares,
Nor makes him pay his wisdom for his joys."

HERBERT YANCEY'S slumbers were disturbed by troubled dreams, through which the presence of Mabel Gwynne floated like a silver thread; and when he awoke, he could elicit no augury of good from the gloomy sky without. Dark, massive clouds, sullenly tiaged with the dawning light, came rolling up from the sea, depositing a gloom-shroud of mist on their pathway. No ray of sunshine cheered the earth with its gladness, and as Herbert looked from his window, he could but feel that the depressing heaviness of the atmosphere was in accordance with his own dejected spirits. The calm which follows a tempest of angry passion is accompanied with a gloom far more painful to the mind than the gloom which precedes it. And as Herbert, pacing his chamber, recalled the events of the preceding evening, currents of thought, no less tumultuous than the elements without, whirled through his troubled brain like the wild harping of a thousand minstrels. Gladly did he turn from the brawl at Colonel Arnold's table to the previous avowal of his love to Mabel, and gradually did recollections of her soften the darker shadows of his heart.

There was a knock at the door.

"Come in!" cried Herbert; and in strode Major Morgan, wrapped in a large green blanket, which he wore Indian fashion.

"Well, quarter-master," said he, in a pleasant tone of voice, "I have come to resume my guard, and am glad to find my prisoner looking so well. Make haste and dress, man; I have news for you."

"A challenge, of course."

"A challenge," echoed Morgan, in a contemptuous tone. "And who, pray, do you expect to fight?"

"Who? Why, that impertinent fellow Holbrook." The very recollection of the insolent allusion to Mabel made Herbert's face flush with anger.

"Well, then," replied Morgan, "let me advise you to smother your anger, and save your sword or pistols for other opponents."

"Does the scoundrel not dare fight?" asked Herbert.

"There you have it, right in the centre," answered Morgan. "At any rate, he has taken good care to keep out of your way. Colonel Arnold sent for me about an hour since, and after a long palaver, said that he regretted the fracas last night—that Holbrook was intoxicated—that on awaking this morning he expressed great regret—and that he had actually started for Albany post haste. So, young bottle-thrower, you are now champion of this pretty miss; nor do I see that it is any one's business whether she be Whig or Tory."

"So the scoundrel has run away!" exclaimed Herbert, a contemptuous smile curling on his lip. "I had hoped to punish him."

"Never mind—never mind. You may meet him some of these days, and in a more appropriate locality for a duel or a chastisement than this straight-laced town. Arnold is evidently troubled that there was any dispute at all, and has given the waiters a Spanish dollar apiece to make them hold their tongues. I must say, though, that to me it seemed strange to see such a scapegrace as Holbrook evidently in on such intimate terms with our commander. Depend upon it, Yancey, unless I am mistaken, neither is any better than he should be."

"Holbrook and Colonel Arnold allies?" exclaimed Herbert Yancey, fixing a searching glance on his companion's countenance.

"Flints and hammers, but I begin to think so. At any rate, Colonel Arnold—"

"Bids you good morning, gentlemen," said that officer, entering. "Your servant again, Major Morgan. Hope you are well, quarter-master. Really, though, you should not leave your door ajar when you discuss your comrades."

"Listeners," blurted out Morgan.

"Never hear any good of themselves," continued Arnold, in a soft, purring tone. "I know, gentlemen, that it must have seemed strange to both of you that Dan Holbrook should have placed himself on such intimate terms with me, but he himself gave the reason. In other years, when I was a mere tradesman at New Haven, and he had not become a drunken horse-jockey, fortune so willed it that he rendered me service on several occasions. You, gentlemen, who are from the honor-esteemed Old Dominion, should not blame me for being ungrateful."

"That we won't!" frankly exclaimed Major Morgan, "and here's my hand on it."

"Excuse me, colonel, for harboring such thoughts," said Herbert; "I was wrong in losing my temper last night, I admit, but I could not hear Miss Gwynne's name aspersed in a drunken bout."

"I honor your spirit," replied Colonel Arnold, in whose eyes a close observer of human nature might have read the glory of a triumph, won by appealing to noble sentiments at the sacrifice of truth. Having gained this point, he went on: "To be sure, it would do the provincial cause harm to have it said that its officers quarrelled over their cups, but I think I have suppressed the matter. Now for business of greater importance. I am a candid man, gentlemen, and speak plainly. The more radical of the Sons of Liberty, Mr. Yancey, have taken some offence at your visits to the rector's—nay, some of them go so far as to assert that it was you who fired at the young man—"

"I!" interrupted Herbert Yancey,—"I play the part of an assassin? O, Colonel Arnold, this must be a joke."

"No, no," replied Arnold, with a sardonic smile perceptible on his lips. "And I have come here to free your reputation."

"How?"

"The matter is to be discussed by the council to-night."

"I will be there."

"Do not. Discretion is the better part of valor, and I entreat you to abstain. Your presence there might inflame the mob; and although I have no doubt as to your innocence, yet, for the sake of the cause, of the army, of the feelings of General Washington, I advise you to avoid this unjust storm until you can feel assured that justice will be done you."

"Run away?—never!"

"Hear me out. I have issued an order detailing you, to whom the duty as quarter-master belongs, to sail this morning, in advance of the fleet, to reconnoitre the mouth of the river. If you find no hostile demonstration there, you will land, and see what fresh provisions can be obtained. Such are my orders; surely you will not hesitate to obey them."

"But," said Herbert.

"No buts," interrupted Major Morgan. "From what has been whispered here and hinted there, Herbert, I now see that you are in a false position here. It is a noble thing in Colonel Arnold to give you a chance to let the breeze blow over until you can return to face it, surrounded by your friends. Nor is there any disgrace for a soldier to obey orders."

"And the cause, quarter-master," adroitly chimed in Arnold. "Just think how the Tories would chuckle to hear that a young Whig officer had been entrapped in some snare adroitly set. How General Washington would grieve!"

"Ay," said Major Morgan; "but what would your mother say? You well know, Herbert, how these people are excited, and how deaf they are to justice, though their hearts are right. Take my advice, and sail—"

"Within an hour," interrupted Arnold. "I had the sloop fitted for sea yesterday; she drifted down to the bar with last night's tide; the wind is coming round to the southward, and you have only to ride down to Plum Island, go on board, and set sail."

Both spoke so earnestly, and with so much apparent interest in his welfare, that Herbert Yancey at once gave way before their joint argument.

"I will go," said he; "but I must first see—no, I must write—must write to my mother."

"That you can do on board of the sloop, and send the letter back by the pilot," replied Colonel Arnold. "Remember, I wish you to leave before there is the least suspicion breathed against you in public."

"Tuck your valise, Herbert," said Major Morgan, "and I will ride down with you."

"But my horse?"

"I will have him taken on the transport with mine, if we carry them," replied Colonel Arnold, "yet I doubt if we take any at all. There are no paths where a horse can travel, and no forage."

"Well," exclaimed Herbert Yancey. "Do you order the horses, Major Morgan, and by the time they are saddled, I will join you below with my valise."

Morgan left the room, and Arnold followed him. In a few moments, though, the latter returned, with a large paper packet in his hand.

"What—all packed? Well, here are your orders, and I trust that, ere many months, you will return to shake off these idle charges. Meanwhile, we shall meet at the mouth of the river, and not only be comrades, I trust, but friends."

"Ay, that we will," cordially responded Herbert Yancey, seizing and shaking Colonel Arnold's hand, while his eyes glistened with moisture. "Never shall I forget your kindness, and some of these days you will find that, whatever my present faults may be, ingratitude does not enter into my composition. Good-by."

Major Morgan was already mounted when Herbert came down stairs, and the two were soon trotting down the river side, to where the sloop lay in waiting. On the way, Herbert learned some of the rumors afloat to his prejudice, and felt sick at heart to find how unjustly he had been accused of infidelity to the cause of liberty.

"Never mind—never mind," said Morgan, as Herbert shook hands with him ere stepping into the boat. "The Riflemen know your innocence, Herbert, and if any Yankee says a word against you before us, he will regret it. Good-by until next week."

CHAPTER XI.

THE IDEAL OF THE HEART.

"—In dreams, in dreams,
The radiance of thy glance upon me beams;
No star has met
My gaze for years, whose beauty does not shine,
Whose look of speechless love is not like thine."

MADEL GWYNNE, like the object of her affections, had passed a troubled night. Her rosy lips, as she tossed on her dream-disturbed couch, told tales which, if breathed consciously by daylight, would have brought the crimson tide to her cheeks; yet why should she blush to announce her first love, or to tell the dream joys which chorled in unison with her brightest hopes? One of the elf-messengers sent earthwards by the fairy queen, to scatter "sweets of forgetfulness" on dreamy pillows, must surely have winged his way to her quiet chamber, to nestle in the curls which clustered untrammelled about her head, and whisper sweet conceits into her ear. True, these dreamy thoughts were on but a single theme, and that was love, yet they swept across her heart like the south wind over the strings of an æolian harp, swelling it with notes of liquid harmony, a joyous accompaniment to her brightest hopes. She was by Herbert Yancey's side—that Herbert to whom she had plighted her love, and they wandered in the Arcadian groves of dream-land, where the silvery music of fountains mingled with the notes of the turtle-dove,—where the perfume of sweet flowers filled the air,—where the crescent moon, peering through the fragrant canopy of foliage, cast a chequered light around them.

Blessed dream! Imagination painting in the distance this bright picture, radiant as the rose-hues when first tipped by morning's light, and the lovely dreamer felt that neither neglect, nor scorn, nor indifference could conquer the deep tide of love on which her bark of happiness exultantly floated. But, just then, a portentous cloud seemed to glide between earth and heaven; a far distant moan trembled through the air; the affrighted birds flew to their coverts, and the leafy shadows were absorbed in a general gloom. Yet Madel cared not. Her warm heart still throbbled responsively to the warm pleadings of affection, and for a while she was insensible of the coming storm. Suddenly she perceived the lowering darkness; she heard the rumbling echoes; she felt the hand of Herbert withdrawn, and with a shriek of terror she awoke. The reverberating echoes of a thunder-stroke were echoing around, as she endeavored to recall her thoughts, and she trembled with awe. Then, her mind becoming more calm, she buried her face in the pillow, and shed tears of joy to think that it was but a dream from which the thunder had awakened her.

Soon the thunder ceased to roll, but the day dawned heavily; and Madel, who had not closed her eyes, began to have apprehensions that her dream was an omen of evil. Could it be ominous of that bitter chalice of disappointment which is the portion of the trouble-stricken heart left alone to suffer in the darkness of affliction? But no, no! Herbert would never disappoint her—never leave her unprotected, to encounter the storms of adversity.

On going down stairs, she found the rector pacing the floor of the sitting-room, and although the good old man bade her "good-morning" with an assumed air of cheerfulness, she saw at a glance that his manner was but a disguise with which he sought to conceal troubled thoughts.

"Good morning," she replied. "Did you hear the thunder just before daylight?"

The rector made no reply, but walked backward and forward in the room, gnawing his finger-nails, as was his wont when troubled. To Madel this silence was intolerable, and she watched him with an expression of eager apprehension, which, at last, turning his eyes upon her, he perceived. Halting, he gave a convulsive shudder, and said: "Sit you down, Madel. I wish to speak with you."

The color went and came in the young girl's cheeks; her temples throbbled, and her heart beat high, for she felt that the subject of all subjects was to be discussed. Yet what had she to fear? So drawing a chair near one in which the rector seated herself, she listened with eager earnestness.

"Madel," said the old man, in a tremulous voice, "I feel it my duty to have a more perfect understanding with you. You are my adopted child, dear Madel, and since the day on which the Lord threw you into my charge, a waif from the broad ocean, I have endeavored to promote your happiness, even as if I had been your parent. Nay, weep not, for the service has been to me a labor of love. Year after year we have enjoyed sweet confidence, and I have seen the helpless babe east, Moses like, by the raging waves upon the shore, grow up into a true-hearted, loving woman, ever more than ready to repay my love. Yet within a few days—pardon me if I am wrong—I feel that there is a secret between us. Is it right, Madel, that we should thus be strangers?"

He paused, but received no reply. Madel had covered her face with her hands, and bitter tears oozed through her closed fingers, while her frame was convulsed with emotion. She essayed to speak, but in vain, for sobs choked her utterance:

The good rector saw her embarrassment, and continued:

"Indeed there is perhaps no reason why we should not ever agree as we have agreed. I know your secret, dear Madel, and I assure you that I have no objections to your giving your affections to the son of my old friend Yancey, if—"

"If what?" eagerly interrupted Madel, her eyes flashing with joy through her tears.

"If he loves you—that is, if he is not merely trifling with your affections as an amusement."

"O, sir!" Madel here stopped, for it was a marvel to her that any one could doubt the love in which she reposed such confidence.

"Tell me," exclaimed the rector, who saw with concern how her feelings were culled,—"tell me, has he professed affection for you on such short acquaintance?"

"Sir," replied Madel, with sudden composure, while her cheeks and brow burned, "he has told me that he loved me."

"And you?" asked the rector, springing to his feet as he attentively watched Madel's countenance.

"And I, sir," said Madel, calmly,—"I responded to love by pledging him my own."

"When was this interchange of vows?"

"Last night, sir."

"And do you put full trust in him?"

"Full trust in him, sir!" passionately exclaimed Madel, in a faint tone. Then passing her hand across her brow, she raised her eyes with a triumphant glance, and continued: "Why, sir, after what you yourself told me about the father, could I doubt the son?"

"Ah, my dear girl," answered the rector, "you little know the world, or the character of mankind. Deeply do I reproach myself for not having warned you—"

"Not against Herbert Yancey," interrupted Madel. "Not against my deliverer from a watery grave. No, sir; I—"

She was interrupted by Madame Ordway, who entered the room almost breathless, exclaiming: "He has escaped, after all!"

"Escaped!" said the rector. "Who has escaped?"

"The man who tried to kill my Frank, before this very door. Ah, Miss Madel, after all that I have done for you, who would have thought that you would have set a stranger so crazy that he tried to kill my Frank, just because he was near here at night?"

"But who is it?" inquired the rector. "Who was the cowardly assassin? Who do you mean? Surely not—"

"It was that Yancey. He was to have been taken up and tried before Squire Tracy this morning, but the rascal probably got wind of it. So he slipped down to Plum Island, got on board a sloop, and is off."

"God preserve us!" ejaculated the rector. "That fine-looking young man an assassin and a fugitive?"

"Never! never!" shrieked Madel, whose brain rang with a confusion of sound as if of a hundred cataraacts and a thousand voices endeavoring to make themselves heard above the roaring of the waters. Vision after vision flashed across her scorching brain, each different from the other, yet in each did she see Herbert Yancey. Yet all this was but a second in its passage, and then, pressing her hand to her brow as if to still the wild pain of its beatings, Madel fell heavily to the floor.

"Woman," exclaimed the rector, "you have killed her!"

"She had better be dead than the wife of a murderer," said Madame Ordway, whose love for her son led her to look upon Herbert as a criminal of the deepest dye. "But do you take her by the shoulders, sir, and let us carry her up stairs. Poor child!"

Lifting her up as they would have lifted a statue—so cold, so pale and so lifeless was she,—they carried Madel to her room, where Madame Ordway, with many reproaches against Herbert, applied the usual restoratives.

"Do I dream again?" asked Madel, as she recovered from her swoon. But no. The lamp of her mind gradually illuminated the past, and she exclaimed with frantic impatience: "Has Herbert Yancey really gone?"

"Poor girl!" whispered the rector, stooping over her pillow and imprinting a kiss upon her pale, cold forehead. "Do not think of one so unworthy."

"Not think of him!" replied Madel, in a deliberate tone. "Have I not plighted myself to him? Is he not mine?"

"Nay—nay," said Madame Ordway; "be quiet now, and endeavor to sleep."

But Madel refused to be quiet until she had learned the whole truth, and the more she heard, the more she felt assured that Herbert was innocent. True, his abrupt departure looked suspicious, especially as Colonel Arnold declared that he was ignorant of it; but hope whispered Madel not to despair. Others might doubt him, but her love would be all the purer and holier from being hidden in the treasure-cell of her trusting heart. Meanwhile, she lay on her bed, pale and motionless, though an occasional tear glistened on her drooping, half-closed eye-lashes.

In the afternoon, the booming of cannon met her ear, and she cast an inquiring gaze at the rector, who sat watching by her bedside.

"It is the rebel force setting sail," he replied. "And I fear that Madame Ordway's deluded boy has gone with them."

"My dear father," said Madel, "pray with me."

The good man knelt, and poured forth ardent supplications to the throne of grace, while Madel mentally followed him. Soon, beneath the calming influence of the divine petition, the heavy weight in her spirit dissolved in a flood of tears, and a ray of heavenly comfort shone into her benighted heart.

"I feel relieved now," said she, as she arose, "and I have a favor to ask."

"Name it."

"I ask," and never had the persuasive tones of her voice fell so plaintively upon the rector's ear,— "I ask that, as you love me, you will never mention Herbert Yancey's name in my presence, or allude to his visit here, until his name is free from suspicion."

"I promise," replied the rector; "ay, and promise for Madame Ordway, too, hard though the task may be." Again was Madel clasped to the old man's heart, which rejoiced as over a loved one lost. "Now," he added, "go to sleep, and make to-morrow morning bright and fresh. Good-night."

She slept, but it was a troubled sleep, nor were her waking moments thenceforth cheerful. Her all-engrossing hope was that Herbert might prove his entire innocence—of his love for her she entertained no doubt. When the heart is truly filled with love, doubt is excluded.

[TO BE CONTINUED]

HARVEST IN NORMANDY.

EUROPEAN AGRICULTURE.

We have grouped together, on this and the next page, a series of interesting pictures illustrating some phases of European agriculture. The first represents the manner of getting in the grain harvest in Normandy, France. In the foreground, we have one of the famous Norman horses, led by a peasant woman, in the picturesque costume of her district, and loaded with wheat sheaves, while in the distance are seen other female peasants engaged in cutting and binding sheaves. Women are largely employed in the heavier labors of agriculture in Europe. The next picture represents the annual apple-gathering in Normandy. A cart, to which a stout horse is harnessed, receives the golden fruit handed in by the laborers. Women and children are bringing in the heavily laden baskets of fruit, and the proprietor and his lady are superintending the operation. In the distance two men are beating down the apples from a tree, which are gathered by the women and children at the foot of the trees as they fall. The third picture on this page delineates the woodcutters and wood-carriers in the forest of Brotonne, Normandy. A long file of horses and mules, the foremost furnished with panniers and bells, and each bearing a heavy load of even cut sticks, winds its way through the mountain pass. A peasant boy in his sabots, or wooden shoes, heads the column. On one of the horses a peasant girl is riding, her feet comfortably ensconced in a pannier, listening to the compliments of a queerly-equipped rustic attendant. In the distant gorge of the hills a quaint old town is visible. The peasant women of Normandy wear a very picturesque dress, the effect of which is heightened by gay colors. The petticoat is perhaps of intense red, the neckerchief of pink, the apron striped with orange, and not infrequently "bends over all," not exactly the "blue sky," but the much less poetical canopy of an immensely large scarlet umbrella, which is used as a defence against the overpowering heat of the sun. Seen among the depths of the green forests, such forms give a richness and harmony to the picture, which would otherwise be wanting. Although there are coal mines in forty different departments of France, yet the abundance of firewood produced in the forests is still sufficiently great to prevent coal from being used exclusively, even where the wood is not procurable; while the want of internal means of communication still further limits the use of coal. Many of the French collieries are lying idle, or nearly so, because the expense of the coal itself, added to the cost of transport over insufficient roads and canals, raises the price too largely to enable the seller to compete with the forest proprietor. It has been stated that in the department of Aveyron, the coal mines, if properly worked, would provide a supply nearly equal to the wants of France; but that the deficiencies in respect to roads and canals render this bounty of nature almost unavailable. One eighth of the surface of France is still covered with woods and forests, the annual produce from which, comprising building timber and firewood, is estimated at about thirty millions of dollars. Ten years ago it was estimated that France, with one half as many more inhabitants, consumed only one fifth the quantity of coal burned in England. The consumption of every kind of fuel in Paris amounted at that time in value to nearly eight millions and a half dollars a year, being nearly one half the amount of the annual rent of all the houses in Paris, and two thirds of the sum spent by the inhabitants in wearing apparel! This estimate, if correct, places in a striking point of view the expensive nature of wood fuel. The firewood for the supply of Paris, paying duty on entering the city, is brought down the river Seine on rafts. Sometimes the supply is obtained from a great distance; and in that case, the wood is seasoned before being made up into rafts. The bark is stripped off at the time of the wood being cut, and then allowed to remain exposed, the wood becomes hardened, and much better fitted to be used as fuel. Some forests, contiguous to the Seine, are preferred to others in respect of the quality of wood there obtained—one kind, for instance, obtained from trees growing in a stratum of stones and gravel, is much esteemed at Paris. Two or three other kinds are used on account of the pleasant perfume they emit; while others also are in good favor for the bright, sparkling and cheerful blaze which they yield. Wood, however, is paid for at a very dear rate; and to economize fuel, the Parisians often keep their fires in a smouldering state, or use a kind of charcoal composition with the wood. When the wood rafts arrive in Paris, which they do to the number of four or five thousand every year, they stop at the Isle Lonviers, one of the three islands formed by the Seine within the walls of Paris. Here wood depots are established, from which the retail dealers in this commodity obtain their supply. In France and Germany, the selection of the best wood for fuel, and the cultivation and protection of the trees yielding it, have been made the subject of a separate branch of practical education. The best wood for fuel is oak; the next is beech; the harder the wood, in a general way, the more heat it emits in burning. The trunks of large trees, sawn into convenient lengths, and then split into billets, make the best fuel; but where wood is scarce, it is found most profitable to cut down the trees when from thirty to forty years' old, when they have acquired a considerable height of stem, but no great girth. In the woods which are planted for this purpose in France and Germany, the trees are made to grow slender, by being placed near together, and most of the lower branches being cut off. This is a well-known mode of determining the manner in which a tree or plant shall grow, whether tall and spare, or short and bulky; and it is simply a matter of calculation, under particular circumstances, as to which of the methods will be, on the whole, most conducive to the object in view. About sixty or seventy years ago, a German traveller, Riesbeck, gave rather a quaint account of the condition of Prussia at that time; and while defending certain monopolies which existed at that time, and which, he said, were established by the king for the good of the people at large, he gives us an insight into the employment of wood for fuel, the sale of which was monopolized by a company:—"This company is not allowed to set an arbitrary price on its commodity, but the wood is taxed; and they are obliged to furnish the best sort. Though the price of the wood be high, it keeps pace with the wages of the manufacturers; so no one feels it but those who live upon their own estates without doing anything, or those who receive stipends from the court. If the former of these would work like the other parts of the industrious public, they would reckon the article of firewood in their account; as they do not, they are very properly punished for their laziness. As to the latter, to be sure they do not get much, but what they get is sufficient for the decent purposes of life; and the king's maxim is, that every man shall have enough, but no man shall have too much. To the former the monopoly is of service, for the company is obliged to sell him wood as cheap as if there was no monopoly; and, besides, he is himself allowed to take a certain portion of it to market, where the regulations enable him to sell it to better advantage than he would do otherwise. The monopoly also serves to preserve the forests, which all Europe has so long lamented the diminution of. The scarcity of wood makes people more cautious how they grab and burn. Nor does the monopoly affect any but the inhabitants of Berlin and Potsdam, who have great advantages over the rest of the country from the residence of many officers of state in them, and the facility with which money circulates. Strangers, indeed, who reason from the state of their own purses, and see that the materials for fire are as dear at Berlin and Potsdam as Brazil or Campeachy wood, form no prejudices in favor of the Prussian monopolies, and thus far they are in the right." The last fact mentioned, that of firewood being equal in price to firewood and ornamental wood brought from abroad, is not a little remarkable. A wonderful degree of activity has been shown within the last few years in devising new kinds of fuel, which, being compounded of easily procurable ingredients, shall be cheaper, or cleaner, or more portable, or more fitted for particular purposes than coal. Mr. Williams, a director of the Dublin Steam Packet Company, has devised a kind of composite fuel, in which peat is brought prominently into use. In one of his methods, peat-moss, pressed nearly dry, is further dried with powdered limestone and mud. In another preparation, he combines bituminous matter with peat, and this produces fuel which answers all the purposes of pure coal, and is much cheaper and more portable.—Our next picture represents a Tyrolean peasant at vintage time. He is a sort of walking grape-vine, loaded down with bunches of delicious fruit. The last picture in the series depicts the manner of making wine at Pola, in Istria. In the immense tun on the ox-cart, is a peasant treading down the grapes, the juice of which flows into the tubs set outside. All wine, so called, is made from the juice of the grape; and in those countries where the grape is best cultivated, there is the best wine made, or there at least it may be made, if the cultivators possess the requisite skill. All the beverages produced from other fruit, such as cider from the apple, perry from pear, and home made wines from the raisin, currant, gooseberry, orange, etc., are rather substitutes for wine than wine itself. Each of the countries in the middle and south of Europe has its own proper and peculiar reputation for the kind of wine produced. Port is the produce of the banks of the Douro, in Portugal, not far from Oporto. Sherry is derived from vineyards situated in the vicinity of Xeres, in Spain. Charet, or Bordeaux, is the produce of a small district not far distant from the city of Bordeaux. Burgundy and Champagne are the names applied to the wine made in these two French provinces. Rhenish wines, Moselle and Neckar wines are named from the vineyards situated on the banks of the great rivers bearing those names; and the special names, such as Riedelsheimer, Hockheimer, Johannisberger, etc., relate to particular vineyards which have acquired a wide-spread reputation. Tokay is a most expensive wine, made at and named from the town of Tokay, in Hungary. Thus it is also in Italy, in Southern Germany, in Greece, and in the Mediterranean islands: each country produces wine, which, when tasted by a connoisseur, is found to possess its own peculiar properties, distinguishable from others. The general routine of wine-making is pretty much the same in all these districts, and may be illustrated by a few examples. In sherry-making, for instance, the grapes, which are allowed to hang till perfectly ripe, are plucked before the middle of September; and those growers who are most attentive to their wines, place the grapes in baskets, and expose them to the sun for forty-eight hours, turning and sorting them all the while. When the wine is to be made, the grapes are carried to the pressing room. The presses generally used in the sherry districts are simply large wooden troughs, about eight feet square by twelve or fourteen inches deep; and each will contain, at one time, as many grapes as will yield a butt of wine. A coarse wooden screw stands in the centre of the trough, worked by a lever; and a large quantity of grapes being heaped up on one part of the trough, the laborers commence by strewing them with a little powdered gypsum. Some of the grapes are then spread over the bottom of the remainder of the trough, upon which the men jump with great violence, having heavy wooden shoes on their feet. The grapes being then piled up round the screw, the press is worked, and the "must" or juice flows out abundantly. The bottom of each trough is elevated two or three feet above the floor of the cellar, with two or three spouts so arranged as to allow the must to fall into vessels beneath. The must is poured into butts; and the skins and husks, after having had water added to them, are again pressed to yield an inferior quality of must. The must is allowed to ferment in casks, and gradually exchanges its sweetness for the more alcoholic quality of wine. Of the ruder modes of expressing the juice from the grapes, it is scarcely necessary to speak. The illuminations in the Harleian and other manuscripts, and the paintings on the walls of Egyptian buildings, give abundant evidence of the state of this art in the early stages of a nation's history; and the grape-pressing process adopted at Pola, in Istria, where a man treads the grapes in a kind of cart, and another collects the juice in vessels, will sufficiently exemplify the method still adopted in many countries. All wine is thus fermented; but a great number of minute particulars determine the manner in which the fermented juice is brought to the state of saleable wine. Thus, in some wines, especially port, brandy is added; and in nearly all, age is an important element of goodness. Hence it arises that old wine commands a higher price than new. At Xeres there are very large cellars, in which the sherry wine is deposited, in casks which are always kept in the cellar. The casks contain wine of all ages, from one year to half a century. The stock of the finest and oldest is never exhausted; according to the price at which wine expedited to the market is intended to be sold, it contains a larger or smaller proportion of old wine; but it is only in wines of a very high price that even a small portion of their very finest wines is mixed. What is withdrawn from the oldest and finest casks, is made up from the casks which approach them nearest in age and quality; so that a cask of wine, said to be fifty years old, may contain a portion of the vintages of thirty or forty seasons. The labor of the vine-dressers in the wine countries is often laborious. Thus one of the Rhenish wines is produced at a village called Asmanshausen. The hills behind and around this village are so very steep that it is only by artificial means, often by planting the vines in baskets, that any soil can be retained around their roots. The vineyards are a succession of terraces, or steps, extending from the top to the bottom of the hills, some of which are nearly a thousand feet in height. In some places more than twenty terraces may be counted, rising one above another; they are supported by walls of masonry from five to ten feet high, and the breadth of some of the ledges on which the vines grow is not more than twice the height of the walls. To reach many of these narrow plots, the vine-dressers, male and female, must scale the precipices, and hang, as it were, from the face of the rock; while a great deal of the soil itself, and every particle of the manure, must be carried up on their shoulders. It has been remarked that "the life of the Rhineland vine-dresser indeed presents a rare example of industry and perseverance." Though by no means rich, they are generally the proprietors of the vineyards they cultivate; and though their appearance does not always verify that which painters draw or poets describe, they at least exhibit an aspect of cheerfulness and intelligence. Independently of the hardness of the labor of cultivating the vine, which is not confined to one season, but must be earned on perseveringly through the whole year, and is most severe during the heat of summer, the vine is a delicate plant; frost, hail or rain may in a few hours annihilate the produce on which the cultivator depends solely for his subsistence. With regard to the consumption and conservation of wine, it is estimated, that the average consumption in Great Britain is about six million gallons a year—not more than one fourth the amount of spirits drank, which arises in a great measure from the very high duty chargeable on foreign wine. The inhabitants of Great Britain do not consume more than one quart of wine a year, poor and rich together. In Paris there is a wine market exclusively devoted to this branch of business. It is a well conducted establishment, and the scene of a very large trade. The piles of storehouses are seven in number, four in front and three behind. The two centre piles fronting the river Seine, are divided into seven compartments, and are used as a market, one of the buildings in the back division containing brandies. The spaces between the several masses of buildings form avenues or streets, of which there are several named after different kinds of wine—as the Rue de Champagne, Rue de Bourgogne, Rue de Languedoc, Rue de la Côte d'Or. There are counting-houses for the merchants, and small bureaux for the officers who superintend the entrance and delivery of wines. These entries amount sometimes to fifteen hundred casks a day. The whole establishment contains more than three hundred thousand square yards; it is enclosed by walls on three sides, and has a frontage towards the Seine, nine hundred yards in length. The stock usually contained in this "Halle aux Vins" is from twelve millions to fifteen millions of gallons. The remaining engraving in this series tells its own story. It is a sketch of an Irish egg-seller. The girl is seated on a little ringed pony, that supports, besides her weight, two huge panniers filled with the produce of the poultry yard.

APPLE-GATHERING IN NORMANDY.

WOODCUTTERS AND CARRIERS IN NORMANDY.

TYROLESE PEASANT AT VINTAGE TIME.

EGG MARKETING IN IRELAND.

THE "MONEY-MAKING SPIRIT."

This game of money-getting all the world over is, after all, only another name for exertion, emulation, ambition, adventure, independence, success, power. We can see no reason to expect its disuse—none even to wish for it. It is so general, so universal; its goal is so practically acknowledged, that a thousand platitudes from pretended skeptics do not damage it in the least. The skepticism and the platitudes only prove its utility; the taunts of laziness only demonstrate its worth. The world will have it, the world must have it. It is always wanted—sometimes for good, oftentimes for evil; but the good and the evil weigh in this instance only on the same scale as in all other human arrangements. It may be called for to ravage a continent; it may be required to civilize one; it may be wanted to hollow out a mountain range that too long has made enemies of nations; its potent forces may be asked to build hostile barriers on a peaceful plain; but in all these cases it only stands up to represent hate or human passion, human enterprise or human love, husbanded for the inevitable strife alike against physical foes or social evils. The taunt of avarice against England will appear of all taunts the most hollow, when it is remembered that we groan under the heaviest of debts, and that our squandering propensities seem well nigh exhaustless, and when every great national effort, however chimerical or visionary, is sustained with the grandest force and the most enduring prodigality. It is said that we carry out our plans in this country by length of purse; but length of purse only means length of arm and brain, of muscle and will. The money is voted because, though the gap will be felt, the energy can be counted upon for its speedy filling up. And the strength required to fill up that chasm is not that of the sordid man. It is no base metal; it is faith, mountain-moving faith—faith in skill, industry, intelligence, vigilance, and the grand endeavor which conquers all things.—The "Manchester Post."

WINE MAKING AT POLA, IN ISTRIA.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

"TEMPORA MUTANT."

BY JAMES P. FITTS.

"The seasons change"—eternity advances—
The course of Time is onward, day by day;
The beautiful of earth, beneath his glances,
Continue still to droop and fade away.

"The seasons change"—the friends so fondly cherished,
Remain to us in memory alone;
The aspirations of our youth have perished—
Upon the rapid wings of time have flown.

"The seasons change"—the days of youth have fled,
The spring-time of our life has passed away;
Yet, in our inmost heart we still secreted
The pleasant memories of a former day.

"The seasons change"—the past is all behind us,
Our future—ah, how little now remains—
Long years have passed away since fate consigned us
To wander here in life's oft-trodden lanes.

"The seasons change"—at length the full fruition
Of hope brings Lethe to our weary souls;
The oft-desired, the heavenly transition
To realms above, for earthly pain consoles.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE QUARREL AND THE CROWN.

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

THE sad, old, French king Charles was mad again and exiled to one of his woodland palaces. Still clothed in purple and fine linen, he fared sumptuously every day, and never wanted for attendance, even though the strife among the royal dukes for the regency continued unabated; but most faithfully because most lovingly performed, was the service of his fair daughter, Kate. True, there was but little to be done; she could only sigh him to sleep in the hot noontime with old ballads that had tears in their very tones, repeat old, mystic legends to him when the day was growing dim, or wander out, holding his hand and directing his steps in the great sunny openings of the park; and constantly preferring these pleasant duties to the frivolous variety of court, she lived in calm contentment till her father should once more recover his reason. The Princess Kate is drawn in an ancient picture as wearing bands of chestnut hair round a small head, from whose broad braids curly tresses are forever escaping into curls caught and snarled again among strings of pearls; eyes of a yellow hazel, with a perpetual laugh in them, while the white lids lift brown lashes almost to the arch of the well-defined brows. Straight, small, French features, among which the mouth is rather wide than otherwise, but a width of crimson velvet curve, that you would gladly see continued, above those small, ivory teeth, and a chin upturned and deeply cleft with a dimple to match those two in the oval, rosy, waxen cheeks. A white shoulder is partially heaved into light beneath a net of lace gathered up by a white, unjewelled hand; and the whole, surrounded with a black, worm-eaten frame, hangs mouldering and retreating, day by day, further and further from sight, in the hall of the castle of Azincourt.

The park of the present residence of the mad king was very ill trimmed, and the foresters had entirely deserted their cottage in the forest and taken other and finer abodes to themselves—pleasant ones than the low, stone buildings could not be, their one story covered with ivy and deeply embosomed in the wild green growth of summer, where the birds built, unmolested, below the eaves and the stately deer trod across the very doortone—and so the two strangers, who had installed themselves unasked in the abandoned place, seemed to be fully persuaded. Of these youths, one was Lord Guilford de Vere and the other a renowned young Welsh knight, Sir Owen Tudor. While the first was remarkable for nothing but the elegant ennui of high rank, the last was remarkable for everything but that. His memory was stored with lays attesting the ancient historic splendor of his country and the daring deeds of his ancestors. Trained in all manly exploits of the age, he had no rival on field or flood, and in polite learning he fully proved the superiority of his Welsh blood and breeding. Rather tall and sinewy, this slender athlete possessed, nevertheless, an extraordinary beauty of countenance, and the long, black locks, black, flashing eyes, fine features, sparkling teeth and beardless face were as beautiful as a woman's.

It is not to be supposed that the princess, leading her father through the glades, had escaped the notice of these foreigners, nor that her fresh, naive beauty had not made, unfortunately, too deep an impression upon them. At first sight Lord Guilford was enraptured, but cooled on discovering her rank, and suffered his admiration to dwell on her pretty attendant, whose station was about equal to his own. But Sir Owen, "an eagle, clanged an eagle to the spheres," and from the first glance of the lovely Kate had felt and nurtured a passion sudden as those in Arabian tales, and which, though impossible, was sweet as first loves usually are. Neither, in turn, had the princess failed to observe the young hunters, and while used in her father's court to meet the delicate languor of Lord Guilford, the energetic, fiery motions and manners of the other presented a new phase of life for her study, which she did not fail to improve, as frequently, when stationed with her friend Rose within a bower of her own, quite hidden by the green undergrowth around, they had been compelled to listen to the conversation of the unsuspecting hunters as they dressed their game on the bank without; and twice had Sir Owen, in propria persona, crossed the path of the princess with a respectful bow and a flush on his dark cheek, while she with a naive childishness had turned to look at him.

The king was growing decidedly better, and one sunny afternoon, accompanied by Rose and the physician, his daughter was guiding him on his accustomed walk.

"King cups," said he, pointing to the brilliant patches of blossoms, "are the kings underneath—little fellows—tired of their crowns? It would seem as if I had worn a wreath of such things once. Pluck me some more, Kate; twine those harchells among them, from the rocks yonder, and come back with thine arms full of flowers like a girl in the streets, child!"

The physician took his hand while Kate sprang to gratify the first desire he had expressed for many months, and plunging into the copse threaded the familiar ways, gathering a thousand rare blossoms and wreathing them together while plucking a handful of iris growing beside the stream, and finishing the adornment with large, white hawthorns, she beheld it with satisfaction. "O, he said harchells!" said she, with a disappointed cadence, as she remembered, "and there they are growing in the clefts so far up I never can reach them, and there are some scarlet berries—lovely—drooping over these white haws, well, I'll try!" And hanging the wreath on her arm, with sprays of blossoms thrust carelessly everywhere about her, from the crown of her hat, half off her head, to the little feet, she began clambering. On the other side of the rocks, at their base, sat Sir Owen, and hearing the little soliloquy, had glanced over and was now gazing unobserved at the climbing flower-gymn, till at last the harchells were within her reach. They grew in a cleft just under the summit, and were well nursed with constant dew, and the spray which in rough weather was frequently tossed to them by the torrent below. She filled her hands with the bells and the long, hair-like leaves, and then glanced at the bough of red berries growing half-way down the face of the rock. It was impossible to reach them unless she slid down the smooth surface, trusting to the bush to stop her progress. And how would she reach the ground after picking the berries? O, time enough—she would see then; and was turning round preparatory to her slide, when she slipped, lost her balance, and falling over with a series of whirls, launched into the air, and would infallibly have been dashed into the torrent had not the little bush put forth its briery arms and caught her frock fast in a hundred thorns, while she hung, still grasping her flowers and looking round for relief. "The stem will break in a minute!" she exclaimed; but the minute had not passed ere Sir Owen, with a few bounds, had reached the summit, and taking the very step she had intended, slipped swiftly downward till brought up with sudden impetus against the bush that supported her, catching her slender waist in his strong grasp just as the bush with a sharp crack broke away and whirled down into the stream, leaving only the twigs clinging to her apparel. What to do now? further slipping would bring them only into the deep water that broke up almost immediately into a cascade of some forty feet, and the rock was everywhere smooth as glass. The stream was but about twenty feet wide, perhaps he could clear it. She glanced into his eyes and saw the same ideas—all this, for thought is more instantaneous than electricity, in some half-dozen seconds, and bracing his foot against the little stump, with the momentum of his slide still quivering in his person, he sprang—the waters dashed and roared beneath, the air whirled, whistled and slipped around them, ages seemed passing in that instant, the world booming back and away from them, she closed her eyes and awaited the shock of descent, should it ever come, and at last like one waking from a dream, found herself close in Sir Owen's embrace, on the opposite shore. Her first impulse at her release was to fall at her preserver's feet and cover his hands with kisses, for she was young and life very sweet; her next, to draw up with dignity and beg that he would request any favor the first lady in France could bestow, and her last, remembering how frequently she had heard his conversations and watched him in the forest, was to do nothing, which accordingly, like a guilty little child, she did. Rather wondering at her coolness, but at the same time noticing the little self-conscious air, and divining her last thoughts by his own, the knight said:

"Pardon, lady; but perchance we are both better acquainted than the other dreams of."

"And monsieur knows then," said she, dropping the crushed rose, while merriment filled her eye and she broke into a gay laugh, "that I know his haunts—that if I do not know his name and station, I know at least a thousand thoughts to which he has given utterance?"

"My name is Owen Tudor, and I am a knight of Wales."

This sudden knowledge of their immense disparity of position which she had half hoped might not be so great, acted like a damp spell upon her glowing thoughts, but in a moment the imprudence and heedlessness of youth returned, and with elastic smiles she answered:

"But the Tudors are descended from kings?"

"So we believe, madam," he replied.

"Then we are not so unequal as it would seem?"

"Quite as much so," was the response to this rather singular question.

"Would it have cost you so much to accept a rank I was willing to accord?" she winnily asked.

"Since it was not mine I should have been far less a free man," he returned.

"I understand," she said for the first time, with a falling inflection, knowing very well that a sweet voice is always sweetest in gentle interrogations; "but because arbitrary fate, by no virtue of mine, has made me what I am, there is no inequality in a friendship which I must always owe to him who saves my life. I would not like to have died, and I should—but for you."

The tears came into her eyes, but Sir Owen steeled himself against the witchery as far as it was possible.

"Lady," said he, after a moment's pause, "Tudor can never dare aspire to anything but thy knight. Give me but thy scarf that I may do battle in thy name forever!" and as the custom was, sunk on one knee before her.

"There is nothing," whispered she, "to which Tudor might not aspire. But be indeed my knight, brave youth, till—"

She stopped, confused and blushing, plucked the dagger from his bosom, and clove one of her long, brown curls in lieu of the absent scarf, and returned the weapon, for the first time put to such gentle usage, with the tress twisted round it. Pressing the lock to his lips, Sir Owen thrust it into his bosom while turning to continue the path. The stream, which widened both above and below this point, was only to be crossed by a footbridge at a league's distance, and beguiling the way with pleasant conversation, the two went on, and by sunset separated at the foot of the great avenue, not, however, till young Sir Owen had agreed to meet her next day again, and turning every step or two to watch his fine figure as he strode away, she finally ran in with her wilted flowers to the old king, who had quite forgotten his wish by this time. She knew very well that she was indulging in vain a passion that ought to be strangled at its birth, she knew she never could be a knight's wife; but blindly closing her eyes upon the future, she laughed, lived, enjoyed, loved, in the present. And Sir Owen, with all the strength of his intellect, as he saw the barriers to happiness in this direction, with all the fortitude of self-control determined never to risk his secret in words, and with all the fire of his heart felt that this lovely creature had kindled a flame there which neither time nor circumstances could extinguish.

"Has the lady smiled on thee?" asked Lord Guilford, as he entered the cottage. "Well, she smiles just so on me," added the same personage with a yawn.

Sir Owen's eyes flashed, but his sleepy friend observed nothing and continued his remarks, whose subject was in reality the pretty Rose, till the knight wondered were he dreaming or waking, that he dared speak in that manner of one so free from coquetry and deceit as the Princess Kate.

The night on slow pinions overswept the sky, and the dew was yet undried by morning, when Kate met her undeclared lover again; and not once but a thousand times, frequently accompanied by Rose and de Vere, did they stroll through the fresh blossomed vices at sunrise, or listen in the shade to the huddling night-ingle at evening. One night, the moon was sinking in the sky, but still with faint lustre filled the pleached alley down which the damsels were wandering, when parting the boughs Lord Guilford joined them, and in an instant more Sir Owen leaped into the group, and in a few moments Kate found herself arm in arm with the knight at some distance from the others. Up to this time, whatever might have been guessed by each of the other's sentiments, no actual protestations of love had passed between them. Taking from the folds of her dress a slip of paper, and unrolling it, the princess repeated with mock solemnity a madrigal whose burden was herself.

"If I had ever seen Sir Owen's pen-strokes," she said, gaily, "I would vow that these were part and parcel of them. I picked them up where he should not have dropped them—at the feet of the old lord-chamberlain!"

He extended his hand to take the paper.

"Nay, sir," said she, restoring them to their former position, "they are far too precious to be restored."

They were sitting on a mossy bank from whence she started to secure a glowworm that glimmered across the way.

"Nay," returned Sir Owen, "these verses are too trifling to be the subject of thy highness's laughter."

"If I laugh at them," she rejoined, glancing at him over her shoulder while stooping to the worm, "it is with the secret joy that cannot contain itself!"

"The lady jests with a simple baron. Such joy is not for the great, only for those who love."

She rose; she turned; she came forward and stood before him; bending, she looked into his eyes.

"But I do love thee!" she said, in an earnest yet half-pleading tone, "and we love, though all the wooing is on my side!" and stooping lower, she touched her cherry lips to his.

Bold as the little charmer was, she trembled when feeling his arms encircling her, his lips returning her kisses, his breath coming and going on her cheek; while with all the forgetfulness that such love begets, he uttered more melting and passionate sentences than she could ever have dared wish to hear.

When they parted that night she wore his ring, a plain, gold circle, upon her finger, and locking her joy in her own heart, sat long alone, only gazing at this outward token of it. For a few days, in a state of blissfulness, they two saw and heard only each other; and then fearing lest he should weary of his gilded toy, Kate, in order to rivet faster his chains, entered on a course to loosen them altogether, by playing off her charms on Lord Guilford, conversing and accompanying him instead of her lover, and, in short, according to her ability, flitting to the last extreme with this languid gentleman. At first, Sir Owen refused to believe his eyes, then sought a hundred excuses for her, and finally, stung by maddening jealousy, poured a hundred vehement reproaches upon her. Kate had thought that such conduct would only increase his passion, and stood still with the first words, prepared for a little scene, but now amazed and unwarrantably indignant, she turned upon him with angry eyes.

"Let Sir Owen remember another time, that when I give my word I keep it," she returned. "Because I am promised to one man, shall I shut myself up like a Turk in a seraglio, from all others? No! if such is to be my fate, better escape it now. I choose always to receive the homage of whom I please. Sir Owen is released from a bond that must be galling, since he strives by such petty means to break it! I scorn him and his vows!" And tearing the ring from her finger, she flung it at his feet and he saw her no more.

That day, Queen Isabel came down into the country and took her daughter away from the place under her own protection, since the English, invading the French territory, had taken Haulleur, vowing in addition, to seize the princess for their king's wife, and certain provinces as her dowry. Braced by pride and anger, Kate firmly put down any remorse that might linger in her heart, and believing that she had trodden out the flames of love as suddenly as they had been kindled, went gayly off with her mother, while Sir Owen still lingered in the forester's cottage.

One night a herald tapped at the lattice. "Englishman," whispered he, "your king desires you! Not sixty leagues hence he prepares for the French onset. Harry the Fifth counts on Sir Owen Tudor to win a battle for him!"

Like sparks of fire struck in the dark by sudden blows from steel armor, so memories of war and longing desires for the din of arms and clang of trumpets, flashed through the soul of Sir Owen, and snatching his armor, he left Lord Guilford to follow at his ease, and dashed through the forest with the herald till they reached the English camp.

Meanwhile, Kate had been warned by her mother that if they were defeated her hand would be the price of peace, and half in pique at her lover, half in caprice, she had consented, while Queen Isabel, reviewing the French forces, destitute as they were of muscular commons, and abounding in revelling noblesse, could not for a moment doubt the issue.

Day after day the hostile armies had marched up the opposite river-side, and at last, the English, crossing, had forced the French to withdraw to a village some miles distant, where, spending the night in carousal, the latter awaited the dawn which, as they expected, would be the last the English would ever see. Thirty deep, and a line long as the eye could reach, swelled the crescent of their forces at sunrise, heavily laden with armor, and composed almost entirely of cavalry; but a mere handful, light, half-naked, standing only three deep, on marshy ground, the bowmen of King Henry surrounded him where he rode, glittering in kingly insignia, and determined on death without victory. For a few moments the battle arrays stood regarding each other, till three French dukes rode out and haughtily demanded surrender.

"Back for your lives, gentlemen!" returned King Henry, and with the thundering "charge!" that volleyed through the ranks, the archers sprang forward, hiving the earth, planted their stakes and blackened the air with hurdling darts that turned the French boasters, already half sunk in mire, with the direst loss and confusion. Then began the melee. Shouts, groans, trumpet brays and hantboy peals, whistling arrows, clashing swords, splitting lances, shrieks, curses in divers tongues and spurting streams of blood.

"Well done, Sir Owen!" cried the cheering voice of the English king, as with battle-axe and broadsword swinging in either hand, the Welsh knight had cleared a square of twenty gayly caparisoned foes around him, and now lifting his helmet from his aching brows wiped his dripping sword upon the saddle cloth. "Had I a dozen like thee the battle were mine ere now!"

Sir Owen glanced at the man for whom he was winning a bride and that bride almost his own, while rapidly twining a long lock of chestnut hair in the crest, then with a jerk replaced his helmet, tightened the strap, and shouting to his battalions to follow him, "on, on!" dashed into the centre of the French. A thousand arms encircled him, great blows parried his, torrents of red blood bathed him, showers of yellow sparks flashed out in a sudden darkness before his eyes, a shock, a concussion upon his head as of two worlds grinding together—darkness closed round him, light and sense flowed from him, and he fell on the field of Azincourt. But Henry won.

Six months, victorious as Mars, Henry traversed France, and fortress after fortress fell before him. At length Rouen opened its gates to his conquering host, and there, for the first time, he beheld his future queen. Kate had never once paused to reflect, and clad in gay recklessness she danced up the hours that led her to his feet; and with the same gay sprightliness that had enraptured Sir Owen, she made Henry the Fifth acknowledge her power. Ignorant of her lover's fate, Sir Owen had taken her at her word she thought, and as the king's wife, she returned with him triumphant to England.

A year had passed, and if any repentance of her sudden anger that evening in the wood came to Kate, she never showed it by sign or word, but with merriest quips wiled the hours away; and if any tears were shed by her, or any mournful moments sighed alone when Lord Guilford brought Rose, his bride, to court, they were shrouded in the deepest secrecy.

One day, at Westminster, they were hanging trophies taken in the late wars, and many of the courtiers, together with the king and queen, were straying through the aisles and among the gorgeous chapels. A familiar banner caught Kate's eye. It was one wrought by herself and sisters for the Duc d'Alencon.

"Who captured that?" she inquired of the king.

"Is it thy finger-work, Kate?" he rejoined. "It was taken by poor Tudor, the bravest knight in Wales, and for the matter of that, in England itself. I would he had lived, that thy hand might have given him an earldom!"

She waited a moment before asking with a steady voice:

"And where is he now?"

"I saw him fall on the field of Azincourt."

Others drew near, and the queen turned aside, and through a low arch entered a chapel alone. A giant weight seemed to be crushing down her heart, hot tears, not to be heeded, to be withering her sight, her reason reeled, and when, after a time, the king entered, he found her fainted on the floor. Sir Owen was amply revenged.

The next month was an eventful one for Kate; for out of Rouen in France, whither they had gone, she followed an interminable funeral procession and buried her husband, dead of a long, silent disease, among the Kings of Westminster.

But while all these things were transpiring, in the forester's cottage in the old French park, a wounded man lay for many months in the alternate delirium and stupor of fever. At last, one night, a gleam of intelligence lighted his dim eye. He surveyed, questioning, the crone who peered over him with the dripping candle in her hand.

"Ten months, honey, hast thou lain at death's door. Now by Saint Mary's soul thou'lt gain flesh, heart and health!" whispered she.

And slowly as the year wheeled round again, with the first blush of spring, he rose, feeble but recovered, and in the depth of summer Sir Owen, with the strength of manhood once more at his command, left the well-recomended old nurse and journeyed on a knight's devoir through Germany and Spain, till full three years had dragged away; but still hidden in his bosom was a long lock of chestnut hair, once well soaked in blood.

Time went by, both for Sir Owen and the English court, and summer was again at its luxuriant height in the white-cliffed islands. A longing wish had filled Kate's heart to see the land that had nurtured Sir Owen, to roam through Wales, and perchance to set foot in the very castle where he had first drawn breath. Not with any hope or desire of seeing him, nor with any knowledge of his existence, for she believed him dead, but partly to solace the wild grief and remorse that had ever since waged in her heart. Men thought it was the queen who was inconsolable; they mistook, it was only that Kate who had broken the pledge she made to Sir Owen Tudor. She had ridden all day over the long slopes of the blue hills, and at sunset had housed her train in an old romantic castle whose lord had offered it, through a page, to the travelling strangers. Breakfasting alone next morning, alone she sauntered out through the wild glens, for she was now near the village of his birth. Pale were her cheeks, her hair damp and loose, and her whole array, far from its former costliness, was only carelessly simple. She had wandered some distance, when suddenly at the base of a willow growing out of a rock, she confronted a well known figure, sitting motionless and looking dreamily into the still water. Bubbles of light broke in the depths of her hazel eyes. Sudden emotions blossomed below her temples. Was it a vision—was she awake—had the dead king of England deceived her—was Sir Owen Tudor alive and here before her? She stepped forward, trembling in every nerve.

"Owen!"

The knight looked up.

"Kate!"

"Thou wert not then slain at Azincourt?"

"Your majesty, I am here!" he returned, rising and bowing, while he laid a bitter stress on the first two words.

A moment longer she looked at him, still trembling with painful agitation, and then casting her eyes on the ground, flung herself at his feet.

"Forgive me! forgive!" she cried. "O, Owen, can you never forget?"

The old embrace and the impassioned kiss were his only responses, assuring her of pardon.

"And can you now love me, unfaithful that I was, as then?" she murmured, as they stood there, sunshine flecked in soft green shade, a little after.

"More precious," he returned, "because more longed, more suffered for!"

The queen of England was her own mistress, and happier than ever the princess of France had been, was the ancestress of two dynasties, the baroness of Tudor.

ANCIENT CITY DISCOVERED.

An interesting pamphlet has recently been published by Mr. Bellasis, collector of Hyderabad, in Scinde, Asia, containing an account of his examinations and discoveries on the site of the ancient city of Brahminabad, on a branch of the old bed of the Indus. Tradition affirms that the city—the capital of the Hindu kingdom to which the tide of Mohammedan invasion had scarcely penetrated—was destroyed by fire from heaven and by earthquake, on account of the wickedness of its ruler. The investigations of Mr. Bellasis seem to prove that the place really was destroyed by some terrible convulsion of nature, which probably at the same time completely changed the course of the Indus. On no other supposition can a ruin be accounted for that was at once so sudden and so complete. Skeletons were found in every house that was opened and in the streets, some crouched together and there buried; others crushed flat by a falling weight, the pieces of stone or brick still in some cases buried in the fractured skull. Numerous coins and other valuables have already been discovered, carved figures in ivory, engravings on cornelian and agate, a set of ivory chessmen, and the like.—Boston Courier.

THE MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

The solid rock which turns the edge of the chisel, bears forever the impress of the leaf and the acorn received long, long since, ere it had become hardened by time and the elements. If we trace back to its fountain, the mighty torrent which fertilized the land with its copious streams, or sweeps over it with a devastating flood, we shall find it dripping in crystal drops from some mossy crevice among the distant hills; so, too, the gentle feelings and affections that enrich and adorn the heart, and the mighty passions that sweep away all the barriers of the soul and desolate society, may have sprung up in the infant bosom in the sheltered retirement of home. "I should have been an atheist," said John Randolph, "if it had not been for one recollection; and that was the memory of the time when my departed mother used to take my little hands in hers, and caress me on my knees to say, 'Our Father which art in heaven!'"—Trumpet, Boston.

BOOTH, THE ACTOR.

A friend tells us an anecdote of Booth, the great tragedian, which we do not recollect having seen in print. It occurred in the palm days of his fame, before the sparkle of his black eye had been dimmed by that bone of genius—strong drink.

Booth and several friends had been invited to dine with an old gentleman in Baltimore of distinguished kindness, urbanity and piety. The host, though disapproving of theatres and theatre-going, had heard so much of Booth's remarkable powers, that curiosity to see the man had in this instance overcome all his scruples and prejudices. After the entertainment was over, lamps lighted, and the company seated in the drawing room, some one requested Booth, as a particular favor, and one all present would doubtless appreciate, to read aloud the Lord's Prayer. Booth expressed his willingness to afford them this gratification, and all eyes were turned expectantly upon him. Booth rose slowly and reverentially from his chair. It was wonderful to watch the play of emotion that convulsed his countenance. He became deadly pale, and his eyes, turned to unblinking upwards, were wet with tears. As yet he had not spoken. The silence could be felt. It became absolutely painful, until the spell was broken as if by an electric shock, as his rich toned voice, from his white lips, syllabled forth, "Our Father, who art in heaven," etc., with pathos and perfect solemnity.

He finished. The silence continued. Not a voice was heard! A murmur moved in his wrapt audience, until from a remote corner of the room a subdued sob was heard, and the old gentleman (their host) stepped forward with streaming eyes and tottering frame, and seized Booth by the hand. "Sir," said he, in broken accents, "you have afforded me a pleasure for which my whole future life will feel grateful. I am an old man, and every day, from my boyhood to the present time, I thought I had repeated the Lord's Prayer, but I never heard it before, never." "You are right," replied Booth; "to read that prayer as it should be read has cost me the severest study and labor for thirty years, and I am far from being yet satisfied with my rendering of that wonderful production. Hardly one person in ten thousand comprehends how much beauty, tenderness and grandeur can be condensed in a space so small and words so simple. That prayer of itself sufficiently illustrates the truth of the Bible, and stamps its seal of divinity."

So great was the effect produced (says our informant, who was present) that conversation was sustained but a short time longer, in subdued monosyllables.—Boston Gazette.

A TURKISH SCHOOL.

What a picture it was! On the cushioned divan, which runs along one side of the room, sat three venerable looking Imams, in flowing robes, long beards, white turbans, and with chibouques. On their right and left, upon the divan, were seated a dozen boys, of ages varying from six to twelve, whose dress marked them of high rank. In a conspicuous position among these was a tiny boy, about four years old. He wore a little coat of crimson velvet, embroidered in gold; trousers and vest to match; a leather land, richly worked, round his waist, from which hung a tiny sword. On his head a velvet fez, beautifully embroidered, with a heavy gold tassel, completed his attire. On a small desk before the Imams were several large books in the Turkish language. One was lying open. Below the divan were rows of little Turks, all dressed alike, in the coat and trousers and crimson cloth fez. They sat in rows on the floor, like an English infant school, and their little red caps made them look, at a distance, like a bed of poppies. Truth to say, they behaved a great deal better than the same number of little Britons would have done. Our entrance attracted their attention. Only for an instant they gave us a look, then settled themselves again. And now one Imam called up one boy after another to read a sentence out of the great book; when he had finished, all the school cried out, "Amen." At length the little boy, whose dress we have described, descended from his seat, and stood at the Imam's feet—then slowly repeated each word after the Imam. He accomplished a sentence; a very loud "Amen," followed, and there was a buzz and a smile on every one's face, as if some feat had been accomplished. The child returned to his place, and the other boys went up in turns for their lesson.—J. T. C. Smith.

THE STORY OF A THRONE.

Of the uncertainty attending the wives and fortunes of children born to inherit the throne of France, the Paris correspondent of the London Times writes: "Not a little remarkable is it to observe that from the accession of Louis XIV. to the present time, not a single king or governor of France, though none of them, with the exception of Louis XVIII., have been childless, has been succeeded at his demise by his son. Louis XIV. survived his son, his grandson and several of his great-grandchildren, and was succeeded at last by one of the younger children of his grandson, the Duke of Burgundy. Louis XV. survived his son, and was succeeded by his grandson, Louis XVI. Louis XVI. left a son behind him, but that son perished in the filthy dungeon to which the cruelty of the terrorists had confined him. The king of Rome, to whom Napoleon fondly hoped to bequeath the boundless empire he had won, died a colonel in the Austrian service. Louis XVIII. was, as we have said, childless. The Duke de Berri fell by the hand of an assassin in the lifetime of Charles X., and his son, the Duke de Bordeaux, is an exile from the land which his ancestors regarded as their own estates. The eldest son of Louis Philippe perished by an untimely accident, and his grandson and heir does not sit upon the throne of his grandfather. Thus, then, it appears that for upwards of two hundred years, in no one of the dynasties to which France has been subjected, has the son succeeded to the throne of the father."—Sunday Dispatch.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR
BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 100,000 copies!

Any person ordering one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

THE GREAT BOSTON HORSE EXHIBITION. AT THE AGRICULTURAL FAIR IN BOSTON. OCTOBER, 1856.

[For description, see page 349.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SONNET.

BY MARY CORBINA CLAIR.

A heaven-born love came in my soul to dwell;
 What dainty flowers now decked the halls of thought,
 With rainbow hues the future life was fraught,
 And on my heartstrings, like sweet music fell
 The dreams no worldly prudence could dispel.
 Cool, sparkling raindrops thirsty earth has sought,
 And into living forms of beauty wrought,
 That blossoms fair might gem the wood and dell;
 So my glad spirit drank the heaven-sent dream,
 And forth, like tender buds and emerald spray
 Sprang cherished thoughts, hopes and the radiant gleam
 My spirit caught of the eternal day;
 Be hushed, O grief! Heaven surely will redeem
 Those rose-tinted thoughts, so rudely swept away.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ASHMEADE.

BY WM. D. OLIVER.

"FAREWELL, beloved Ashmeade!" I exclaimed, as I stood on the topmost height of the hill at whose foot the beautiful village was built. "Farewell, sweet place of my birth! It may be the last time that my eyes shall behold thee—but when I forget thee, may my right hand forget its cunning!"

The first gray light of morning was just changing to a dull red, and the light breeze springing up, was shaking a shower of dewdrops from every bush. I looked down upon the still sleeping town. How beautiful it looked in its quiet loveliness! There was a window open in one white house, and I was almost sure that the curtain was parted for a moment, and a face was looking out. It might be imagination—but I was willing to take the sweet delusion away with me.

At the door of that house, I had parted the night before with Leonore Howard, and had spoken words which only lovers use. With that smile shining upon me, I could have been too happy to live or die with Leonore; but my judgment told me that I had no right to bind her to my destiny until I had toiled, and received the reward of toil. I was going away for this purpose. I was determined to make a name for myself—a name which should not disgrace the choice of Leonore Howard. I did not care for wealth. It was not my ambition to compete with those who, in sacrificing to fashion and show, destroy their chance of any other reward than the poor notoriety which they may gain by the sacrifice.

My eye fixed upon two objects, which stood so near each other that one could not be seen without the other. One was almost a palace, built by one of those men who obtain fortunes by gaming, or at least—to use the softest word—by speculation. The other was a neat white cottage, occupied by his own brother, a man whose rare gifts might seem to raise him higher than the other, even in the world's judgment. Why were not these men on the same round of the ladder? Simply because one would not prostitute his fine powers of mind to acquire wealth by unfair means, and the other did.

"Yes, Leonore!" I exclaimed, as I turned my eyes from the home where she dwelt, "I will bring you a name for which you shall not have need to blush, or I will never return."

It was not that I hoped or expected to perform any great action, which should turn the eyes of the world towards me. I felt that Leonore's heart would be satisfied with one who would keep fast his integrity, and do all that he could for suffering humanity.

She was a noble woman—that Leonore Howard! As I look at her now, through the dim lapse of years, there are thousands of women whom I have known or heard of, who fade into mere painted butterflies before her. My heart still does her justice, although she was untrue to me. Let me not blame her! Few could have passed through the same ordeal, and not have changed.

I pass lightly over the events of the next three years. I had succeeded in my business, which led me to various and far off places, being that of engineering. I had made sufficient to lay by a handsome sum for future contingencies, besides the regular supply which I sent my widowed mother and invalid sister.

While absent, I came in contact, unwillingly enough, with a young man by the name of Edson. I say, unwillingly, for there was something in his eye, brilliant and flashing as it was, and in the low, sensual look of his really handsome mouth, that excited my aversion. Still, our business transactions brought us together in the hours devoted to our daily avocations, and when evening came, Edson was forever at my room. I would have gladly been alone, for I always had letters to write; but his manner was so cordial, and he seemed so sure of a warm reception, that my hospitality could not be refused to one who appeared to expect it.

I had been writing nearly all night, when he came unexpectedly into my room one morning, while my desks and writing materials still lay in confusion. I had forgotten that my letters were lying on the table ready to be mailed, and I soon had the vexation of seeing Edson turning them over, with his usual familiar sort of insolence, and looking at the directions.

"Leonore Howard!" he exclaimed, as her name met his eye on one of the letters. "Do you know her, Allan?"

I was angry, but I resolved not to deny what I was willing that the whole world should know; so I signified that Miss Howard was my affianced wife. I was thunderstruck by the look which came over that face. His beauty now was the beauty of a demon. He almost foamed at the mouth, and his eyes literally glared at me with rage.

"It is false!" he exclaimed; then lowering his tone suddenly, he subsided into a calmer manner. "Excuse me, Mr. Allan," he said at length, his voice still quivering with excitement, "but I have a right to know how long, and in what manner your acquaintance with Miss Howard has been."

"Nay," I answered, "that question would more properly come from me. But I do not ask it, nor will I allow that lady's name to be used in any conversation between us. You will oblige me by dropping all subjects relating to her, now and forever."

He muttered a few words between his closed teeth, while I gathered up my letters, put on my coat and prepared for going out. He seemed amazed at my coolness, and yet I had certainly given him no reason to doubt my spirit. He affected to speak gaily, as he said, in a laughing tone, "I bide my time," and we went away together.

Owing partly, perhaps, to that indefinable dread which we sometimes have of finding a disagreeable truth confirmed, I forbore to speak of Edson in my letters to Leonore. She had never named any person, and I could not bring myself to write his name to her.

Soon after this, Edson left town, much to my surprise, for his business was lucrative, and promised to be permanent. I tried to forget the disagreeable episode in my life which he had occasioned; but in vain. My thoughts still recurred to it, and hovered round Ashmeade and Leonore, as the dove hovers over its nest. I ventured, in my next letter to my sister Julia, to ask if she had ever heard of any one of the name of Edson. Poor, crippled Julia! It was a great effort for her to write at all; but her love for me made her exert herself to pen the following:

"DEAR FREDERIC.—You ask me if I know any one of the name of Edson. While you were at school in Greenfield, many years ago, there was a young lad of that name—Alfred Edson, I think—passing a few months here with the Merrifields. He was a bold youth, with a handsome face, and found great favor with those who do not look much deeper. I beg your pardon, dear brother, for speaking of it; but since you would not have asked the question unless you wished to know all, I must tell you that he was almost constantly with Leonore Howard. People said they were engaged, mere children as they were; but the report soon died out, and I have never heard his name since."

Here, then, was some food for conjecture. I shrunk from mentioning the matter to Leonore, yet it was right that I should do so. I had been so happy in the thought that I was the first who had ever disturbed the pure current of Leonore's affections, that it seemed like sacrilege to me to know that even in her school-girl days, she had been loved by another, and, as it seemed, had been thought by others to have accepted and returned that love.

I walked my room for hours that night, after receiving Julia's letter. How did I know how to interpret Edson's absence? Perhaps even now, the falcon was hovering above the peaceful nest which I had left at Ashmeade.

"Leonore! Leonore!" I exclaimed, wildly, madly, "come to me!" As true as fate, I heard a voice like a deep echo, repeat my words "come to me!" I sat down like one in a dream. I could not move a finger. The words dwelt on my mind like a spell. I do not know to this day why I did not obey that voice. It must have been because I feared being thought absurd, or else that the weight of my engagements prevented the breaking of my faith with my employers—for the interests of an entire railway company depended on my fulfilling them.

I tried all the next day to believe that I was exciting myself unnecessarily—that all was well. I tried to believe that Julia was mistaken—that she had tried to get up some story, merely because I had asked her. It would not do! When night and darkness came again, I was again haunted with those words, "come to me!" Could I have gone conscientiously, the next hour would have found me on the high road for Ashmeade! I chafed with madness at the idea that my engagements here were not of a nature that could be set aside, so that I could go at once and satisfy myself that all was safe.

Leonore's letters had been sad and despondent. Then they failed for several weeks; and when, in answer to my distracted questionings, she at last wrote, it was to tell me that she had been dangerously, miserably ill; that she had expected and longed for my coming, and that they had told her, when she grew better, that her whole cry was for me to come to her.

"Well, I shall believe in presentiments after this," I said to myself—I remembered the night when my wild cry had been echoed, and I almost thought that it was a reality.

Months passed before I could free myself from my shackles. I talked with the principal agent of the railway, and begged him to release me. "Impossible, Mr. Allan," he said; "a new engineer before our plans are completed, would prove the destruction of our interests." I thought of Leonore, and fancied that her happiness and mine were of quite as much consequence as railway matters; but I was in the toils, and could not free myself. And, meanwhile, what was the state of affairs at Ashmeade?

There was a period of two months, in which I had had no single letter from Leonore. I thought so deeply upon the cause which might have operated to prevent her, that, added to my incessant toil, it threw me into a fever. I lay for weeks, struggling between the fierce and cruel fever on one hand, and the goodness of my constitution on the other.

When I recovered, another engineer had been appointed, and I was free. I gathered up the little wealth which I had accumulated, and turned my face towards Ashmeade. I arrived at the neighboring village late at night—too late for an invalid to travel even the short two miles which intervened between the two towns; but at the first gray streak of morning, I was there. I stood again on the hillside, on which I had stood three years before, and looked down, as then, upon the white house with its open window. Everything remained unchanged. The blue smoke from the chimneys began to curl up gracefully against the reddening east; the farmers were already astir with their fragrant loads of hay bound to the city market, and here and there I could see the milkmaids carrying their pails lightly along. I fancied that I could almost hear the song from their lips.

I watched in vain for Leonore's face at the window. She did not appear, but the white curtain blew far out into the morning air, and once I saw it suddenly gathered back into the room. "Now, then, I shall see her!" I exclaimed, but she did not appear. Why did I linger so long upon that height? It was because I dreaded to learn my fate. There was something in the look which destiny had spread before my eyes, of which I knew not the import, but which appalled and frightened me. Look where I would on the map of the future, there sat a shape, mocking and grinning—and that shape always assumed the image of Alfred Edson!

At length I summoned courage to go down the hillside. At its foot I encountered several persons with whom I used to be on agreeable, if not on intimate terms. They recognized me, received my proffered hand, and treated me civilly; but the cordiality of old times was all gone. It was not the reception on which I might reasonably have counted after three years' absence. I thought it not long enough to forget, and yet long enough to be glad to see me return.

As I passed down the village, the shopkeepers were standing at their doors inhaling the fresh morning breeze. They, too, bowed coldly—evidently knowing me, but as evidently afraid to treat me cordially. I strode proudly on, for I began to feel angry and indignant. This was but a sorry reception after my wanderings in the rough world. I said to myself, as I went on, that there was one heart at least that would receive and bless me in my coming—my mother's! Had I not often heard

"there is none
 In all this cold and hollow world—no found
 Of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within A mother's heart?"

I knocked at my mother's door; the old, familiar door, round which poor Julia and myself had so often played in our childhood—she, a little frail and feeble girl; I, her guardian and protector. My mother welcomed me as I expected. Julia wept tears of passionate joy. They had been lonely enough since the brother and son had been absent. I thought this welcome would well repay me for the cold looks I had received that morning; and when my mother spread her little round breakfast table, and placed upon it the food, which her own hands had prepared, she wore such a look of placid contentment, that I almost resolved that I would never again leave Ashmeade.

But Leonore! I must visit her that very hour; and not until I had declared my intention of so doing, did Julia bring herself to tell me that Leonore was engaged to Alfred Edson.

"Edson here in Ashmeade!" I exclaimed. "Tell me, Julia, how long this has been?"

"Ever since last autumn," she replied, "and I understand they are to be married immediately. I thought you knew it all long ago."

I could not credit this. I must hear it from Leonore's own lips; and I walked over to the "white house" immediately after breakfast. The servant who opened the door, looked surprised; but I went boldly in, like one who is sure of a good reception, and inquired for Miss Howard. She came directly, but started and turned pale on seeing me. I offered her my hand, which she did not take, but coldly asked me to be seated. I resolved to know what this meant—and then followed a stormy interview, such as I never participated in before nor since.

She accused me of unfaithfulness to my promises; of reckless and dissipated conduct; of trifling with other hearts, and breaking them by desertion—in short, had I been guilty of a tithe of what she laid to my charge, I should have loathed myself completely. I asked the name of her informant. She would not tell me, but answered that it was one who would no doubt substantiate all the statements that had been made. I would not trust myself to mention Edson's name, but I well knew the serpent that had destroyed my Eden. I was mad, foaming with rage and indignation. It was wrong to feel so with Leonore, for I might have known that she was grossly deceived.

At the door of her house, as I turned away with a burning cheek and a flushed brow, I encountered Edson. His air of cool, impudent assurance acted as a sedative to my rage, and I passed him with a contemptuous look.

"What, Allan," said he, "have you no word for an old friend?"

"Friend!" I exclaimed. "Say, friend, and you will be nearer the truth."

I would not stop to bandy words with him, and, turning on my heel, I left him to make his projected visit to Leonore. I wondered afterwards at my own forbearance in not performing some wild action in attacking him; but I said to myself, as he had said on a former occasion, "I, too, bide my time!" His calumnies, then, were undoubtedly the cause of my cool reception at Ashmeade! He it was who had poisoned the minds of my old neighbors and friends against me! Scoundrel! I defied him inwardly, and yet it was a bitter cup to drink.

While I was striding homeward, some one behind me laid a hand on my shoulder, and a kindly voice greeted me. It was that of Frank Barnes, an old friend and schoolmate, who had gone away from Ashmeade the year before I had left it, but who had long since returned to its quiet shades.

"I have been studying law," he said, in answer to my inquiries, "and have hung out my shingle on Main Street. Come over to my office, my boy, and let us have a quiet smoke together."

I went with him, and he soon established me in a "Sleepy Hollow" of a chair, and himself in another equally luxurious. We talked of old times, of old school days, of our subsequent adventures—of everything, in short, save the one subject that came nearest to my heart. At last, Frank blundered upon it himself. I winced a little, for a man does not like to display his heart-wounds; but Frank's manner was so cordial, so full of sympathy, so replete with friendship for me and contempt for Edson, that I threw myself upon his confidence, and he returned it to full.

Only a week before, he said, he had received a letter from a brother lawyer at the West, in which he had casually mentioned some auspicious circumstances in which Edson's name, among many others, figured quite conspicuously. He had taken pains to find out if it was the person of the same name at Ashmeade, and was expecting an answer with full particulars. He was inclined to believe that it was the same; and as he always disliked him, from one of those strange antipathies which sometimes come over us involuntarily, he seemed rather to hope that he was not mistaken!

In the interim of hearing from his friend, he would visit Leonore, and occasionally express his conviction that what she had heard was false, and could be proved to be the invention of a single individual, who would yet be brought to justice. He brought me the assurance that Leonore seemed somewhat impressed with his words, and that she observed that, if they were true, a great wrong had been committed against me somewhere.

"This is something gained, Allan," said Frank, "to have set her to thinking."

I thought it mighty little; but I knew what importance lawyers attach to trifles sometimes, and I allowed him to chuckle as he pleased over his "case." In a week more, he received an answer to his inquiries:

"The very one," wrote his Western friend, "and a greater villain never went unhung. Had he continued in this township twelve hours longer, he would have ridden out in a very uncomfortable garb, I do assure you. Make what use of my letter you please. Show it to the pretty young lady you speak of; give it to her discarded lover, and let him have the pleasure of reading it to her himself—in short, do anything you please with it that you wish. Nothing could delight the good people here more than to know that he was taking a year's lodging at one of your most famous public buildings, or, indeed, they would not grudge him ten years in the least."

Frank clapped his hands with delight, danced round the office, and performed a number of extravaganzas, quite unusual for the dignified gentleman of the green bag. He was as interested in the "case," as if it had been likely to bring him in a handsome fee. Nothing would content him but the idea of reading the letter "in open court," as he called it. So, one evening when we were sure that Edson was there, we called at Mr. Howard's, and were shown where the whole family sat assembled in conclave, probably on my delinquencies.

A dead silence followed our entrance. Mrs. Howard, who had always liked me, alone looked pleasant and kindly. Mr. Howard was a puzzled air, and Leonore looked annoyed. Edson wore his usual satisfied face. Frank, soon weary of this, remarked to Miss Howard that he had received some Western news, which he thought would interest her. He then read the letter. Before he had got half through, Edson rose and left the room, but was stopped by an officer placed there by Frank, according to the authority transmitted to him.

A cry from Mrs. Howard made me turn from this very satisfactory exhibition. Leonore had fainted, and was taken up stairs, where she remained for several hours insensible. A violent fever was the result of the shock she had received. I was almost frantic, and spent most of my time in Frank's office, lamenting that we had opened the eyes of Leonore to her lover's guilt and disgrace.

"You are a fool!" said Frank, one day, when he was tired out with my "Jeremiads," as he called them. And this exceedingly curt and expressive sentence had quite a solative effect upon me; and as I had heard that day that Leonore was out of danger, I concluded to await the event.

I waited long, but it was not without reward; for I one day received a note with the single sentence, "Come to me," inscribed with a pencil, in a feeble hand. It seemed like the realization of the old echo that had troubled me when afar off. I did not linger, you may be sure. Frank called after me with one of his old saws about "haste," but I sped on, until I found myself ushered into Mr. Howard's back parlor, where lay what was once my Leonore on a low couch by the window. I stopped involuntarily on the threshold. She lifted her head from the pillow, raised her feeble arms towards me, and, in a moment, she was enclosed within my clasping embrace. Our mute silence was perhaps more expressive than any words could have been.

I staid until the doctor came and ordered Leonore to be carried back to her chamber. "Too much color," he muttered, as they bore her away, "another fever setting in." I did not believe it. I knew what had raised that color. She grew well rapidly, for all exciting talk about Edson was carefully hushed up before her. She does not know that he is committed for ten years. We are to be married as soon as the roses deepen a little more on her cheek.

Frank—the rogue!—has been making love to my pale sister Julia, without either of them telling me. They declared they could not bear to proclaim their happiness when I was so miserable! Really, my respect for human nature is growing stronger after that! We are to have a "pair of cottages" that were built for two brothers, who foolishly left them for gold-seeking, leaving their wives to board in hotels, or coquette at watering-places. My mother, who would otherwise be left quite lonely by this arrangement, is to pass her time alternately with Julia and Leonore. The only drawbacks—and whose happiness is without one!—are Julia's feeble health, and my unavoidable absences on business. For the rest, our lives will, I trust, flow on serene and cheerful.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BOSELLI.

A PASSAGE IN THE LIFE OF HAYDN.

BY RALPH TRYON.

THE old prince, Antony Esterhazy, was seated on his throne, surrounded by his court, at Eisenstadt, which was assembled for the particular purpose of celebrating his birthday. The prince was passionately fond of music and a finished amateur himself, hence the early portion of the day had been allotted to this, his favorite diversion. To Friedberg, his principal composer, was entrusted the entire direction of this part of the ceremony, who, with a wilful eccentricity, had kept his noble patron in ignorance of the rich treat of harmony he had in store for him on this occasion.

The orchestra had taken their places, but Friedberg stood aloof, with a self-satisfied smile resting on his iron features, as though simply a careless spectator, but his glance wandered from time to time to a young man distributing among the performers their scores, whose sombre countenance, agitated features and tremulous fingers seemed in marked contrast to the joyous throng about him who appeared indifferent of his existence.

Prince Antony fidgeted in his chair and began to show evident signs of impatience, which the maestro feigned not to perceive, but still preserved his attitude of supreme indifference. His noble patron was about to utter an angry exclamation at the delay, when his glance rested upon the lovely features of Boselli, a charming Italian vocalist, recently attached to his service. By a sign he bade her immediately draw near to him.

"Ah, my lovely warbler!" he exclaimed, "so you are here to honor your old patron upon his birthday?"

"Your highness, I wish you many happy returns of the same."

"Tush, child, they only come round too often. But I am vexed, mademoiselle, at this tardiness of Friedberg, he who is always prompt to a moment."

"Does the maestro direct this morning?"

"By our lady, I know not. He has not even presented me a programme; but he has his whims and so have I, and if I am his prince he is my prince of musicians, and sterling as gold itself."

"Your highness is so proverbially kind to all attached to his service that I am emboldened to question you still further. May I ask who that young stranger is who is now distributing the orchestral scores?"

"I have not noticed. Ah! I see him now, with his Moorish countenance, but as you say, he is a stranger, and unknown to me even by name. Some poor protegee of Friedberg's, doubtless, who has the ambition to become attached to my service. Perhaps his librarian; nothing more, for those dull features certainly can never be lighted with the inspiration of genius. What say you, child?"

I cannot see with your highness's eyes, and pardon me if I say that I think he is no ordinary person. That modest exterior may cover a great soul; and your highness is aware that genius is very capricious, and often hides itself under strange forms."

"True, child, but it is in such cases like a pent up volcano, that will force its sparks and smoke through the dull clay to reveal its lurking place."

"See, your highness, he has ascended the stand of the maestro and has assumed the baton."

At that moment the orchestra commenced the performance. It was a symphony, commencing with a brilliant allegro, so rich in the depths of harmony and with so novel a management of instrumentation, that this movement was not half finished when the astonished prince, unable to control his delight and curiosity, stopped the performance, and called Friedberg to his side.

"Who is the author of this fine composition?" he asked.

"If your highness will but look in the direction of the orchestra you may perceive him."

"What, that gloomy Moor?"

"No more a Moor than your highness or your servant," answered the old composer, testily.

"What is the matter, Friedberg? Your humor seems none of the best at this moment."

"When a prince of your highness's attainments is guilty of such an unmusical indiscretion as to stop a half completed movement from motives of simple curiosity, an old servant may be excused for being so indiscreet as to vent his impatience."

"Fairly retorted, my iron-hearted friend; but I will atone. Send the young man hither."

The author hurried forward, confused by the majesty surrounding the prince, and trembling with emotions of hope and fear.

"So you are the author of this symphony?"

The young stranger bowed confusedly.

"Well, Moor, from henceforth consider yourself in my service. And now what is the name of my new professor?"

"Joseph Haydn."

"Tis well. Hereafter attire yourself as a professor, and renounce your sombre costume. Above all," said the prince, with a nithful glance at Friedberg, "get high-heeled shoes, and do not scrimp them in that particular, for I would have your stature correspond with your genius. Away to your post—not a word—and finish the performance."

The young author, overwhelmed with gratitude, kissed the prince's hand and retired to the orchestra. This humble youth was indeed the great Haydn, who afterwards astonished the world with a complete revolution of instrumentation, and whose works will survive as long as earthly harmony exists. The symphony, with its several movements, was at length completed, and as the author descended from the stand and sought a retired corner of the orchestra, for a few moments a deep silence prevailed, which was broken with a hearty shout of applause, which even the august presence could not restrain, and in which prince, courtiers and musicians all participated in this involuntary tribute to genius.

Haydn was compelled to leave his obscure corner to be presented to the fair Boselli, and a strange emotion thrilled his breast as he met the earnest glance of those beautiful eyes. Time passed on, and the composer was no longer unknown. He had also married—not from the dictates of affection, but from what he considered a solemn duty. Keller, a peruke maker, had sometime previous found the young man in a moment of stern necessity and almost on the verge of starvation. He had received him in his own house, and doubtless believing that his talents would secure him a future eminence, had extorted from him a promise to marry his daughter Ann.

This woman, of unrefined nature, and lacking even in personal charms, could not by the connection add to the happiness of Haydn. On the contrary, her shrewish disposition and a troublesome mania she had for the society of priests, was a source of continual annoyance to him. At the instigation of her clerical friends she continually importuned him to write anthems, motets, chants, etc., which for the sake of peace he composed, to the sad interruption of his higher pursuits, and which she freely distributed among the fathers.

His moments of privacy thus continually invaded with these unpleasant demands, and in the lack of domestic comfort, opinion must not too severely censure him if his heart was filled with the image of a congenial spirit in the form of the fair Italian songstress. Attached to the same service, they were necessarily brought into the society of each other quite frequently, and it was not strange that the refined and talented Boselli should continually present to his mind an unhappy comparison to his own illiterate companion.

A deep despondency settled upon him which completely unfitted him for the prosecution of his duties; and to add to his gloom his noble patron suddenly died, whose title descended to Nicholas, to whom Haydn was comparatively unknown. But he aroused from his lethargy for a short time to perform an act of affection and duty to the memory of his illustrious benefactor; and with unwonted energy bent his powers to the composition of a requiem.

The setting sun found him seated over his finished task, but the fires of energy seemed burnt out, and the clouds of despondency had again enveloped him. He fell back in his arm-chair and as his nervous hands pressed his throbbing brow he seemed lost to everything but his own misery. He heard not the light footsteps that bore a fair form near him. He heard not the deep sigh nor noted the expression of anguish which dwelt upon those beautiful features. It was only when a tear fell upon his burning forehead that he was aroused to sensibility, to find himself in the presence of Boselli.

"You here, mademoiselle!" he exclaimed, starting from the chair.

"Yes, my dear friend, and grieved to find you so unhappy."

"True, I am most unhappy."

"Has any calamity befallen you?"

"None but my existence, continued as it is in a state of torture. Still young, but excluded from happiness, with aspirations to win a name in my beloved art, yet disheartened and dragged down to a vulgar level by connections repugnant as they are unrefined."

"Can it be Haydn, whose name is in every mouth throughout Vienna, whose compositions are travelling through Europe, and who has already won the title of the great master, who thus utters the language of despair?"

"Ah! mademoiselle, can I forget that I am human, and can I check the longings of my heart for sympathy and affection, and again can I forget my loathed connections?"

"Again you speak of your connections—will you explain, my friend?"

"It is no secret, I presume, that I married without affection, in the fulfilment of an unfortunate promise, to the loss of my repose and happiness. It was of this I spoke."

"Perhaps your affections are engaged elsewhere. Is it so?"

"Do not ask me, mademoiselle, you of all others," and again he pressed his feverish brow with his agitated hands.

"Proceed, I beg."

"Suppose I loved against hope—against possibility?"

"Well!" she echoed faintly, and clutched a chair for support, for she felt as though she was suffocating.

"Since you bid me proceed, suppose I love even you, mademoiselle."

With a faint exclamation, Boselli sank upon the floor.

"Can it be so," he exclaimed, wildly. "Can it be that this lovely creature indeed loves me," as he supported the inanimate form in his arms and made efforts to restore her to consciousness.

Mutual explanation, which followed, dissolved the doubts of each, and demonstrated how long both had loved with a passion they had considered hopeless. Haydn soon after effected a legal separation from his wife, upon whom he settled an ample allowance. Prince Nicholas became, if possible, a more ardent admirer of the musical art than his illustrious predecessor, and treated Haydn with distinguished honors.

The composer considered Boselli as necessary to his existence, and fancied that he could not write unless she was near him, and she made his happiness her daily study. Despondency had no longer the power to make him its victim, and by his untiring industry he rose step by step in his art until he acquired that eminence which has made his name revered by every one who understands a chord of harmony.

WILLIAM W. CLAPP, JR.,

EDITOR OF THE SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE.

The accompanying portrait, drawn expressly for us by Barry, from a photograph by Masury, Silsbee & Case, will be recognized by our city readers as that of William W. Clapp, Jr., the editor and proprietor of Clapp's Saturday Evening Gazette, that has for upwards of forty years, under the direction of his father and himself—under his own since 1847,—occupied a foremost position among the literary journals of our country. Mr. Clapp was born in Boston in 1826, and though but a young man, he is widely known from his connection with the Gazette, and from more substantial contributions which he has made to literature. His "Record of the Boston Stage" and his "History of the Boston Light Infantry" are monuments to his industry and literary ability. As references in matters of local history, they are invaluable. He has, besides, written several dramatic sketches that have been received with immense favor by the public. Mr. Clapp's dramatic cast of thought has led his paper in the same direction, and for years it has assumed and maintained a high reputation for its theatrical criticisms. Fair, manly and intelligent, its columns have spoken the truth of actors and players, unbiassed by personal considerations, until the Gazette has become the most reliable sheet in the country with that large class who are interested in stage productions. Though young, Mr. Clapp has seen much of the world. He spent two years and a half in Europe, and completed his education in Paris, with the vernacular of which he is perfectly familiar. There is a piquancy in his style of writing which betrays his French education. It is vivacious and sparkling, pervaded by a generous humor that softens the sting of his satire. But there are times when, his patience tried by public abuses, he applies the lash with a will, and the justice which he enforces is scarcely tempered with mercy. He does not at such times spare the sin for the sake of the sinner, though he "discriminates between the man and the act." He is never actuated by malignity. He writes from a conviction of the duty that he owes, as a journalist, to his patrons. He is ever ready to praise merit, and his praise is worth volumes of indiscriminate puffing from those who do nothing else. Mr. Clapp is highly appreciated for his strong social qualities, his generous friendship and his truthfulness as a man. There is a tenacity in his friendship that holds, and knows no change from time or circumstance. It is not idly placed, and is seldom abused, as the principle on which it is based draws as well as it imparts, and his friends cling to him. He has no love for parasites, and that interesting class cannot live in his atmosphere. He is an excellent companion, and his wit is a desirable addition on social occasions. His ingrain generosity leads him to despise meanness; his independence imparts itself to every line of his character and of his paper, and his ingrain honesty is established by every act of his life. He is a domestic man, and boasts a fine family of children, among which a bright boy is growing to take the place in the Gazette, so long and so honorably filled by his grandfather and his father. We are glad to learn that Mr. Clapp's prosperity is in keeping with his deserts, and that the Gazette, under his management, has attained a position rarely arrived at in this vicinity. Few persons appreciate the labors and responsibilities of the editorial profession. Almost every one who can write, fancies that he can edit, but never was there a graver mistake. To conduct a miscellaneous paper successfully, requires a rare combination of qualities, readiness and vivacity of composition, with various information, and unflinching industry. And it is difficult both to sparkle and to plod. Moreover, a certain indescribable tact is required in the profession, which is either innate or the fruit of long and harassing experience, in order to ride gallantly on the wave of successful enterprise.

WILLIAM W. CLAPP, ESQ.

THE COLLEGE OF NOBLES, MOSCOW.

We present below a fine engraving representing the buildings of the Nobles' College at Moscow. They form an imposing pile, ornate in architecture, and fronting on grounds beautifully laid out with shrubbery. In this institution, the children of the nobility receive a finished education, which fits them for the service of the state in camp or council, and to adorn private life, if a public career is not opened to them. The soldiers and civilians, in their characteristic costume, add life to our picture, while the droshky in the corner gives an idea of a favorite Russian mode of locomotion. The coronation of the emperor attracted immense throngs of strangers to Moscow, and they were without exception enraptured at the extent, magnificence and originality of this most splendid of modern cities. It is eminently Russian, and it is for its characteristics that the Russians love it. To the traveller who is expatiating on the beauties of St. Petersburg, they shake their heads and say, "Wait till you see Moscow." These two cities are now connected by a railroad finely built, but formerly the journey between the two was long and toilsome. It is four hundred miles southeast of St. Petersburg. It is surrounded by a wall twenty miles in circuit. Since 1812, the period of the French invasion, when it was destroyed by fire, Moscow has been built up in a style of magnificence far surpassing that of the old city. But the style of the city is different from that of the cities in the west of Europe, being oriental.

DOMESTICATION OF ANIMALS.

The power which animals as well as men possess, of conforming themselves to new situations, and forming new habits adapted to new circumstances, is a proof of a capability of improvement. The wild dogs in the plains of La Plata, burrow, because there is no security for them above ground against stronger beasts of prey. In the same country, owls make their nests in the ground, because there are neither trees nor buildings to afford them concealment. A clergyman in Iceland, by sowing angelica upon a lake-island some miles from the sea, not only attracted gulls and wild ducks to breed there, but brought about an alliance between those birds, who are not upon neighborly terms elsewhere. Both perceived that the new plants afforded better shelter from the wind and rain than anything which they had seen before; there was room enough for both, and the neighborhood produced so much good will, that the gulls protected the weaker birds not only against the ravens, who are common enemies, but against another species of gull which attacks the duck's nest. A change more remarkable than either of these, is that which the common hearth-cricket has undergone in its very constitution as well as in all its ways of life, since men built houses and inhabited cold climates. The field-cricket in North America, which buries itself during the winter ten inches deep, and there lies torpid, began about a hundred years ago to avail itself of the works of man and to take up its abode in the chimneys. This insect even likes man for a bedfellow, not with any such felonious intentions as are put in execution by smaller and viler vermin, but for the sake of warmth. The Swedish traveller, Kalm, says that when he and his companions were forced to sleep in uninhabited places, the crickets got into the folds of their garments, so that they were obliged to make some stay every morning, and search carefully before they could get rid of them. Two species of swallows have domesticated themselves with man. We have only that which builds under the eaves in England, but in North America they have both the house swallow and the chimney swallow; the chimneys not being made use of in summer, they take possession, and keep it sometimes in spite of the smoke, if the fire is not very great. Each feather in this bird's tail ends in a stiff point, like the end of an awl; applying the tail to the side of the wall, it assists in keeping them up, while they hold on with their feet. "They make a great thundering noise all day long by flying up and down in the chimneys." Now as the Indians had not so much as a hearth made of masonry, it is an obvious question, says Kalm, where did these swallows build before the Europeans came, and erected houses with chimneys? Probably, it is supposed, in hollow trees, but certainly where they could; and it is thus shown that they took the first opportunity of improving their own condition.—Inklings of Natural History.

THE KING OF DAHOMEY.

Wilson, in his "Western Africa," says of this ruler, that he is one of the most absolute tyrants in the world; and being regarded as a demi-god by his own subjects, his actions are never questioned. No person ever approaches him, even his favorite chiefs, without prostrating themselves at full length on the ground, and covering their faces and heads with earth. It is a grave offence to suppose that the king eats, drinks, sleeps, or performs any of the ordinary functions of nature. His meals are always taken to a secret place, and any man that has the misfortune or the temerity to cast his eyes upon him in the act, is put to death. If the king drinks in public, which is done on some extraordinary occasion, his person is concealed by having a curtain held up before him, during which time the people prostrate themselves, and afterwards shout and cheer at the very top of their voices.

THE COLLEGE OF NOBLES. AT MOSCOW, RUSSIA.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATHEW M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DURFEE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

U. S. STEAM FRIGATE MERRIMAC.

This magnificent national vessel, in which we take particular pride, as she was built and launched at Charlestown, has recently returned from a voyage to Europe, in which she everywhere excited admiration and astonishment. We have already presented a view of her as she lay at anchor off the navy yard, with her sails furled, and we now depict her on double the scale, under steam and canvass, as she entered Southampton harbor, England. The English press spoke of her in terms of the highest praise. The engraving occupies the last page. It will be remembered that she was built and fitted for sea in twelve months after her keel was laid. She was designed by Mr. Leathall, chief of the bureau of construction at Washington, and built by Mr. Melvin Simmons, master carpenter, under the superintendence of Mr. Delano, naval constructor at the Charlestown navy yard. Her frame is of live oak, strengthened by diagonal plates in the inside, and outside by similar plates at the bow and stern. There are two large pivot guns on her upper deck, each weighing more than three tons. On her gun-deck there are twenty-four 9 inch guns, each weighing nearly four and a half tons. Her magazine will hold 60,000 lbs. of powder. She is a screw, and has two cylinders, and four vertical tubular boilers. Her crew, including officers, is 561 men. She is altogether a splendid craft.

TO ONE AND ALL.

We would call particular attention to our liberal prize offer for the new volume to commence January 1st, 1857. Having become completely settled in our new building, with our corps of artists, engravers and various assistants in each department, all under one roof, and possessing vastly increased facilities over any former period, the next volume of Ballou's Pictorial will excel all our efforts in this line heretofore.

There having been a question raised, on the awarding of the prizes for last year, as it regarded the value of one or two of the articles, we have resolved to pay each one in gold dollars this year, which will admit of no question of intrinsic value. Commence early; make your arrangements complete, and secure a handsome prize. We will cheerfully send sample copies for use to any one without charge.

CLUB PRICE OF OUR PAPER.—It will be observed that we give every thirteenth copy to those getting up clubs on our paper for the coming year. Last year we gave only the seventeenth. This makes quite a difference to the person who is getting up the club.

A PROVERB CHANGED.—The old proverb says: "When Poverty enters by the door Love flies out of the window." But Punch has it: "Love flies in at the window whilst Poverty is shown the door."

QUEEN.—At the birth of ex-King Louis of Bavaria, a regiment of grenadiers gave him a mattress stuffed with their beards and mustaches.

SPLINTERS.

.... A splendid steamer, building in New York, will be put on the route between Gardiner, Me., and Boston, next spring.

.... Mormonism is making such progress in Denmark as to excite general alarm. Is this the 19th century?

.... The telegraph communication between St. Johns, N. F., and New York is nearly completed. This is a great step.

.... Photographic counterfeit bank bills are detected readily by a very simple chemical process.

.... A man whose wife had run away told his friends to reserve their pity for him till she came back again.

.... A French tailor has invented a machine which will cut out fifteen suits of clothes at once.

.... A polite man does not mind running out of a hot opera house to order a carriage on a wet night.

.... Ex-President Van Buren was lately thrown from a carriage and broke his arm. Just before he had a fall from his horse.

.... A shepherd in Texas has a live wolf who takes excellent care of his sheep and don't like mutton.

.... Hon. John Berry, a member of the Arkansas Senate, died a short time since from the bite of a spider.

.... An English edition of Edgar A. Poe's poems is going through the London press, edited by Mr. James Hannay.

.... San flower seeds furnish oil, and may then be fed to fowls, while the fibre of the plant makes good paper.

.... Kossuth has been lecturing extensively in England and Scotland. He does not wield much political influence.

.... Walter Savage Landor advocates the immoral doctrine that it is virtuous to assassinate a tyrant.

The construction of the proposed water-works for the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., is proceeding with great energy.

.... A young lady told a typo friend he might print a kiss on her cheek, but he mustn't publish it.

The admission fees to the Ohio State Fair this year amounted to the sum of 17,000 dollars.

.... An Englishman and an American lately fought a duel at Toronto about a lady. O, these women!

.... A kind lady lately sent a Western editor a pie, with the request "please insert." He "inserted" it, of course.

ABOUT TOBACCO.

In 1847, the government monopoly of tobacco yielded France a clear profit of five millions of dollars. In this country, vast fortunes are realized every year by the manufacture and sale of cigars, snuff and chewing tobacco. The use of the "vileweed" is almost universal.

"Divine tobacco! that from east to west Cheers the far's labor and the Turkman's rest."

We are afraid to look into the statistics to see how much we spend per annum for this luxury. It is useless to exclaim against this extravagance; it is useless to multiply scientific warnings against it: Tobacco lords it over us like Gold. We might outdo in eloquence King James's "counterblast" against "ye fylthye takynge" of tobacco, yet not a single elderly gentleman would be thereby induced to lay aside his pipe, nor a single fast American of tender years to renounce his cigar. But let us glance at its history.

Tobacco was first carried from Brazil to Portugal; the cardinal Santa Cruz, papal legate at Lisbon, introduced it at Rome, where it bore the name of the "herb of Santa Cruz." It was also called Ternabon's herb, after Nicholas Ternabon, legate in France. Jean Nicot, French ambassador at the court of Portugal, carried some to Catherine de Medicis, whence the names of queen's herb, Nicot's herb, and that of Nicotine, which last it has retained in scientific nomenclature. In 1619, James I. of England published his famous treatise against tobacco, entitled "Miso Kapos." The Jesuits replied by a book, written like the king's, in Latin, called "Anti-Miso Kapos." In 1624, Pope Urban VIII. excommunicated persons who used tobacco in churches.

Some time afterwards, Elizabeth of Russia ordered the confiscation of snuff-boxes. Amurath IV. of Turkey confiscated snuff-takers' noses, which was rather worse, ordering that this insignificant but indispensable portion of the human face divine, should be amputated without mercy. This was "the sovereign's remedy on earth," for who could indulge in Lundy Foot or Prince's Mixture without a nose? Our Puritan ancestors, who put their noses in everything, regulated the use of tobacco by statute. But in spite of papal, royal, imperial, and even democratic edicts, the use of tobacco has advanced until it has become universal. Even our municipal police are compelled to wink at its indulgence in the streets. And mere children smoke now-a-days, whereas formerly smoking was an accomplishment reserved for the age of manhood. The force of habit and of imitation was never more fully exemplified than in the use of this weed. Few who are committed to its use ever relinquish it, even after it has become a source of annoyance.

THE BALL SEASON.

Probably more "light fantastic toes" will be sported this season than ever trod the ball-room floor before, for we Americans are bidding fair to rival the French in our passion for Terpsichorean exercises. The religious prejudices which once forbade dancing as a heathenish diversion, and placed it in the same category with drinking and dicing, are fast passing away. Even the Society of Friends have relaxed somewhat in their discipline, it is said, though we do not remember ever to have seen a broad-brimmed hat describing circles in the sweeping orbit of the waltz. Dancing is an excellent exercise, unless carried to excess. We have no doubt many young ladies spin themselves into a condition of cerebral excitement productive of positive injury, and that many young gentlemen polk themselves into debility and broken-windedness. The only remedy when they lose their foot is to turn them out to grass the ensuing season.

STEAM BAKERY.—The great steam bakery in Brooklyn, N. Y., is a wonderful affair. $40,000 have been expended on the machinery, and it is calculated to supply 200,000 persons with the staff of life. If it reduces the price of bread materially, it will be a godsend to the poor. There does not seem to be a very logical relation between the price of flour and the price of bread.

THE PUBLIC GARDEN.—Our Public Garden, at the foot of the Common, after struggling along for years, has really become at last quite an attractive place. The improvements and tasteful arrangement of the grounds are due to the superintendence of John A. French, Esq., while Mr. Gornley, in the floral department, has won the praises of all lovers of horticulture.

HIGHWAY ROBBERIES.—Robbers now-a-days are getting scientific. They employ chloroform to some extent, and are up to all sorts of dodges. Two gentlemen on the "highway lay" recently grabbed a man in the woods near New Bedford, burned loco loco matches under his nose until he was insensible, and then plundered him.

CHANGES OF THE SEA.—In 1752, an English ship was stranded near New Rochelle, Westchester County, N. Y., and the wreck, owing to changes effected by the sea, now lies in the midst of a cultivated field, with about 2000 acres of arable land round it.

FORGERIES.—The crime of forgery has become fearfully common. The last case in New York, involving operations to the extent of half a million, is still the theme of comment. The love of luxury seems to lie at the bottom of these social crimes.

HORSEWOMANSHIP.—At a recent fair in Danville, Ct., Miss Kate Burkhart drove a four-in-hand team with consummate skill. She is doubtless an admirer of the character of Lady Gay Spunker in "London Assurance."

INTERESTING.—Mrs. Mowatt Ritchie has been invited to read poetry before the Mercantile Library Association. It will be a treat to hear her once more.

THE GREAT BOSTON HORSE EXHIBITION.

The large picture which occupies the whole of pages 344 and 345 of the present number, was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Billings, and engraved in his best style by John Andrew. It represents the interior of the grounds of the Boston Agricultural Association at the South End, as they appeared, when most crowded with spectators on the fourth day of the races, October 24. The most conspicuous feature in this extensive view is the judges' stand, and the horses that are coming in before it at a slashing gallop are the famous Flora Temple, on the lead, and Lanet, formerly known as Nothing. Flora Temple is styled the "Queen of the Turf," having made the fastest time on record. She was driven on this occasion by James D. McMann, while Lanet was "tooled" by Samuel McLaughlin. The race was in harness to sulkies—mile heats, the best three in five, for a prize of 1000 dollars. Three heats were run and won by the mare, the horse breaking badly whenever he lapped her. Flora's time was 2:36 1-2, 2:40 and 2:43 1-2. The old city of Boston never witnessed so much continuous excitement as was exhibited during the five days of the races. The omnibuses and the cars of the Metropolitan Railroad made their trips under crushing loads, and the sidewalks were encumbered with pedestrians, all wending their way to the great centre of attraction—the Fair Grounds. Had the entertainments presented been "races," and the horses been entered for "purses," instead of "premiums," the attendance would have been confined to horse men, and fast and fancy men, "legs" and "levanters," gamblers, thimble-riggers and id genus omne; but as the grounds were opened purely and legitimately for "trials of speed" only, as the money offered was not given in the shape of purses, and as the visitors were requested not to bet on the results, the spectators comprised the most respectable ladies and gentlemen in the community, and no one can dispute that perfect order was maintained throughout the whole period of the "trials." The whole affair was most liberally managed, and the prizes amounted to 8000 dollars. Premiums were given to the best representatives of the various classes of horses, and not alone to the fastest. It was quite an event in the history of Boston.

VERY NATURAL.—In Aspenwald, recently published in New York, an intellectual looking young lady asks Mrs. Derby, who has been very enthusiastic in the praise of George Sand, if George Sand is the man who makes the celebrated sarsaparilla!

ANAD LUXURY.—The Bedouins eat locusts fried in butter, with sometimes an onion added as a luxury. We should suggest caterpillars by way of a dessert.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Mr. Joseph Howard, Jr., of New York, to Miss Anna S. Gregg; by Rev. Dr. Putnam, of Roxbury, William B. Weston, Esq., to Miss Charlotte L. Fisk; by Rev. Mr. Baile, Mr. William H. Wilson, to Miss Mary Ann Harvey; by Rev. Mr. Mason, Mr. John K. Good to Miss Elizabeth Paul; by Rev. Dr. Lowell, Mr. Julian W. Sayre, of Mexico, to Miss M. Maria Shaw; at Roxbury, by Rev. Mr. Ryder, Mr. William Whitmore to Miss Amanda E. Hallett; at Cambridge, by Rev. Dr. Hoppin, Mr. Richard McCurdy, of New York, to Miss Sarah Ellen Little; at Somerville, by Rev. Mr. Pope, Charles S. Lincoln, Esq., to Miss Louise E. Plimpton; at Melford, by Rev. Mr. Best, Mr. Mark Boothby to Miss Anna M. Fleming; at Quincy, by Rev. Mr. Lord, George T. Frost, Esq., of Quincy, to Miss Rachel B. Field; at West Boham, by Rev. Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Lucius S. Danrell, to Miss Mary M. Smith; at Salem, by Rev. Mr. Leach, Mr. Joseph H. Webb to Miss Sarah A. Newcomb; at Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Dutton, Mr. Robert S. Eaton, of Stockton, Cal., to Miss Olivia M. Goodrich; at Newburyport, by Rev. Dr. Dimmick, Mr. John G. Flinders, of New York, to Miss Anna Plummer; at New Bedford, by Rev. Mr. Thompson, Mr. John M. Waters to Miss Mary J. Munday; at Georgetown, Mass., by Rev. Mr. Prince, Mr. J. S. Moody, of Boston, to Miss Anna E. daughter of Hon. Moses Tenney; at Barnstable, by Rev. Mr. Duggett, Mr. Prentiss W. Scudler, of Boston, to Miss Lydia A. Davis.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mrs. Mary Bowditch, 76; Widow Jennie Willett; Mrs. Thankful C. Dean, 41; Mr. Geo. F. Taylor, 52; Mr. Joseph S. Rogers, 45; Mrs. Mary Ann Thornhill, 33; Miss Lucretia L. Fuller, 52; Mrs. Abigail Lewis, 83; at Deer Island, Mr. Henry Bergoin, 38; at Charlestown, Mrs. Sarah L. Robbins, 40; Mr. John Rice, 47; at Chelsea, Miss Rebecca W. Edwards, 24; at East Cambridge, Mr. William Augustus Hall, 38; Mr. John H. Wheeler, 64; at Somerville, Miss Lucy Jane Palmer, 15; at New England Village, Mr. Henry Nelson, 35; at Dedham, Jonathan Hawes, 74; at Waltham, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Grant, 21; at Lynn, Widow Priscilla Rand, 78; at Salem, Miss Catherine Elizabeth Arrington, 25; Widow Melville Choate, 73; Mrs. Ann Briggs, 30; at Rockport, Mrs. Nancy Tarr, 73; at Newburyport, Miss Judith Cooper, 72; Widow Mary L. Willes, 28; Widow Mary Smith, 84; at East Salisbury, Mrs. Abigail Pike 87; at Worcester, Mrs. Lucy Brown, 61; at West Boylston, Mr. Edmund Hyattwell, 71; at Northfield, Sarah, widow of Dea. Judah Nash, formerly of Mendon, 86; at Bridgewater, Miss Eliza Ann Foster, of Bridgewater, 91; at Plymouth, Mr. Theodore Fred Morton, 20; at Ashfield, Dr. Eos Smith, 86; at Coleraine, Mr. Salmon Hunt, 83; at Windsor, Widow Wealthy Macomber, late of Sayre, 90; at Nantucket, Widow Mary Carr, 64; Mrs. Charlotte C. Cobb, 37.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary melange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best American writers, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every notable character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $3 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " " 25 00

Any person sending us three subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the fourth copy gratis.

* * * One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by

No. 22 WEST STREET, BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 114 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 162 W. 4th Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roe & Co., 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodard, corner of 4th and Chesnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

[Translated from the German for Ballou's Pictorial]

THE VIRGIN OF VAN DYCK.

BY ELLEN EARNST.

IN one of the vast saloons of the Palace St. James were grouped, 'neath its gorgeous hangings of damask and gobelin tapestries, young and beautiful ladies like a parterre of rare and brilliant exotics; they were waiting, chatting in light and merry tones, the rising of the queen, to whom they were maids of honor. One only by her age, having lost all charms of youth and beauty, and grave demeanor, cast a shadow over this otherwise lovely picture; this was the Duchess of Arran, first lady of honor.

Among these so brilliantly blooming flowers, for like flowers they were in beauty, the youngest would be noticed for the simplicity of her toilette and modesty of demeanor—the violet of the bouquet. Her robe of black velvet, closed at the throat, fell over an ample petticoat of white satin; the short sleeves showed, in a truly comely way, her perfect hands and arms; a full lace collar was folded around her neck, whose grace and whiteness one could divine; a large cross, fastened by a chain, sparkled upon her bosom, and her golden hair parted in bandeaux upon her forehead, was knotted and fastened in the back by a flowing lace scarf.

This was the daughter of one of the most illustrious houses of Scotland; her father was Lord Ruthven and Earl of Gowrie, a nobleman possessed of some wealth but more powerful by his lineage than by his gold.

Lady Katherine, for such was her name, had but lately arrived at the Court of St. James to be placed near the queen, there to complete the education that she had previously received in her Scottish home. Art for her fed its sacred fires, and by nature replete and retiring, in painting she discovered infinite treasures. In the immense galleries of her father's castle, ornamented with the works of the first masters, she found her greatest pleasure.

Her habits and manners differed greatly from those of the ladies of the court, accustomed as they were to more freedom and liberty. Gentle and timid, she hardly dared reply to the foolish and sometimes malicious sallies of her gay young companions. All eyes were directed toward the large dial of the saloon as it sounded ten o'clock.

"He is very late," said several voices, and at the same time the usher announced the painter, Van Dyck.

At these words, there was a rustling of satins among the ladies; each moved upon her velvet cushion, like the stem of a flower swayed by the south wind, as if seeking a more graceful position.

The young pupil of Rubens, habituated as he was to contemplate beauty, could not refrain from a gesture of admiration and surprise at finding himself in the midst of so much grace and beauty. The duchess, attributing to herself the young artist's embarrassment, complacently sought to relieve him, and motioning him to a seat by her side, said:

"Sir, the world says that you have talent."

"It does me too great an honor, your grace. Those that say that judge me by what I may in future perform, for I have not yet produced anything to attest it."

Van Dyck threw as much assurance and pride in his reply as the noble lady had impudence and arrogance in her demand. Katherine blushed with all Scottish pride for shame and vexation at the insolent tone of the duchess and with pleasure at the young painter's reply. She looked at him while he spoke, and Van Dyck understood and thanked her in his heart.

"Ah, well; we shall soon see, for the queen will put you to the test. Her majesty wishes to renew the ornaments of her chapel; you will have a great deal to do. For your studio in the winter, you will have the 'Gray Friars Hall,' an ancient monastery, that can be seen from here, there you will be free and solitary. Your studio in the summer will be the Castle of Eltham, and then you will have a salary by government; that is very well for a young artist, I should think."

"Art is a gift that cannot be purchased, your grace, and if I possess the talent to which I aspire, these favors that you so praise to me would not suffice to pay for my brushes."

"All ambition is praiseworthy, but these honors are on one condition. The queen will proclaim you publicly as her painter, if you gain the prize at the exhibition in Rome. It is to be for the finest head of the Virgin."

"Yes, madam, but I fear that I shall not gain the patronage of the queen if that is the condition."

"And wherefore do you refuse this honor? Do you want confidence in your power?"

"No, your grace, but how can I represent the Mother of Christ if I have no model." In pronouncing these words he looked toward Katherine. "I have sought everywhere this celestial face, but in vain. No countenance possesses the same look of candor and love, none the sweetness and benevolence that reveals the indulgent sister of all woman."

His eyes sparkled with fire, and all his features illuminated by animation, Van Dyck looked noble and truly handsome, for genius shone on his pure, high forehead.

"But I thought that painters found no want of models," resumed the duchess.

"There are models that we pay and who are beautiful, but only one can approach the divinity and beauty of my ideal. Alas! this woman that I have found is a noble lady, who would disdain to become the model of a poor artist."

In saying these words he looked at Katherine in a manner that at once marked her as the one of whom he spoke. The young girl felt it, and all her companions perceived with mingled surprise and rage that the young Scottish girl was the one of them that Van Dyck selected. The duchess, who saw nothing of this, demanded:

"And this noble lady—who is she?"

"The Virgin herself, your grace."

He saluted them all, and casting a look of adieu toward Katherine, said to the duchess:

"If I gain the prize you will see me again, if not I shall leave England."

Van Dyck took possession of the "Gray Friars Hall," and thinking of the Madonna-like face of the young maid of honor, he endeavored to delineate upon his canvass that celestial countenance; but it was impossible, he was unable to embody his inspiration. The day passed in fruitless efforts, and night surprised him, sad and motionless, near his easel, seeking in vain to catch the fleeting vision.

From the time that the painter left the palace, all laughter and taunts were directed against poor Katherine; her envious companions made her dearly suffer for the choice that Van Dyck had made of her. They separated for the night; but even after her evening prayer Katherine still thought of the young artist and longed for his success, as she remembered his sad look when he confessed to having no model.

It is midnight. The heavens sparkle with a thousand lamps, when a soft light is shed over the front of the palace, illuminating the old abbey, which, lone and sombre, seems praying amid its ruins. A window in the palace opens, and a shadow passes along the balcony and glides down the long staircase, crosses alone the courts and corridors, and reaches the door of the monastery.

To tell you how this woman left the palace and how she penetrated these ruins, would be difficult. She must have known all the windings, for in a few moments the shadow had traversed the long alleys, and arriving at one of the galleries in the chapel, it entered the painter's studio, passed lightly along, without looking around her, and sat motionless in front of his easel. O, surprise! O, joy! This woman, so calm and beautiful, is Katherine. The artist, so sad, so unhappy, who could not recall that divine face, sees it living before his eyes; she herself has come to be his model. But what power brought her? what thought gave her this strength?

The painter knelt before her as if to thank her, but Katherine made him a sign to rise, pointing to his palette. Her look filled him with so pure an adoration that he forgot the reality of his vision. Transported by his imagination to an ideal and celestial sphere, he seemed to live in heaven. In the midst of angels he saw the Madonna crowned with her divine aureole. This was no longer the weak and unsuccessful man who an hour before flung in disdain his pencils at his feet. The artist had replaced the man. Mute, breathless, hurried on by an unknown strength, he seized his palette, and in a few moments, to him, but hours they were, he painted the most pure and beautiful of all Madonnas.

When the young girl perceived that the painter, finishing his work alone, had forgot his model in the ecstasy of his success, she arose, and without uttering a word, retook her calm assured steps and left the monastery by the same way she entered.

Van Dyck, with bewildered eyes, an oppressed heart, and speechless, made no effort to recall her. She was to his eyes no longer mortal. In seeing her glide away, he thought he saw the Virgin borne toward heaven. Exhausted by long labor and excitement, he fell upon a chair and slept.

At waking, Van Dyck's first thought was to run to his canvass. Transported with joy at the sight of his work, which he thought living, he knelt and thanked, be it angel or woman, the face that appeared before him. It was in vain that he sought to lift the veil that covered this mystery. He tried to remember the past, but no effort could reveal to him the truth. He thought of the Madonna and Katherine as one; he could not separate them, and he resolved to write her the following note:

"Tell me if you are really an angel. Tell me if you wish to render lifeless a poor artist to whom you have given life. Reveal to me who this night appeared to me, the Virgin or a woman."

The duchess was charged with opening first all letters addressed to the young ladies confided to her charge. What was her astonishment when she read these lines! "Horror!" she cried. "A daughter of a noble house thus to betray her duty, to go alone and at night to a painter's studio!"

She ceased the culprit to be brought before her. But her rage redoubled when Katherine, calm and gentle as ever, assured her that she did not understand her reproaches.

The duchess, who expected the greatest confusion and a sincere avowal, and with that would have pardoned all, would now hear nothing. Her ear was deaf to all petitions. It was decided that the poor girl, ruined and dishonored, should the next morning return to her father's house. Her prayers were all unheeded. The following night was the only delay accorded for repentance. The duchess, to avoid new scandal, caused Katherine to sleep in her apartment. When midnight came, Katherine, like the evening before, arose. Awakened by the slightest noise, the duchess, anxious and happy to persuade those who yet believed Katherine innocent, aroused all the palace.

The duchess, with a numerous suite, followed Katherine. She traversed the long galleries, the halls and the Court of St. James, and entered as before the door of the monastery. No one longer doubted the culpability of the poor girl. They followed her into the studio and saw her seated before the easel. The noise made around her and the dazzling light that the torches cast upon her face, awakened her. Katherine was a somnambulist. It was thus she served as a model to the young painter, who gave her love in return for glory. He obtained the prize, and was overwhelmed with honors and fame at the English court, and his Madonna is to this day one of the most celebrated of the great painter's productions. A few days after this scene, the marriage of the painter, Van Dyck, and Katherine, daughter of Lord Ruthven, was celebrated at St. Paul's.

THE CZAR.

Alexander Nicolaievitch is tall and well formed, although he does not in stature, or in grandeur of person, come near to his father. His face bears a resemblance to the portraits of the Emperor Nicholas, but the worshippers of his deceased majesty declare he lacks the wonderful power of eye and dignity and intelligence of expression which characterized the father. His majesty is dressed in the uniform of a general officer, and seems quite simply attired, after all the splendor which has gone past. He wears a harnessed casque with a long plume of white, orange and dark cock's feathers, a close fitting green tunic, with aiguillettes and orders, and red trousers, and he guides his charger—a perfect model of symmetry—with ease and gracefulness. His features are full of emotion as he returns with a military salute on all sides the congratulations of his people. To all he gives the same acknowledgment—raising his extended hand to the side of his casque, so that the forefinger rises vertically by the rim in front of the ear. The effect of his presence is considerably marred by the proximity of his snite, who have gradually and perhaps unwittingly closed up till they are immediately behind his horse, instead of leaving him isolated, as he was when he quitted the palace of Petrovsky, and thus his figure is lost among his plumed suite.—London Letter.

 $1000!!

GRAND PRIZE OFFER.

EACH ONE TO BE PAID IN GOLD DOLLARS.

The unequalled and increasing circulation of our favorite illustrated weekly journal calls upon the proprietor for a corresponding liberality in his offers to the public, for the new year. He therefore offers as an inducement to postmasters, or any other individual, male or female, to obtain and send to us clubs of subscribers to our paper,

TWELVE PRIZES IN GOLD,

to be faithfully awarded according to the schedule below. These prizes to be divided among the individuals who shall forward us the twelve largest clubs of subscribers for the "Pictorial," between the first of December, 1856, and the first of February, 1857, being a period of about sixty days.

When it is remembered that the agent has to work with, not only the most attractive, but positively

THE CHEAPEST PAPER IN THE WORLD!

it will be realized by every one how easily a large club of subscribers can be procured anywhere.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION

is now in its eleventh volume, volume twelve commencing on the first of January, 1857. It is the only illustrated paper of its class in America, and the pioneer of illustrated papers on this side the Atlantic. It is elegantly printed on the finest of satin surfaced paper, containing sixteen super royal pages in each number, with an average of twenty illustrations weekly! These engravings are large and artistic in execution, embracing every current topic of interest, including rural scenery, maritime matters, architecture, noted localities all over this country and Europe, likenesses of eminent characters, male and female, at home and abroad, processions, celebrations, natural history, battles, fortifications, and, in short, every theme of general interest, forming an elegant

ILLUSTRATED RECORD OF THE TIMES.

Besides the illustrations, it contains eight or more super royal pages of original sketches of adventure, tales, poems, biographies and choice miscellaneous reading, humorous sketches, a careful record of events (no advertisements will be admitted), altogether forming a delightful weekly visitor to the home circle, and making two elegant volumes each year for binding, of 416 pages, with about one thousand splendid engravings.

PRESENT CIRCULATION, 103,000 COPIES WEEKLY!

THE PRIZES.

|                                                                                   |         |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| To the person who sends us the first largest club we will present in gold.....    | $30 00 |
| To the person who sends us the second largest club we will present in gold.....   | 20 00   |
| To the person who sends us the third largest club we will present in gold.....    | 10 00   |
| To the person who sends us the fourth largest club we will present in gold.....   | 30 00   |
| To the person who sends us the fifth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 80 00   |
| To the person who sends us the sixth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 70 00   |
| To the person who sends us the seventh largest club we will present in gold.....  | 50 00   |
| To the person who sends us the eighth largest club we will present in gold.....   | 40 00   |
| To the person who sends us the ninth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 30 00   |
| To the person who sends us the tenth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 20 00   |
| To the person who sends us the eleventh largest club we will present in gold..... | 15 00   |
| To the person who sends us the twelfth largest club we will present in gold.....  | 10 00   |

These prizes will be paid in gold dollars, that there may be no question as to their value.

No person will be considered a competitor for the prizes who does not send us at least fifty subscribers.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |        |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year.....                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " ".....                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 10 00  |
| 10 " " " ".....                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 20 00  |
| Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis. Thus every thirteenth copy is clear profit to the getter-up of the club, except to those persons winning the first three prizes.       |        |
| Any person sending us fifty subscribers, shall receive the sixtieth volume complete of our "Pictorial," elegantly and uniformly bound in gilt, with illustrated title-pages and indexes, containing nearly ten thousand fine illustrations. |        |

It is very important that the names, accompanied by the money, should be sent to us as fast as they are obtained, that we may be able to print an ample number of papers to meet the demand. Therefore, as soon as ten or a dozen subscribers have been obtained, the person who has procured the club can forward them with the money, and he or she can then add to the club any number of names at the same rate, and they will be duly credited to the account of the person sending, until February 1, 1857.

It is not requisite that the entire club should be taken in one town; we will send the papers to any neighboring post-office, but all subscriptions must come through the same agent, in order to be counted to his or her credit. This prize offer cannot be applied to any regular wholesale agent of our paper. The clubs must be bona fide, and each name sent with the money.

The result will be duly published, and evidence of the receipt of each prize, by the successful parties, will be given.

Sample copies of the paper furnished gratis when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

For 24 copies of Ballou's Pictorial and The Flag of our Union are sent to one address.

Any person after can receive a copy of the paper to his own address, at a half price.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

They are talking in New York of erecting a monument to Poe, the poet. Twelve sportsmen went down from Petersburg, Virginia, to Broadway, on the Appomattox, lately, in pursuit of snipe. Upon counting the game, it was ascertained that the twelve had succeeded in killing sixteen hundred of the delicious birds. One gentleman alone realized two hundred and twenty as the result of his sport. The people of Austria speak seventeen different languages. Quite a small Babel. Ex-Judge Haliburton, author of "Sam Slick, the Clock Pedler," has taken a final farewell of Nova Scotia as a place of residence. Clifton, his beautiful son at Windsor, was sold some weeks since, and the old judge has taken his passage for Liverpool, to make his home in Great Britain the remainder of his days. They raise six hundred bushels of sweet potatoes to the acre on the Guadalupe River in Texas. The first grist mill ever erected in Pennsylvania is yet in existence. It is a quaint old stone building, and bears date about 1686. It is located on a small stream near Germantown, and some of the original machinery imported from England is still retained in the mill. The amendment limiting the term of Superior Court judges has been adopted by the people of Connecticut by at least 1000 majority. Smelt fishing is now the great amusement in Boston. Four gentlemen one day lately caught in six and a half hours, with poles and lines, one hundred and eighty dozen and four smelts—being 2164 fish! Mr. Benjamin Chandler, an old man, belonging in Wilmington, Delaware, is supposed to have been lost on the White Mountains. The appearance of numerous bears among the pines along the line of the Camden and Atlantic Railroad, New Jersey, has created considerable excitement among the sparse population of that desolate region. Four large specimens of the black bear were shot near the railroad during the past month. Christians keep Sunday, Greeks Monday, Persians Tuesday, Assyrians Wednesday, Egyptians Thursday, Turks Friday, Jews Saturday. A boy three years old, son of Michael Goff, at the Clyde Works, Rhode Island, lately, while at play in a wood-shed, found a phial of oil of vitriol, which had been placed there by his father, and drank it, causing death in about eight hours, during which time he suffered the most excruciating agony. Late advices from Havana state that a formidable Spanish fleet was fitting out to enforce the claims of the country against Mexico, the previous accounts of the adjustment of this difficulty being erroneous. The Ogdensburg Railroad was sold by auction at Malone, New York, lately, for $3,000,000. We understand that Mr. Amos Abbott, of Andover, recently a teacher in Ahmednuggur, has invented and patented a table, by which mariners may ascertain their latitude and longitude without going through the long process hitherto required. The receipts of the Michigan Southern Railroad for the month of September, it is said, amounted to $386,000—an increase of $44,000 over the same month of last year. The number of students in the three first colleges in the country is in Harvard, 697; Yale, 604; University of Virginia, 504. In the latter there is an increase of 80 over the number last year. At Yale, 57 are from Southern States.

GETTING UP IN THE WORLD.

At one of the agricultural fairs in New York this season, they introduced a new feature, though one common enough in the old world—a high greased pole, at the top of which was suspended a number of valuable prizes (a watch among other things), to be carried off by the successful climber. We are striving to get up in the world; but in this game of the pole there is a slight difference from the great game of life. In life, the path cannot be too smooth; but the smoothness of the pole is the great obstacle in success. By throwing on sand and resin, and roughening their way the most-climbers win the goal. Then again, in the world the dispensers of fortune's favors are apt to frown on the most needy, whereas the prizes on the pole were awarded to those most inkneed.

HARD ON THE "SHANGHAIS."—A lady writer in the New York Sunday Dispatch has the following "anent" upon the male patrons of the St. Nicholas Hotel, New York:—"I saw something go into the St. Nicholas the other day. What do you think it was? It was the most splendid mirror I ever beheld, large as the side of a house, and cost, as I have been told, $1400. I thought, of course, it was designed for the ladies' saloon; but no! it went into the bar-room, and there sit the Idonises before it, drinking cobbler and smashes, admiring themselves between drinks.

"Nothing is proof against the general curse of Vanity that sedes all below."

RATHER FUNNY.—One punishment in vogue in the military service is to attach a delinquent to a cannon ball by means of a chain fastened to the ankle. A jolly Jack Tar observing a son of Mars in this predicament, exclaimed: "My eyes, if there aint a soger riding at anchor!"

NOTHING NEW.—Solomon said there was nothing new under the sun. At Nineveh, lately, they discovered an opera glass, and yet more recently a basso-relievo, representing a flight of balloons. Possibly they may turn out to be foot-balls, but that makes no odds.

DEAR AMUSEMENT.—The expenses of Earl Granville's mission to Russia, as extraordinary ambassador on the occasion of the late coronation, were not less than $200,000. If John Bull falls out with Russia, he will grumble at footing this little bill.

YANKEE MECHANICS.—A large number of machinists have lately left Boston and vicinity for Cuba, to take charge of the machinery on the plantation.

Wayside Gatherings.

Madame McCallister, widow of the great magician, intends to pursue her husband's professional calling.

Very handsome samples of rice have been raised in Louisiana, where the experiment of raising it has been fully tried.

A man whistling or singing merrily at midnight is a safe person to meet. He will not harm nor rob you.

A fellow in New York pretends to have no instrument which will discover sunken treasures. More Kidd hunting!

The Fourth of July was celebrated in Melbourne, Australia, in creditable style, by the American residents and others.

A new machine has been invented that will manufacture, out of cold lead, two hundred bullets, of four different kinds, in one minute.

The number of scholars attending the Boston public schools is 23,749, and the average cost of educating them is $14.41 for each scholar, per annum.

In a dwelling-house in Varick street, New York, a cooking stove recently exploded, knocking out two front windows. A hopeful son of the family had stored blank cartridges in the oven!

The latest advices from Mexico state that the sales of the church property had reached $5,000,000. There were rumors of an impending revolution, mostly under the auspices of the clergy.

A privilege has been granted to a French gentleman to run small screw steamers through the dykes between Taculaya and the city of Mexico.

There was a rumor in Paris at the last dates, that the Messrs. Rothschild had contracted to supply the bank of France with thirty-two million dollars in gold.

Madame Rodisco, widow of the late Russian minister at Washington, with her family, are among the passengers by the steamship Persia, for Liverpool. She is going to St. Petersburg.

The Freewill Baptists have in the United States 1173 churches, 1107 ministers, and 49,809 church members. The first church was formed in New Hampshire in 1780.

Cowles, in his excellent history of plants, notices the virtue of hemp thus laconically: "By this cordage ships are guided, bells are rung, and rogues are kept in awe."

In a will case, tried in Boston, the strongest proof of the sanity of the deceased at the time his will was made, was the fact that he subscribed for a newspaper a few days before his death.

The New Orleans (La.) Picayune reports the death of Eugene Prevost, son of the well-known conductor of the Orleans theatre orchestra, by the accidental discharge of his gun. He was an accomplished violinist.

The Ocean Steam Company between New York and Bremen has been very successful. It is said that, in addition to regular dividends, the company has accumulated a surplus of $100,000, in a capital of $600,000.

Dr. Armstrong was lately murdered near Sacramento by a man named Colebrook. While the latter was being examined before a justice, the citizens broke into court, disarmed the officers, and, seizing the prisoner, carried him off and hung him upon a tree.

A German paper asserts that prussic acid only causes suspension of life at first, and that one who takes it can be restored to animation by the pouring of acetate of potash and salt dissolved in water on the head and spine. Rabbits have been so recovered.

Mr. Alfred Victor Du Pont, the head of the great powder manufacturing company at Wilmington, Del., died at Nemours lately, aged 58. He was the eldest son of I. Du Pont, who founded the gunpowder, wool and cotton manufactories of Delaware.

Deacon Elijah Curtis, of Tioga, N. Y., was returning from church, 19th ult., in apparently his usual health, and while conversing with a friend by whom he was accompanied, he fell instantly dead in the street, without a groan or a struggle. His age was 70 years.

Col. James Ward, one of the oldest and most respected citizens of Hartford, died suddenly, lately, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. During the war of 1812, Col. Ward was commissioned as Commissary General of Connecticut, a post which he held, with the exception of a year or two, from that time until his death.

Huntington's forgeries were caused by four pairs of horses, two pairs for carriages for himself and wife, and several fast trotters, two matrimonial establishments—the fair occupiers of which liberally patronized the jewelry shops—and all the et ceteras which usually distinguish a man of such tastes.

The Northern Ensign states that Mr. Petrel, county clerk of Orkney, has discovered that Washington Irving, the celebrated author, is an Orkneyman by descent. His father was born in Shapinsay, and emigrated to New York about 1760, and died in 1798, leaving a large fortune. His family genealogy has been traced back to 1422.

The Lockport Journal states that while a clerk in a law office in that village was overhauling papers on file, a package was found which showed marks of having been set on fire. Examining further, the charred remains of a common moth fly or miller were found, who had probably carried the fire from the candle, in his wings, to the documents and set the paper on fire.

Shipbuilding is prosecuted with considerable activity in New Brunswick. The Miramichi Colonial Times states that twenty vessels have been launched in the northern section of the province during the present season, and that six more will be ready for launching in a short time. The amount of tonnage is set down at 18,661 tons. The largest vessel launched was 1365 tons.

Mrs. Purdy, residing at Spencer, Tioga county, New York, is now 105 years old; is in good health, and apparently has as strong hold upon life as she had many years since. Her husband was killed in the Revolution, and she was left a widow at the age of twenty-two years; she never married again, and now, at this great age, her mind is clear, and she relates scenes and anecdotes of the Revolution with all the ardor of youth.

Lieut. Walton, of the British navy, we see it stated, has prepared a mixture of saw dust and caustic lime, under the name of kam-pluticon, as a lining for the interior of war vessels. The inventor claims that, from its elasticity, it will immediately collapse when penetrated by a ball, and thus prevent the entrance of water. It also deadens concussion, and by its buoyancy will keep a vessel afloat though it should be riddled with shot.

The London Times, in an article on "Yankee Locomotion," says: Whenever you see him, the Yankee, he is going over the ground as fast as he can. And whatever the motive be, whether pleasure or profit, it is the same. In Europe, he is a pale and breathless sight-seer, always in rapid transition, as if a ghost were pursuing him, insatiably accumulating stages, as if his life depended on the run total at the end of the week. Immigrate is the word

Foreign Items.

There is an oyster shell owned by the University of Leyden, which weighs 130 pounds.

Within eight years the East India Company has annexed territories exceeding 200,000 square miles, with a population of more than seventeen millions!

Mormonism is making such progress in Denmark, as to excite considerable alarm in the minds of religious and reflecting men. Petitions have been sent in large numbers to the government, asking that the Mormons may be restricted from the more public practice of their ceremonies.

The monetary crisis at Paris is the sole subject of attention. The letters each day, and the hourly telegraphic quotations from the Bourse, are looked for with the greatest eagerness, to show if a suspension of specie payments is to settle the question, and to constitute a new epoch in the history of France.

It has been proposed to establish a printing press on board the Great Western, the mammoth ship now being built in England for the Australian trade, and to issue a daily paper during the voyage. In connection with this there is to be a reading room, well supplied for the use of the voyagers.

A curious lawsuit, carried on through a period of forty years, has lately been decided in Germany. The parties were a Mr. Binding, plaintiff, and the elder of the Rothschilds, defendant, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of 40,000 florins. The case arose out of supplies furnished to the army of Napoleon, by Binding, who was associated with Rothschilds.

Sands of Gold.

.... Proper words in proper places make the true definition of a style.—Swift.

.... A soul without reflection, like a pile without inhabitant, to ruin runs.—Young.

.... Where there is much pretension, much has been borrowed; nature never pretends.—Lucas.

.... To divest one's self of one's prejudices, would be like taking off the skin to feel the better.—Grecille.

.... The rich man despises those who flatter him too much, and hates those who do not flatter him at all.—Talleyrand.

.... As riches and favor forsake a man, we discover him to be a fool—but nobody could find it out in his prosperity.—La Bruyere.

.... The spirit and enterprise of a courier are all expended in the search after place and preferment; nothing remains for the fulfilment of the duties to which success compels him.—Talleyrand.

.... Every effort is made, in forming matrimonial alliances, to reconcile matters relating to fortune, but very little is paid to the congeniality of dispositions, or to the concordance of hearts.—Massillon.

.... Plenty and indigence depend upon the opinion every one has of them; and riches, no more than glory or health, have no more beauty or pleasure than their possessor is pleased to lend them.—Montaigne.

.... The affections and the will know nothing of a future; the mind—the judgment—calls it up and gives it the force and life of the present. The mind alone is free, self-acting, and directed towards the unknown; the heart is bound to what is before it.—Rabel.

Joker's Budget.

Sheridan, having been asked what wine he liked best, replied, "The wine of other people."

A gentleman having a musical sister, being asked what branch of music she excelled in, declared that the piano was her forte.

Heavens! what rosaries might be strung for the memory of sweet female kisses, given without check or art, before one is of age to value them!

An auctioneer put up Drew's "Essay on Souls" for sale, which was bid off by a shoemaker, who gravely asked if he had "any more articles on shoemaking to sell!"

A Monmouthshire farmer recently sent the following message to the "lady of his love":—"Tell her," he said, "that gin she doesna ha'e me, I winna kill myself, but I'll pine awa'!"

One person having asked another if he believed in the appearance of spirits, "No," was the reply; "but I believe in their disappearance, for I've missed a bottle of gin since last night."

Why is the speech a few words make when paying a bill, like two characters in one of Shakespeare's plays? Because he would say, "Cash I owe (Cashio), and dere's de money (Deselemoney)."

"I didn't like my minister's sermon last Sunday," said a deacon, who had slept all sermon time, to a brother deacon. "Didn't like it, Brother A?" "Why, I saw you nodding assent to every proposition of the parson!"

An advertisement in a Boston paper, lately, for a young man to work in a store, was answered by eighteen applications. But one for a "gentleman" to travel and play on the banjo, met with four hundred and eleven responses.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it emphatically a PARTISAN FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the mammoth size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most divided and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the fourteenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU.

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.
WHOLESALE AGENTS:—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Ross, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woolard, corner 14th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Rouse, 401 Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Tuck, 29 Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.

[For description, see page 349.]

THE UNITED STATES STEAM FRIGATE, MERRIMAC.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. 6 CENTS SINGLE. Vol. XI., No. 23 — Whole No. 283.

VIEW OF OUR PUBLISHING HOUSE.

We present on this page, from the pencil of Barry, an accurate view of the elegant new building we now occupy, at No. 22 Winter Street, and which we erected expressly to meet the present and future exigencies of our business. The location in the short street which connects Tremont and Washington Streets, the two great arteries of travel and trade, is surpassed by none in the city. The building is of brick, five stories in height (the fifth not visible from the street), and was built from the designs of John R. Hall, Esq., the well-known architect of this city, by Anthony Hanson, master carpenter, and D. H. Jacobs, of the firm of Roberts, Adams and Jacobs, master mason. The materials and workmanship are of the best. The ground occupied is 132 feet deep with 28 feet frontage. The basement story is occupied by the furnace, steam-engine, etc., and by our twelve power presses. These presses throw off weekly 103,000 copies of the Pictorial, 87,000 copies of the Flag, and 68,000 copies of the Dollar Monthly. The first floor is occupied as the counting-room, editorial and sales-room. In the other stories are various branches connected with our business, artists and engravers' rooms, etc., while the upper part is used for our binding establishment. A number of rooms in the rear are occupied by the corps of compositors engaged on our various publications. It will thus be seen that all the departments of our business are under one roof.

VIEW OF OUR NEW PUBLISHING HOUSE, NO. 22 WINTER STREET.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MABEL, THE RECTOR'S WARD:

—OR—

TRUTH AND TREASON IN 1777.

BY MAJOR BEN: PERLEY POORE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XII.

A CHANGE OF SCENE.

"The flanking guns dismounted his, the most is ruinous and dry. The grim portulitis gone—and all the fortress turned to peaceful hall. But yet precautions, lately taken, showed danger's day revived again."

SOME two months after the events previously recorded, there was an unusual bustle in the city of Quebec, and the rapid peals of the alarm bell were summoning the principal inhabitants to the "castle," as the English conquerors had re-christened the old chateau of St. Louis. Built originally as a stronghold of defence, rather than for purposes of state, the imposing old pile towered aloft on the summit of a precipice two hundred feet above the St. Lawrence, commanding a view of wide-spread river, and of distant hills, and of dense forests, unsurpassed—if equalled—on the western continent. Neither was it less interesting in a historical point of view, for there was the seat of the French government in America, which extended for a half century up the St. Lawrence, through the chain of great lakes to the head of the Mississippi, and down that noble river to the Gulf of Mexico, keeping the hemmed-in English colonies in constant alarm, and securing the fidelity of the Indian nations. Many a midnight vigil, many a long deliberation and deep-laid project had the council hall of the castle been the scene of, to free the American continent from the intrusion of the ancient enemy of France, and assert, by right of conquest as well as original discovery, the supremacy of the Gallic lilies. The conquest of Canada by Wolfe, in 1759, brought a change of masters, and the red-cross flag of St. George now sluggishly nodded its heavy folds in the breeze, as if unwilling to display its emblems to the crowds congregated by the tocsin summons. And all knew that danger was at hand.

Vague rumors were circulated from group to group, but no one could give any correct information as to the cause of the alarm, while the bell continued to peal forth its warnings. At last it ceased. The window of the great hall which opened upon the balcony was thrown open, and two figures appeared. One was Dan Holbrook, whose sinister countenance was evidently preoccupied with some deep scheme of villainy; the other was well known to most of those present as Colonel Allan MacLean, a retired Highland officer, whose face was bronzed by the suns of many campaigns in his youth, and of many harvests in his riper years.

"Gentlemen," said the colonel, in an earnest, blunt manner, "I have come to hear ye bad news. A rebel army is besieging Montreal, where Governor Carlton is just now, and from where he sent me an order to come here and take command. But he little dreamed, neither did I until this gentleman told me so, that another rebel army was on its way through the woods, by the Kennebec Indian trail, to fall upon Quebec like a hawk on a chicken, and take it. Now our loyal friend has not only given me the plans of these invaders, but proof that they expect encouragement here. So I have summoned you here, and I give notice, in the name of George our king, that I assume command. I shall at once put the place in the best posture for defence that I can, and now proclaim martial law. The invading Yankees will be treated as rebels, so will every citizen who has any intercourse with them, or who is backward in aiding the king's officers. Depend upon it, Quebec never falls into the hands of the rebels, or my name's not Allan MacLean."

There was a feeble response of "hurrah for the king!" But all the native portion of the audience remained silent. The yoke of England was galling to the French Canadians, and it was true that they had given intimations that the continentals would be welcome. No cheer escaped their lips, and as their dark eyes peered out furtively beneath their thick eyebrows, it was easy to see that little dependence could be placed on them.

As might have been expected, the news soon spread over the city, and before the crowd had fairly dispersed, a hundred different rumors were in circulation. Orderly sergeants bustled about, working parties were detailed, and preparations for defence were vigorously commenced, while the more timid of the citizens were equally active in making arrangements to leave.

Holbrook remained at the castle, giving his opinion upon every question discussed by Colonel MacLean and the officers, with a familiarity that soon became offensive. Military men can ill brook contradiction or receive counsel from a civilian, and when at last Holbrook flatly denied a statement made by the commander of the Canadians, that officer bluntly asked, with a glow of irritation flashing his swarthy features:

"By what means, sir, are you so well acquainted with Quebec, that you thus give your opinions as worthy of consideration with the observations of those of us who hold the king's commissions here?"

The scar on Holbrook's face fairly gleamed with rage, as he replied with provoking coolness:

"To which of the royal commissions that you have held, Colonel Dupre, do you refer?"

None present could repress a smile, as it was well known that the colonel had held his present command under the French, and had even fought against the British when they captured the city.

"Coquin!" exclaimed the irritated Canadian.

"Ah!" rejoined Holbrook. "The oath of allegiance on the first commission may have been broken, but the language comes first."

"But my sword-arm is ready to punish knaves, be they French or English," said Colonel Dupre, furiously, yet in a low tone.

"Gentlemen," began the commanding officer.

"He cannot be a gentleman," interrupted the enraged Canadian.

"Silence! I command it in the king's name," said Colonel MacLean. "This discussion, at this time, is sadly out of place. Here we are, threatened with invasion, and yet at the council-board a quarrel has sprung up. This should not be—nay, it must not be."

"I regret," promptly responded Holbrook, "that any remark of mine, intended to aid in preparing for defending the king's city, should have drawn forth the anger of any one honored by the king's commission. Without expressing any opinion now upon the provocation I have received, I will simply postpone action on it until—the rebels are driven back to their homes."

"Bravely said!" exclaimed MacLean. "Now, Dupre, let this pass on your side also."

"I ever obey orders," said the Canadian, with a profound bow, during which he cast an angry glance at Holbrook. That gentleman rising, saluted the company and moved towards the door.

"You are surely not going?" asked Colonel MacLean.

"Yes. A walk will do me good."

"Return at five, then, and dine with us."

"I will; thanks."

No sooner had he left, than the Canadian officer, in a tone of high displeasure, asked:

"By what right, I would ask, has that spy a place at the council-table?"

"Spy!" exclaimed Colonel MacLean.

"Yes—spy," responded the irritated Canadian. "At any rate, he was a spy upon his own country people, and who knows but what he may in turn spy upon us?"

"Nay—nay, Colonel Dupre," said a captain of infantry, who had been a silent listener. "Give the devil his due. His information, by bringing our commander here in time to put us on our guard, is of great value; nor do I believe that he would risk that precious neck of his by double duty."

"At any rate," added Colonel MacLean, "we must neither let him play us false, trouble our tempers, nor meddle with our affairs. Now let us proceed with business."

The various subjects for consideration were in turn disposed of, and one by one the officers went to attend to various duties, until Colonel MacLean was left alone. He was writing a despatch to General Carlton, governor of the province, who was commanding in person the defence of Montreal, but his mind seemed to wander from the manuscript. The more he thought of Holbrook's sudden appearance, of his conduct, and of his desire to obtain information, the more his suspicions became aroused.

His orderly interrupted his meditations by announcing Colonel Dupre.

"Admit him." And the colonel, laying down his pen, rose to greet the new-comer.

"Dupre," said he, "I have thought a deal about what occurred here this morning, and must confess that your suspicions may have more foundation than I could then see. Now will you detail two of your most trusty sergeants, men acquainted with the city, to watch this man's movements, and make daily reports? Should he appear to hold any communication with the enemy, let me know it without delay, and in an extraordinary case, have him arrested."

"That I will," replied the Canadian, in whose breast the insult of the morning rankled. "Now let me ask you to grant an interview."

"To whom? Remember that I have been hard at work all day, and that dinner will soon be served."

"But it is a lady who seeks you,—Madame de Frontenac, of whose exertions in behalf of the Indians you must have heard."

"Heard! Why, she is regarded almost as an angel by half of my neighbors. It is a rare thing to see a lady of family and fortune devoting herself to such noble works of charity. Show her in at once."

The Canadian went into the ante-chamber, and immediately returned, leading a lady who was attired in deep mourning, while behind them came a young and beautiful girl, whose delicately-bronzed cheek denoted her Indian parentage. Madame de Frontenac (for such was the name by which she was presented), on throwing aside her veil, disclosed the remains of very extraordinary beauty, of which traces had not been effaced by the cloud of sorrow under which she labored. Her hair, now gently turning gray, was drawn smoothly over a finely-proportioned forehead, while the dark brows by which they were overhung met almost in the centre. A decisive expression around the mouth accorded well with these continuous eyebrows, and lent a decisive tone to her features, but yet there was a subdued, affectionate look about them which could but attract a stranger. She wore a dress of black bombazine, with a widow's cap, and a long crape veil was attached to her bonnet.

Very different in appearance was her companion, the Indian girl. Purchased by Madame de Frontenac from a hostile band of Iroquois which visited Quebec after having made a foray into the Abenakis country, she had been reared with all the refinements of civilization, yet retained the upright form and free step of the children of the forest. Her features, more regular than those of savages usually are, were delicately sculptured, and the erect attitude of her fawn-like head, the luxuriant beauty of her hair, and the warm coloring of her cheeks, were brilliantly set off by the plaintive expression of her melting dark eyes. Never were such eyes seen among civilized maidens, and when they were lit up by emotion, they appeared almost celestial. Her voice, too, musical as the even bubbling of a water-brook in August, yet tremulous with the same heart-current which sent the light to her eye and the glow to her cheek, added to her attractions. Of the two score Indian girls who partook of Madame de Frontenac's maternal bounty, Estelle (for thus she had been baptized) was the favorite.

It was evident, by the courtly grace with which Madame de Frontenac received the cordial greetings of Colonel MacLean that she was accustomed to receive homage, even from those in power. Declining a proffered seat, she said:

"Pardon this intrusion, but when I tell you that I have under my poor care forty of these tender forest-buds, you will not wonder, colonel, that I feel an anxiety as to their safety."

"That I do not, madame, especially if this bewitching miss is a sample of their charms. All I can say is, that so long as old Hugh MacLean lives, the rebels never enter Quebec."

"But, colonel, you forget that government permits me to use the old Palace of the Intendant, without the walls."

"There, madame, I fear you will not be safe. Let me see," he continued. "Why not move in here, and occupy the vacant wing of the castle? We thought of using the lower floor as a hospital, yet that will not, perhaps, incommode you."

"Thanks—thanks! And in return, should there be any wounded, be ours the task of attending to their wants."

"That, madame, will render us your debtors. I will give immediate orders to have the wing fitted for your reception; and although I hope our foes are yet entangled in the wilderness, it may be well for you to move without delay."

The lady again expressed her thanks, and soon withdrew, followed by Estelle, in whose bright smile, more eloquent than words, the gallant old soldier found ample reward for his courtesy. Colonel Dupre remained to dine with the other officers, and the ladies consequently went forth unattended.

Delighted with her success, Madame de Frontenac bated a moment at the door to re-arrange her veil, and had just pulled it down over features lit up by genuine happiness, when one approached whose presence caused an immediate revulsion in her feelings. It was Dan Holbrook, and had the evil one stepped in before her, she would not have felt more completely paralyzed. The countenance was one not to be mistaken, and it was with difficulty that she stifled a cry of anguish. A cold shudder passed through her frame, her teeth chattered, and she was forced to cling to the door for support. But neither Holbrook nor Estelle witnessed her confusion.

The man had been drinking, and no sooner did his eye rest upon the beautiful Indian girl than her charms made him forget the rules of propriety, although her race was considered one which should ever submit. Approaching with a disgusting leer, which made his face even more revolting than that of a satyr, he endeavored to clasp her waist, saying: "You must pay toll as you go out, my darling."

"Toll?" exclaimed Estelle, her savage temperament suddenly excited by this, the first approach to familiarity that she had ever experienced, while her countenance expressed the utmost disgust. Clenching her delicate hand, she dealt him a blow which sent him reeling to the floor.

"Come," hoarsely whispered Madame de Frontenac, as if a prey to bodily anguish, from which she would fain escape, "let us hasten home."

Estelle immediately joined her, but first took a long look at the speechless victim of her just indignation. Those who know the Indian character, had they seen her, would have said: "She is determined neither to forget nor to forgive."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE FOREST MARCH.

"—Tell him we will come on, Though France himself, and such another neighbor, Stand in our way. If we may pass, we will: if we be hindered, We shall your tawny ground with your red blood Discolor."

MEANWHILE, Arnold's army, landing at the mouth of the Kennebec, had advanced that river in batteaux to the head of navigation, and then taken up its line of march through the wilderness, following an old Indian trail. It led, in most places through a dense forest, with a dense undergrowth of thorns and brambles, interwoven together, excepting where intersected by the narrow path, in which two could scarcely walk abreast. Sometimes there was an open interval, then a precipitous defile, and then a soggy morass, over which none but the intrepid continentals could have passed. Much as the historians have eulogized Napoleon's passage of the Alps, it will not bear comparison with Arnold's march from the Kennebec to the St. Lawrence. History cannot boast a page in which man's powers of endurance were more severely tasked or more nobly sustained, than that which records that winter march, under the fatigues of which men of iron nerve sank down, helpless as infants, to die.

The Virginia Rifles, placed at the head of the column, suffered less than their comrades, from the fact that the men were accustomed to the toils of the chase, and were encouraged by their commander, whose patriotism displayed itself in its full amplitude. Instead of yielding, in anger or dejection, to his sense of hardship arising from ignorance of the route, and want of proper supplies, he carefully suppressed all indication of it, and infused into his language a spirit which rekindled to a blaze the dying glow of spirit in his command.

"For'd, boys,—for'd!" he would exclaim. "We have orders to capture Quebec, and we're on our way there. To be sure, this having to eat dogs, and go only half clothed, isn't exactly what we listed for, but old Virginia never tires. For'd, boys,—for'd!"

And the riflemen, fired with patriotism and stimulated by local pride, would echo, "For'd, boys,—for'd!" as they passed on. Precipices were scaled, forests were threaded, defiles were traversed, canoes were carried from river to river, yet the Virginians never faltered as they led the van through the inhospitable wilderness. No welcome village cheered the monotony of the route, no tents afforded them shelter at night from the keen blasts of wintry air, and every day the orderly who was sent back with the "report" to Colonel Arnold, would bring news of sickness and faltering in the main body. Still the advanced guard echoed their leader's cry, "For'd, boys,—for'd!"

Herbert Yancey, greatly to his own gratification and to that of his comrades, had been detailed to join the advance guard, and secure any supplies that might present themselves. This, in the wilderness, was light duty, and the young soldier had an opportunity to become intimately acquainted with Morgan, as they marched along, or sat by the camp-fires at night. Making the old veteran a confidant, he narrated his acquaintance with the rector's ward, and the inexplicable connection which Dan Holbrook somehow had with the events of his stay at Newburyport.

"Depend upon it," said Morgan, as they sat one evening before a huge pile of blazing logs, "that Holbrook is a most consummate scoundrel."

"That he must be," replied Herbert; "yet why his enmity to me? I do not remember ever to have seen him, or to have in any way provoked his anger."

"Never mind," said the old rifleman. "It will all come out right in the end, and the end of a rope will be the proper end of that rascal. How Colonel Arnold could tolerate such a scapegrace, I never could imagine."

"Neither could I," answered Herbert, who felt that this bad man was in some way linked with his destiny. That night, sleep was a stranger to his couch, and he tossed about, troubled with perplexing doubts, until the older riflemen had bestirred themselves, and were arranging the fire.

A few days more, and the ever-advancing troops reached some Indian villages which lay on the frontiers of Canada, but they were entirely deserted. Game was more abundant in their vicinity, however, than it had been in the wilderness, and Herbert was fortunate enough to shoot a fine deer, which he sent to the rear, a present to the commander. The next morning, he went with Morgan to the same spot, and they concealed themselves in some thick underbrush, on the margin of an open grass-ground, before sunrise.

It was not long before a rustling sound was heard, and soon a fine buck and doe came gambolling towards them. Herbert raised his rifle, but Morgan seized his arm, pointing at the same time to two other stags, which were entering the open space, evidently with the intention of attracting the attention of the first comers.

"Indians!" whispered Morgan.

"Where?" asked Herbert.

But his companion, placing his finger on his lips, made no reply. It was evident, however, from the manner in which he watched the last mentioned stags, that he was deeply interested in their movements. The doe had gradually backed out into the underbrush, but her mate did not fancy the presence of intruders, and cautiously advanced, while the two stags retreated, unconsciously, towards the very clump in which the officers were concealed.

All at once, Herbert saw that it was two Indians disguised, who were thus endeavoring to lure the monarch of the forest to such close quarters that an arrow would speed with fatal accuracy into his heart. Now they pretended to feed, now indulged in prancing gambols. After enjoying their cunning for some moments, Morgan could no longer refrain from a practical joke, even at the risk of an encounter with the disguised Indians. Slowly raising his rifle, he fired, and the stag, with one bound, fell dead. But the effect of the shot on the Indians, who were but a few feet from the muzzle of the rifle, was ludicrous in the extreme. Springing to their feet with shrill yells of terror, they cast off their disguises, and struck at once into the recesses of the forest, evidently unwilling to face unseen and unexpected enemies. The scene was worthy of a painter, and Morgan laughed until the tears coursed down his cheeks.

"Now, Herbert," he at length said, "let us examine our masquerades."

The disguises were admirably made, of large and well-dressed deer-skins, and as each examined the one which he had taken up, Morgan found a pocket containing letters carefully sewed in.

"Holloo!" he exclaimed. "Why, this fellow is a mail carrier. Let's see who his letters are for."

Opening the receptacle with his knife, he drew out two letters, read the superscriptions, and without saying a word, handed them to Herbert. They were directed to "Colonel Benedict Arnold," and on one was also written, "From D. Holbrook." With them was a passport, signed by Colonel Carlton, the governor of Canada.

"What!" exclaimed Herbert, "Holbrook in Canada before us?" Morgan's hilarity subsided; a dark expression stole over his face, and he said, in a low tone:

"Can it be possible that Arnold is in the pay of the enemy? If so, he had better die without delay."

"Nay, nay," replied Herbert. "We do our leader wrong. But I cannot imagine what is the secret of all this."

"Neither can I," responded Morgan. "I'll tell you, Herbert. Let us take yonder stag, and carry him to headquarters. We can then explain how these letters came into our possession, and give them to Colonel Arnold."

"The very thing of all others I wished to do. Indeed I was about to propose it when you spoke, for you will remember I have not seen the other portions of our army since we left the Kennebec."

Attracted by the report of the rifle, several of Morgan's men now came up. Directing some to carry the rifles of others, he thus obtained a small party to carry the slaughtered stag, and they repaired to headquarters. The sun was just peeping above the eastern hills, but Colonel Arnold had arisen from his couch of dry leaves, and was making an elaborate toilet. Just as it was completed, he espied Morgan, and advanced to meet him with perfect good breeding.

"Good morning—good-morning!" he exclaimed. "What news from the front?"

"Nothing but a prisoner, colonel."

"Ah! How did you capture him?"

"Not at all, colonel,—we killed him, and a noble buck he is."

Colonel Arnold received the venison with the irrepressible exultation of an epicure, and poured forth a profusion of thanks.

"Dear me!" suddenly exclaimed Morgan. "Here are letters for you, colonel."

Almost ruddyly snatching the proffered letters from Morgan, a black tempest of wrath seemed gathering on Arnold's brow. He paused, however, as he saw that the seals were unopened, and passing his hand across his forehead, recovered his calmness to all appearance, although a slight flush lit up his features. Gazing at the gallant Virginian, as if to read his very thoughts, he saw nothing to warrant a suspicion that his own honesty was doubted, and again breathed freely.

"Excuse me a moment," said he, in a silvery tone. "These are from a trusty spy, and may decide the fate of our expedition. How lucky that you are here!"

Hastily glancing over the contents, while the glitter of stealthily cunning gleamed from his eyes, Arnold folded them again, and deposited them in his pocket. Then, with a loud whistle of exultation, he exclaimed:

"We will have them! Hurrah! I have good news, Major Morgan,—good news, gentlemen. Montgomery has captured Montreal, and will soon advance on Quebec. Let us get there before him, for I have a man waiting there to open the gates."

A loud cheer greeted this information, and as the glad tidings sped from fire to fire, it elicited hearty responses of joy. The toils of the fatiguing march were forgotten, and each heart seemed re-animating by conquest and victory. Foremost among those who congratulated Colonel Arnold on his foresight in thus securing such important information, was Major Morgan, from whose honest heart all unfavorable suspicions and prejudices had disappeared.

"Yes, yes, major. But supposing you had killed my messenger, instead of securing his wits out of him?"

"Then, colonel, you would not have had venison steaks for dinner. But I must hasten to the front, and communicate the good news. Where's Yancey?"

The quarter-master, not wishing to intrude upon an interview in which he felt so deeply interested, was soon found, and Arnold hastened towards him, extending his hand.

"Why, quarter-master," said he, "how well you are looking! Here young Burr and others of your age in the infantry are mere marching skeletons, while you are plump as a partridge."

"Always ready for duty, I trust," replied Herbert Yancey; "but the commissariat has not had much occupation in the advance guard, colonel."

"Never mind—never mind. I shall soon have some special duty for you to perform that will keep you busy enough. Now, Major Morgan, I will not detain you rifle gentlemen longer. Push on with all rapidity."

"Will it not be best to post sentries at night?" asked Morgan, just as he was about to leave.

"Yes, of course," answered Arnold. But a thought appeared to strike him, and he hurriedly corrected himself: "No, I mean. There is not any danger, and should any of the French wish to come in and surrender, it might deter them. Adieu!"

"Nevertheless," said Morgan, to Yancey, as they hastily straggled along, "I shall post men enough to keep them from stealing our rifles. But, Yancey, you must be impatient to hear about those letters. They were from Holbrook, who has somehow got before us to Quebec, and has sent us the news of Montgomery's success."

"And do you think the colonel—"

"An honest man, you would say?" interrupted Morgan, as Yancey hesitated. "I do, yet somehow vague suspicions that all is not right will force themselves upon me."

"So with me," rejoined Herbert. "And I cannot account for a portion of his conduct, especially his hurrying me away from Newburyport. There is surely no hostile disposition manifested against me by the Newburyport men with us."

"Ah, my dear Yancey, you are in love, and hated to leave. That's the secret. Don't blush."

Rejoining the Rifles, the march was soon resumed, and that night the invading army had reached one of the French settlements, where Colonel Arnold concentrated his forces, as the roads were now good before them.

It was a picturesque sight to witness the many fires blazing as if in rivalry with the twinkling stars above, and after Herbert Yancey had attended to his duties, he wrapped himself in a blanket, and sat down at the foot of a large decayed tree, against which he leaned, in deep thought. Each watch-fire was surrounded by a group of men—some smoking, some cleaning the locks of their rifles, some chatting and others asleep,—the countenances of all suffused with one ruddy glow. The night wore on, and gradually the men lay down to sleep, wrapped in their blankets, nor did Herbert fail to follow their example. How long he had slept, he did not know, when a shake of the shoulder aroused him. Springing to his feet, he saw Morgan and Arnold standing at his side.

"Come, come," said Morgan, "no more dreaming to-night. The commander has a mission for you."

"Yes," continued Colonel Arnold,—"a mission of great importance; and if you will come to my bivouac, I will give you your instructions."

"Good-by, Yancey," said Morgan. "Remember old Virginia!"

What the instructions given to the young quarter-master were, it is not now necessary to say, but that night an Indian runner left the camp for Quebec, with a letter, unsigned and undirected, but in the unmistakable hand-writing of Arnold. It read thus:

"DEAR DAN,—The game will arrive in a day after this, and be sure that you take good care of it."

CHAPTER XIV.

A HEARTY HISTORY.

"I know a bank where the wild thyme blows,
Where the cowslip and the walling violet grows.
Quite over-canopied with luscious woodbine,
With sweet musk-roses and with eglantine."

THE Intendant's Palace, which stood just without the walls of Quebec at the time whereof we write, was without question the most magnificent residence on the American continent. After having passed that ordeal of fire to which all Canadian buildings are sooner or later subjected, it had been rebuilt by the French monarch in a style equalling his own palaces, and far more splendid than the castle itself. For some years after the conquest by the English, the palace was unoccupied, and the magnificent terraces of its garden were overrun with weeds. But when it fell into the hands of Madame de Frontenac, to whom it was granted by government as a fit home for her admirable institution, its appearance was changed. Again the rare forest trees spread their waving branches over rich parterres of flowers, and silvery fountains were in constant play. It was a delightful resort for the young Indian girls, and one well calculated to reconcile them to an absence from the flowery savannas of their forest homes.

But the crowning glory of the palace was its conservatory, a large hall with a vaulted, glass-covered roof, containing every variety of tropical vegetation, even in the depth of Canadian winters. Around the walls, which were covered with grape-vines in full bearing, was a broad belt of orange and lemon trees, mingled with enormous camelia japonicas, the golden fruit and verdant leaves of the first mentioned contrasting beautifully with the many colored flowers with which the latter were loaded. Within this mosaic of tropical vegetation was a broad marble paved walk, which in its turn encircled a clump of gigantic palm trees, stretching their tall branches up to the centre of the vaulted roof. Around these were twined every conceivable variety of rare climbing plants, sometimes waving their long wreaths of leaves and flowers in graceful festoons, then hanging like serpents from the boughs, now trailing to the ground, and now interlacing until they formed a floral shrine; a wall of waving beauty, swaying to and fro in the perfumed breeze, to the music of a gently falling fountain.

Within this charmed circle, in a sanctuary accessible by a subterranean passage, leading from the castle, Madame de Frontenac had an oratory—a private retreat, where she was entirely secluded from the world. It was to that secluded spot that she was wont to repair when troubled by the petty vexations of everyday life, and thither she hastened when the unexpected appearance of Dan Holbrook so troubled her very soul. Estelle still accompanied her, for she had not the courage to remain unattended. Man, when the tempest rages, can brave its fury alone, but confiding, gentle woman likes a sympathizing companion. The eagle can sweep the storm-cloud, but the dove returns fluttering to the ark, happy if she can find her mate to smooth her ruffled plumage.

Yet Madame de Frontenac did not speak, or give Estelle any cause to suppose that anything but the insult of a stranger to herself had caused her agitation. Throwing herself upon an ottoman, the queen-like lady buried her head in its luxurious pillows, as if to shut out a hideous sight. But the maiden, with knitted brows and her thin lips compressed, beat upon the marble pavement with her tiny foot, as if in this monotonous movement she found vent for the vengeance which filled her very being.

The tolling of the vesper-bell awakened each from her day-dream, and throwing themselves upon their knees before a statue of the Virgin Mary, they told their beads in earnest prayer. The Indian maiden was the first to rise, and when she saw that Madame de Frontenac had also finished her devotions, she exclaimed:

"Let not our mother grieve because a drunken pale-face troubled her child. O, would that I was a warrior, that I might hang the scamp of that—"

"Peace, peace!" interrupted the matron. "Such vindictive thoughts are not acceptable to her to whom we have just offered our devotions."

"But the insult, mother!" exclaimed the maiden, her eyes sparkling as she spoke, and the heightened color of her cheek betraying her passion.

There was a dead pause, and then Madame de Frontenac said, in a gentle tone: "Estelle."

The girl saw that some weighty sorrow preyed upon a heart which she prized, and going towards her, she knelt at her side, and taking her cold hands, clasped them until heat was restored.

"Estelle," again said Madame de Frontenac, as if it required an effort to speak, "would you hear a heart history?" Then, without waiting a reply, she continued: "Years, years ago, when the French flag waved over Quebec, there was a merchant here whose whole soul was absorbed in the fur trade, and who regarded his only daughter as a saleable commodity, ready for the wealthiest bidder when she should become marketable. The poor girl was consequently dressed, decorated, and led into such scenes of fashionable dissipation as the province afforded, where her wealth and her charms attracted hosts of suitors. Their very language flowed into a kind of metre as they caught the light of her golden smile; all nature was searched for images to which her charms might be compared, and nature was found wanting—at least she was told so. Even the butterfly officers who came bankrupt from the French court assured her that neither at Versailles nor Trianon had they ever seen such a peerless creature, and she at last began to believe them.

"At times, the young girl's heart would tell her that she was formed for better things than these frivolities, and she would long for some suitor who could command her respect, as a vine seeks some sturdy oak to clasp for support. At last her fancy was arrested by a young and enterprising Bostonian, who had come to Quebec as supercargo of a merchant vessel, and was entertained by her father, in the hope of getting good prices for the return cargo of furs. He, without ceremony, attempted to carry her heart by storm, and the first opportunity that presented itself, declared himself in love with her. This audacity on the part of a stranger displeased her, but his perseverance at first tranquillized her, then interested her, then won her affections. Thinking that he loved her, she loved him, and bright were the dreams that hovered around her pillow.

"While matters stood thus—for he begged her not to inform her father,—the old gentleman one day told her that a formal proposition had been made for her hand by a wealthy Canadian, who bore one of the first names in the province, and was as celebrated for his learning as he was for his extensive estates. The young girl's dismay was beyond description, for she dreaded the arbitrary paternal power, yet felt that she could never consent to marry one man while loving another. She asked for a week to consider the matter—a long, wretched week, and at its close, emboldened by agony, she stammered out a confession of her attachment to the Bostonian.

"The old gentleman very coolly inquired if she had seen her captivator that day. 'No, nor the day previous.' With a chuckle he opened a large pocket-book, from which he took a paper, and requested her to read it. At first she glanced her eyes over it mechanically, but then saw—O horror!—that it was a regular business agreement, by which her pretended lover, for twenty pounds sterling, relinquished all claim to her hand, and pledged himself not to see her while he remained at Quebec.

PILCHARD FISHING IN MOUNTS BAY, CORNWALL.

LAKE WINDERMERE.

"This selfish treachery on the part of one to whom she had given her pure heart, made her desperate, and she consented to be led passively to the cathedral, decked like a victim to the sacrifice. There, at the holy altar, her father bestowed her hand and her dowry on her wealthy suitor, who well knew that he was not the object of her love, yet persisted in his selfish purpose. He obtained her hand, but her heart remained her own.

"Her father was now at the height of his ambition, for he saw his daughter the wife of a noble and a rich man, who was at the head of the hereditary aristocracy of the province. Magnificent was the house fitted up for her reception, gorgeous were her monthly importations of fashionable attire from Paris, dazzling were her jewels. All the troubles and the cares of life seemed far removed from her, as she presided over her well-appointed establishments, in the city and in the country; yet there was not a mental in her service that was not more happy. Her husband, piqued at her previous preference for a mere clerk, and vexed at the coolness with which she continued to treat him, had the meanness to constantly insinuate what was unfortunately the fact—that she had carried her beauty into the market, and sold it as her father would sell a bale of buffalo robes. Now she regretted the sacrifice which she had made, but it was too late to retrace her steps. She had promised to love, honor and obey, the first her husband did not now care for, but with great decision he enforced the latter. Indifference was impossible; she was required to choose between a qualified submission and open warfare.

"Providence, as if to cheer her path of life, blessed her with a daughter—a lovely babe, my dear Estelle, who, if living, is about your own age. The child seemed to act as a bond of union, and for a while they lived more happily together. But just then, as if designed as a punishment for her former heartlessness, her old lover returned. She despised him, yet he persisted in visiting her—in interrupting her walks—in serenading her at night. At last, the craven dared to speak of love, and to propose an elopement. When she first heard his degrading proposals, she was too much astonished to reply. At last, words came to her relief, and she sent him sneaking away like a scared wolf, disappointed of his prey, yet, with the tenacity of that animal, resolving still to accomplish the base purpose on which he had set his soul. Vowing revenge, he became a spy on her actions, hovered around her house at unreasonable hours, and spared no means by which he could blacken her reputation.

"Soon his diabolical scheme began to have its desired results; the public began to shun her, and at last the jealousy of her husband was aroused.

Bitterly and coarsely he accused her, and she, with pride of heart, cast back his foul charges, until he felt the more confident of their truth. As he went out, he met the tempter, who professed great embarrassment, and asked pardon for offences that only existed in his own miserable imagination. But he had gone too far; for the husband, thinking himself dishonored, drew his sword, and inflicted a wound that the wretch will carry to his grave. That night, taking his child, with her nurse, he hastened on board a vessel just starting for France; nor has he, or the innocent babe, been heard of since.

"This attempt at dishonor, with the loss of her child, awakened the doomed wife to a sense of her position. Ever ardent in her feelings, her remorse was bitter, and had death at that moment released her from the agony of self-reproach, it would have been welcome. But the inexorable King of Terror will not come at a mortal's wish. Now it was, for the first time in her life, that she began to turn her thoughts seriously towards the Holy Church as the only source of comfort. Gladly would she have taken the veil, but there was no certainty that her husband did not live—nay, she never would admit that her child had perished in the waves. Her father's death made her the possessor of enormous wealth, and that she might offer some atonement for her offences, she—

"Ah," interrupted Estelle, "I see—I see it all! It was this sorrow that prompted you to devote your life to the redemption of us poor children of the forest, plucked as brands from the burning."

"You are right, Estelle, and you, being about the age of my dear child (who I feel is preserved by Providence), have received my especial love. Often have I wished to look back into the tablets of memory, and confide to you my heart-sorrows of the past, for I was confident of your sympathy."

"O, madame," exclaimed Estelle, weeping as though her heart would break, "it needed not this recital to obtain it, for you have ever possessed it! Would that I could supply your daughter's place!"

"Thanks," replied Madame de Frontenac, embracing the affectionate girl. "But I have not told you all. I have to-day seen the author of all my sorrows—the sordid, revengeful violator of my domestic happiness."

"What! that hideous monster who so insulted me?"

"The same. Dissipation and other unbridled habits have sadly changed his form and features, but the body is now far more worthy of the mind than it was before."

The boom of a cannon startled them, and it was soon followed by another and another report.

"Can the enemy have landed?" exclaimed Estelle.

"I cannot say," replied Madame de Frontenac; "but it will be best to retire into the city by the subterranean passage. It branches off to the castle and the cathedral."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

CORNISH FISHERWOMEN OF MOUNTS BAY.

SCENES IN EUROPE.

PILCHARD FISHERY.—The first engraving on the preceding page represents the pilchard-fishery at Mounts Bay, Cornwall. The pilchard is a fish found chiefly on the coasts of Cornwall, and is caught either by the drift-net or the seine. A seine-fishery requires three boats and about eighteen men to work together. There are two nets employed, one of which is the "stop seine," a quarter of a mile in length and a hundred feet in depth; the other is the "trick seine," half as long as the other, but somewhat deeper and having a hollow in the middle. Each seine is carried by a separate boat, while the third conveys the men to and from shore. When the position and extent of the shoal is ascertained the stop seine is cast. There are corks at the top and leads at the bottom to keep it in position. The seine at first forms a curved line across the centre of the fish, and while the two larger boats are employed in warping the ends, the third boat is stationed in the openings, and the crew keep the fish from escaping by dashing water. When the seine is closed and the ends brought together, the truck-seine is laid on the inner side, and then drawn together so as gradually to raise the fish from the bottom. Sometimes five million pilchards have been taken at one haul. Another engraving on the same page presents us with a sketch of the Cor-

LAKE OF TIMSHAH.

THE LAKE OF TIMSHAH.—On this page we present a sketch of the enormous basin, thus called, in the centre of the Isthmus of Suez. In the foreground is a group of oriental travellers, with their desert-ships, the camels, and further on, the white tents of an Arab encampment. If the Suez canal, connecting the Red Sea with the Mediterranean is completed, this basin would become an inland harbor of sufficient depth to float all the commercial navies in the world. Suez.—The next engraving on this page presents a view of the town and harbor of Suez, taken from the Asiatic coast. The buildings at the foot of the hill—a spur of the Altala Mountains—are the fort and custom-house, the grand hotel, and several mosques, stores and private buildings. All these have sprung up since the establishment of the overland mail to India. The harbor is deep and safe. The last view on this page is of an oasis, south-east of Pelusium. The group of palm trees, sheltering the travellers' tents and camels beneath them, contrasts agreeably with the wide waste of sand extended before and beyond them. An oasis, or spot where grass and trees thrive, may be found throughout Egypt wherever a spring of water enlivens the arid deadness of the soil. The oases on the Isthmus of Suez may be said to be the last remains of ancient cultivation and history-renowned fertility. The luxuriant vegetanish Fisherwomen at Mounts Bay. One of them has her creel, or fish-basket strapped on her back. Its form is more distinctly seen in that which lies beside the seated fisherwoman. A distant glimpse of the bay and mountains is seen in the distance. These fisherwomen, like all ladies who deal in their commodity, are remarkably sharp at a bargain, and have a glib fluency of speech not always agreeable to purchasers, who are apt to get more "tongues and sounds" than they bargain for. Mr. St. John, in his "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Greeks," has collected many humorous passages from the classical writers relating to the quickness, the wit and the knavish cunning of the itinerant fish dealers of Athens, so much, indeed, as to strongly remind us of what passes in the markets of modern cities. LAKE WINDERMERE.—The beautiful landscape on the preceding page is a faithful view of Lake Windermere, one of the most charming sheets of water in the famous "Lake District of England." It has been the theme of poets and painters, and is the idol of tourists. The fine, sweeping outlines of the hills are, in calm, bright days, duplicated in the mirror of the lake, and with the wooded islets, and the cattle grazing in the foreground, making up a charming group of natural beauties.

VIEW OF SUEZ, FROM THE COAST OF SUEZ.

OASIS, SOUTHEAST OF PELUSIUM.

tion which spontaneously springs up wherever fresh water is conducted to cool and moisten the ground, shows not only what ancient Egypt must have been, but also what modern Egypt might become, if in connection with the maritime canal across the Isthmus of Suez, a system of fresh-water canals were to spread the water of the Nile over a wilderness which waits but for that one gift of Heaven to become a land of abundance. The building of this canal would be one of the greatest commercial enterprises of modern times, and would be a sure means, not only of adding incalculably to the wealth of the West, but of hurrying on the civilization of the East. With the European tide setting upon Asia through this channel, and the American tide flowing upon it from our Pacific shore, it would seem that the cradle of the race was destined to retrieve its long ages of darkness and despotism and rise once again to power and influence. This new channel of communication would be a powerful lever towards the accomplishment of such a result. It would seem that in the providential destiny of nations, our own country is to exert no unimportant part in the future renaissance of a continent which in the remote ages of the world, held all that there was of civilization and power, and was the original birthplace of all the nations.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TO AN OLD MAN.

BY GEORGE U. COOMER.

When musing on the furrowed brow,
That once with beauty beamed,
Most venerably hoary now,
Full often I have dreamed
That purer ministers than e'er
Our worldly thoughts engage,
Make sweet the autumn atmosphere,
And bless the calm of age.

Beside thy path, though none behold,
Are angel shapes, the same
As in the plains of Mamre old,
To righteous Abraham came.
They guide thy weak, descending feet,
As deeper grows the vale,
And faster dies the verdure sweet,
And falls the fruitage pale.

But glorious, unseen ministers
Dwell not with thee alone;
Each promise that thy spirit stirs,
As deeply moves my own.
By faith is heard, in calm or storm,
A voice o'er all the globe,
To-day, as when the Eternal from
The whirlwind answered Job:

To show, as in the time of yore,
Man's weakness—his decay;
And how God reigneth evermore,
Though all else pass away;
How strength and grandeur e'er abide
In godliness and truth;
Though humbled low be worldly pride,
And vanished worldly youth.

To thee shall death come soft as one
Who waketh man from dreams;
To show, beyond the glorious sun,
Rejuvenating streams.
More precious than the fabled fount,
Once sought in southern shade,
By Mexic vale and Cuban mount,
And sun-bright everglade.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE WIFE AND THE GRADUATE.

BY N. T. MUNROE.

CONSTANT attention to business and study had seriously impaired my health, and in compliance with the orders of my physician, I packed my valise one beautiful morning in May and started on a southern tour.

As I had determined to leave all care and business behind me, I tried with all my might to get interested either in the scenery or in my fellow-passengers; but at first, visions of law cases would come in between me and my surroundings; the thoughts which had pressed so hard on my brain would not be easily put aside, yet as the cars whirled swiftly along, there was something in their rapid motion that seemed to break the spell that had bound me—something that carried me mentally as well as bodily out of the atmosphere in which I had moved so long. I began to look with pleasure upon the green fields, the pretty country villages, and found myself getting interested in the appearance of a nice looking couple in front of me who were acting out a little love drama, as they thought, all unobserved. I began to wonder where this man belonged who was talking politics so fiercely, and where this other gentleman—dressed in black, intently reading a newspaper, and who I judged must be a minister—was settled, and of what persuasion he was; then I wondered if that interesting young lady in the neat travelling dress was not going South as a governess; and when I saw the politician dropped at one station, the clergyman at a country town, where I imagined he was settled and where I pointed out to myself the church in which he preached, and finally the neat looking young lady was left at one of the depots where she was led off, as I thought in triumph, by a fine looking young gentleman, I really felt as if I had lost old friends. But I quickly got interested in new faces and new persons whom we were constantly taking up on the road. By-and-by it grew dark, the conductor came and lighted up the cars, the buzz of conversation began to die away, the heads of the passengers drooped, I saw the couple in front of me sit still nearer, then I noticed that the gentleman passed his arm around her waist to support her, her head after a while all unconsciously dropped on his shoulder and—I fell asleep.

I had not wholly decided on my course of travel when I started upon my journey, but had determined to let myself be guided by circumstances. Stopping for a few days at the city of Philadelphia, I fell in with an old college friend, Fred Newton, whom I had not met since we left together the classic halls of Cambridge. Fred was a wild boy, and evidently he was a fast young man, but he was cordial, warm-hearted, generous, and glad to see me, said I looked dove to death and as thin as a hatchet, and insisted upon my going home with him to recreate. He would let me ride or walk or sit still, in fine, I might do just what I pleased; and as I was in truth not at all averse to his proposition, we started together, a few days after, for Newtonville, which was the name of the elder Mr. Newton's estate. Fred had written to inform the family of our coming, and on leaving the cars we found two saddle horses ready to take us, the remainder of the journey, a distance of about twelve miles. It was a splendid ride after a journey of many miles in the close cars. The air was pure and soft, the country was fine, our horses good, and as we rode over the ground at a swift pace, our spirits rose with the occasion, and perhaps no lighter, freer-hearted fellows ever cantered over the soil of the Old Dominion.

All care and business I had left in the old Bay State, and now I was bound to enjoy myself. I had once thought fame, wealth and station were all that was worth living for, and asked no higher good; but the demons of dyspepsia, ill health and the blue devils took possession of me, and I said in bitterness of heart, "all that a man hath will he give for a sound body, a good digestion, a light heart." I had money enough, I enjoyed a good reputation among my fellow-men, but my poor, frail body had of late entered so many complaints, making itself a most conspicuous personage by threatening to refuse its aid when called upon, that it fairly embittered all my happiness. But now, on this bright afternoon, what cared I for all these things? I laughed at dyspepsia, snapped my fingers at the blue devils, and cried, "Get thee behind me, unmanly imps."

We came at last within sight of Fred's home, a fine, large, roomy mansion, with a verandah all around the lower floor. Two blacks stood ready to take our horses as we dismounted, and the whole family came to the door to greet us. I was introduced to Fred's father and mother, also to his sister, a young lady of about twenty, looking a good deal like Fred, and also to a younger brother and sister, and these composed the family group. Behind them stood a number of negro servants, grinning and showing their white teeth and the whites of their eyes. Fred shook hands most dutifully with his father and mother, kissed his sister most lovingly and respectfully, and caught the younger ones in his arms, embracing them in not the most gentle manner.

I was pretty well tired out that night, for a ride of twelve miles on horseback was something I was not used to, and greatly as I enjoyed it, I found it fatigued me very much. But one night's rest recruited me. I rose the next morning refreshed and exhilarated. I threw open my window and the rich perfume of the roses came in on the morning air. I looked around on the well kept grounds and all things which spoke of wealth and abundance, and tried to realize that I was at the sunny South. I heard the voices of the children at play on the lawn, then I heard Fred's merry laugh, then a sweet voice singing little snatches of some simple ballad, and making what haste I could with my toilet, I was soon below, exchanging morning greetings with the family.

A merry life we led in this pleasant, hospitable home. We had no care, no thought, beyond the enjoyment of the present hour. We rode on horseback, we strolled through the woods, we went on pleasure excursions. My worn out frame gained strength in the warm southern atmosphere, life began again to have bright hopes for me, and I began to think there was something worth living for besides books and court rooms.

A week's free, social intercourse such as we enjoyed at Newtonville, ripens one's friendship astonishingly fast. Your northern friendships are long coming to maturity; but go to a southern home, be with its inmates every hour of the day, ride with them, walk with them, sit with them beneath the shade, or out on the verandah by moonlight, sing with them, talk with them freely, not conventionally as we do things at the North, and it is astonishing how quick your friendship grows—how soon you understand each other, and feel as if you had been acquainted for years, and were old, true friends.

Now, all my four years' intercourse with Fred at Cambridge, had not given me the insight into his character that one week of close home communion with him had done. He appeared in his best light at home, he was so kind and deferential to his parents, so affectionate to his brother and sisters. I knew he was impetuous, passionate, and not always actuated by the highest principles, but I always had faith that the good heart would retrieve the sometimes misjudging head.

So I might have met Clara Newton at a whole winter's course of assemblies, lectures and parties at the North, yet not have obtained the clear insight into her character that a week's constant and familiar intercourse to her own home had given me. When I say she was pretty and graceful, I say no more than might be said of hundreds of young ladies; she was more, she was fascinating by her naturalness, her perfect freedom from any mannerism or affectation. She always spoke from her pure, true heart. She pretended to no charms of person or mind to attract or please you, and yet all the time you felt yourself attracted and pleased. She was warm, affectionate, loving, impressive as Fred himself, but without his fiery temper, and with more of strong, firm, moral principle as a basis to her character. She was generous and self-sacrificing, without seeming to know they were virtues, so natural were they to her. She was like a fresh, sweet flower, to me like a new bright star in my firmament.

In the circle in which I moved at home I had formed the acquaintance of many finely cultivated women, and some very beautiful ones too, but yet there were none like Clara. I liked them, liked to converse with them, felt it was good to be with them, that their influence over me was for good, that they were splendid specimens of womankind, ornaments to society, and a credit to the land that nurtured them—but Clara was not like these. I liked to be with Clara, were it only to look upon her, she was so beautiful, she always looked so fresh, so glowing and happy. She always had a smile for you, a kind word, some little token of affection. Her manners were not like our northern manners. I know many ladies of my acquaintance who would have been greatly shocked at many things which Clara did not hesitate at all to do, yet no one could doubt her purity of thought and act. She felt no foolish reserve in her intercourse with me, and she saw fit to affect none. She trusted me, she thought well of me, she was willing to let me see it; at my words of gallantry and praise of her beauty she never blushed nor simpered as I have seen ladies do, but looked at me with a clear, pleased glance, happy that she was beautiful if it afforded pleasure to others. Well, week after week passed, and blissful weeks they were. Week after week of long sunny days, week after week of pleasure. By-and-by, I don't know how it was, Fred was often absent from our walks and rides, and when on moonlight evenings we sat on the verandah, Clara and I generally sat the longest. Those weeks were like a long blissful dream, and they ended at last, yet not as dreams end; they did not vanish like the blissful fabric of a vision, but when they had passed, I stood with the white hand of Clara within my own, and her clear eyes looking into mine, making stronger the assurance her lips had already spoken, that she was mine forever.

So I started for my northern home with my beautiful bride. I had more than accomplished the object of my journey. My health seemed perfectly established, and I had found what many are much longer in finding—their other self. Shall I ever forget that journey home? How beautiful it was! The skies were never bluer nor the face of the earth more lovely. The disappointments incident to travelling by cars and steamboats were nothing to us. In our excess of happiness we wondered how people could be so miserable for such trifles.

I took my bride to my mother's home, for so it had been arranged, till I could fit up a home suitable for her. Clara's loving, winning ways went straight to my mother's heart, and in a very little time she loved her dearly.

In a short time our house was fitted up for our accommodation, and I took my wife to her new home. I tried to make it pleasant for her, and furnished it in southern style as far as was consistent with our northern climate, and she was delighted; indeed she was not exacting, it was of the heart and the affections she thought more than of externals.

We went into society, and Clara was admired for her beauty, and attracted much attention.

I had gone again deep into business which took up much of my time and attention, but Clara seemed gay and cheerful, and always met me with a sweet smile of welcome. O, we were very happy! As the winter came on we went still more into society, not gay and brilliant assemblies, but select circles, composed of men and women of cultivated intellects who spoke learnedly and eloquently upon the great subjects of the day, people who cared little for show and dress, but more for intrinsic merit and mental culture. It was a circle in which I enjoyed much and to which I was proud to belong. There were many ladies in this circle whom I much admired and considered as models of their sex. It was a new circle indeed for Clara. She listened, as she told me in her artless way when we were alone, with astonishment to hear ladies converse so well. She had never before been in company with ladies of such superior intellect, and there was a shade of sadness on her beautiful face as she said:

"I felt quite insignificant, and was afraid you were ashamed of me."

I made no reply, only to kiss the upturned face and tell her playfully she was a foolish little thing.

There are some people who I think are all mind and no heart, and some of this description belonged to the circle of which I have spoken; and I was not long in seeing that they looked upon my good and beautiful wife with a sort of sileat contempt, as if they thought her a doll or plaything—pretty to look at and no more. They made no conversation with her, never asked her opinion upon any subject, and were sometimes almost marked in their neglect of the common rules of politeness towards her. Clara was not long in seeing this, for she was quick and sensitive. I saw that she understood it all, and I was aware that it made her very unhappy, but I did not comfort her nor soothe her. Shall I say it?—I began to feel when with the keen-eyed women a feeling, not shame perhaps, but something akin to it, that my wife was not what they would style an intellectual woman.

A spell seemed upon me, my good and gentle wife was not to me what she had been. She was beautiful as ever, and kind and true and loving, but there was something lacking—she was not all I wished. Evil passions took possession of me; I grew sullen and morose; I often spoke to her unkindly—may God forgive me! But Clara never answered me back again; she grew silent and sad and pale, yet was ever ready to smile and be cheerful if I seemed any more cheerful than usual. If I was in a sullen mood she was quiet and thoughtful, but always speaking pleasantly to me no matter how unreasonable I grew.

Our life was not what it had been. I often went into company leaving my wife by herself, and I think she was relieved by my doing this. We were in fact very unhappy; but it was a state of things which might not long continue, for beneath all Clara's gentleness and kindness there lay a vast amount of energy and decision.

One night on coming home, I did not find my wife in her little sitting-room as usual, and on going into the parlor I found she was not there. I inquired of the servants for their mistress—she went away in a carriage this morning, they said. I was thunderstruck. Was this my gentle, yielding Clara? I sat down to my lonely meal. How silent and deserted was the house! It seemed every moment as if she must come in. I went up to our chamber; how still and silent it was. Could it be that she had left me? I felt the spell breaking that had bound my heart so long, and I began to see how that perhaps my own conduct had driven her from me. I went up to her dressing-table; she had left a few of her articles around—a ribbon she had worn in her hair, a glove I had seen upon her hand. I took up the ribbon and held it in my hand. I took up the glove, and scarcely knowing what I did, pressed it to my lips. A delicate perfume, in my mind associated with Clara, thrilled through my frame, and the tears came to my eyes. I went to my own dressing-table; there lay a little morocco case; I opened it; it contained her picture. Was it indeed her parting gift? Beneath the case lay a little note addressed to me, I tore it open and read:

"DEAR ROBERT,—Don't think hard of me, don't blame me. We have been very unhappy. I leave you. You will not try to find me for it will be useless, and it is better you should not. I was not suited to you. I have not made you happy. It was my misfortune not my fault that I could not do so. My purpose in leaving you is not a sudden one, and I do it for the best. Some day you may bless me for it. If I have erred, forgive me. Do not forget me, my husband; think of me kindly; think of me as I was when you first knew me and we were happy. It is possible that being absent you will love me better than when present. I leave you this little token of remembrance; when you look at it think kindly of her who is away, and hope that we may yet be happy, and may God in heaven bless you. CLARA."

This was all. She had left me, gone I knew not whither. How all her beauty, her goodness, came up before me, how every unkind word I had spoken to her, every act of neglect, rose up before me through that long night. Yet it seemed so strange and unaccountable that she should leave me. I had been so sure of her perfect love and devotion, so sure that nothing on earth could estrange her from me, not even my unkindness and neglect, that turn it as I would I could not solve the mystery. But there was the bitter truth before me—she had gone, she had left me, I was alone! The long night passed at length, and morning dawned. I pressed the ribbon she had worn in her hair, the glove which had touched her hand, the picture she had left me, to my heart, and prepared to start in search of her; for how could I heed her request not to seek her? But where should I go? I knew not, yet I seemed to have a vague idea that perhaps she had gone home. So, leaving a message for my mother, telling her of what had happened and where I had gone, I started upon my mournful journey.

Once again I travelled that road, but O, with what different sensations from those which had filled my heart when I came home with my young bride! I saw now no beauty in nature, felt no interest in humanity. I stopped again at the well-known depot where I hired a horse to carry me to Newtonville. The road seemed long and dreary; even the house, which had always looked to me so pleasant and cheerful, seemed now to wear a different aspect. I rode up to the door. Fred was the first to greet me.

"Good heavens, Robert," said he, "what is the matter?" I knew by the address and the manner, that she was not there—that he knew nothing of her—and as my last hope faded away I came near falling from my horse. Fred helped me into the house; he saw that some mighty grief was upon me, and was silent. I sat down upon the sofa, and Fred stood before me waiting for me to speak. As soon as I could, I said:

"She is not here, then?"

"Who, Robert?" said he, in a pitying tone, and I saw that he thought I was a little bewildered.

"Clara," said I.

"Clara," said he, "my sister—what do you mean?"

"She has left me, Fred, and I did not know but she had come home."

I saw that his cheek grew deathly pale, that his teeth pressed his lips till the blood started, to keep down his rising anger, and I began to grow almost frightened, for how could I explain the cause of her leaving me?

"Come home!" said he, at length, in a dry, husky voice. "Left you?" and he paced the room to keep down his rising anger.

"Fred," said I.

He turned round quickly, and his face, distorted by his passion, was fearful to look upon, and I almost shrunk from him.

"What have you to say, sir. Explain yourself."

"Fred," said I in a gentle tone, "Clara has left me."

"You told me so before," he thundered forth; "but why did she leave you? answer me that. You must have abused her, villain that you are, or she would never have done it. What have you done with her? Where is my sister? answer me." And he sprang upon me with the ferocity of a tiger. "Speak to me," he cried, "or I will shake you to atoms."

I struggled in his grasp, but he had the strength of a giant, and I was weak as a child. Mrs. Newton entered the room at this moment.

"Fred, Robert," said she, "what does this mean?"

He turned and flung me from him, with a sudden revulsion of feeling put his arms round his mother's neck and wept like a child. Mrs. Newton knew not what to make of the scene.

"Tell me, Robert," she said, "why is all this—and Clara, where is she?"

The name roused Fred; he waited not for me to answer.

"You may well ask where she is. She has left him, he says—our own Clara—and he dares come here to find her. How must he have treated her, to have driven her from him. May he—"

"Fred," said she, "be calm, and hear what her husband has to say."

He stood looking at me with bitter rage, as I went on and told the whole story, not sparing myself in the least. His face grew softer in expression as I proceeded on, and he felt that my sorrow and remorse were sincere, but still I saw that he did not forgive me.

But why dwell on the sorrowful scene—she was not there. I had brought sorrow to the home that had given me such untold happiness, and I left there with a heavy heart and stricken conscience.

I knew not where to direct my steps, yet for many weeks I travelled on, seemingly without a definite object other than to escape from my great sorrow. That, I found at length, was impossible, so I came home, or rather to my mother's home, for how could I go back to the home now so desolate? So for many years I lived with my mother, and the mystery was not solved. I heard nothing from Clara, knew not whether she was living or dead. I grew a sadder, a wiser, and I hope a better man.

Rumor had been busy with my name at my wife's departure; but the nine days' wonder at last passed away, and people ceased to talk of it. One, two, three years faded away. The treasured ribbon, the glove and the picture which never left me, showed that I had been faithful to her request—that I remembered her.

It was during the fifth year of her departure that one day I was surprised at receiving a letter from Fred Newton, requesting me to be in Philadelphia at such a time. There was something mysterious about the letter, and I started instantly, as requested. I met him at the same hotel where we had met once before, and his greeting was cordial and friendly.

"Why did you send for Fred?"

"To introduce you to my wife. I am married, and live in this city. You must come home with me."

I did so. Went with him and was introduced to his wife, a most charming and agreeable woman.

"Come, Robert," said he to me the next day, "will you go with us this morning? My wife has a sister in the Female College in this city, and as she is to graduate this term we feel very much interested in the exercises."

I consented, of course, as it would have been very impolite for me to refuse. When we went into the hall it was very much crowded, and we were obliged to take a seat at the side of the platform, where the students would stand, and the crowd in front much intercepted our view. The exercises soon commenced, and I was beginning to grow very much interested, although I could not see the fair students, when a voice struck upon my ear which caused my heart to stand still, it was so like a voice whose music I had not heard for nearly five long years. I leaned forward, I rose up and stretched over the throng before me. I could only catch a glimpse of her dress. At the risk of being pronounced rude, I pushed forward; but it was too late, she had disappeared from the platform. I looked around and caught Fred's eagle eye fixed upon me, but his expression was unreadable. I sat down again, but I was all ears as the exercises went on. By-and-by I heard the voice again, and this time in a Latin dissertation. Had not my whole soul been intent upon the voice, I should have been pleased with the perfect execution of the performance. I sat still. I made no effort to catch a glimpse of the speaker. I seemed weak and powerless. Then came English recitations, and I listened to many fine dissertations and essays, but I heard as hearing them not, till by-and-by rose that voice again. It read a finely written English essay upon some subject I do not now remember. As the reader went on and the beautiful thoughts flowed forth, the crowd gave evident tokens of their pleasure and admiration.

I could stand it no longer. I pushed forward, regardless of all politeness, and there, upon the platform, stood Clara—my Clara, my gentle, my beautiful wife—reading, with a clear, sweet voice, words to which the vast audience were listening with pleasure and delight.

I did not faint, nor start, nor utter even an exclamation, for I was a stout, strong man, but I stood there and looked at her, and thought the words were very beautiful. I don't think I understood one of them; but I understood something more, I saw through it all. I saw why she had left me. I understood how the long years had been passed, years of toil and study all for my sake, so that I might not be ashamed of her, might yet be proud of her. I understood it all—her generous self-sacrifice, her enduring love, her patient toil—and as she went on and I stood and gazed—and she didn't know who was looking thus earnestly upon her—I saw how her face had changed, how it had perhaps lost a little of its glad, joyous expression, but had gained a spirituality and a soul light that was far more lovely.

She finished, and I went back to my seat, and sitting down, covered my face with my hands, and the exercises went on; but I heard them no more than if I had been a hundred miles away. I heard nothing of aught else but Clara's voice, saw nothing but Clara's face.

The crowd dispersed. Fred touched me on the shoulder, and we went home in silence. I went directly to my chamber and sat down. Some hours passed away, but I don't think I stirred or moved till a servant came to my door and said some one below wished to see me. Then I went down to the parlor, and there we met, who had not met for five years.

"And you will forgive me, Robert?" said she, as she put her white hands in mine, and looked up to me once more with that dear glance I thought never more to meet on earth. "And you have not forgotten me?" she added, "and we will yet be happy, won't we?"

It is needless to tell of the many things which, in my excess of happiness, I whispered in her ear. Clara was mine again. I appreciated her now. I held her fast. I gave her no cause for unhappiness more.

"It has been a lesson for me, Clara; without this absence I should not have understood you. We might have been unhappy through life. Whatever these years may have done for you, their lesson has been far more to me, for it has taught me the depth and strength of your nature, which my dullness, without this, could not have seen."

So our bridal home was opened again. People had another nine days' wonder to talk over, and we were very happy once more. Fred and his wife came to see us, and he told us how he had planned the meeting; for Clara, knowing the anxiety of her parents and brother concerning her, had long before informed them of her purpose, but strictly enjoining secrecy till her collegiate course should be finished.

Fred often laughs about the time when he came so near shaking me to atoms, and declares it is the greatest wonder in the world he had not done it, for it was a deed which just at that time could have been so easily accomplished.

THE ATHEIST SILENCED.

Some years ago, the Rev. Isaac Guernsey made a trip to Iowa. On board the steamer in which he took passage there was a gentleman who took great pains to make known that he was opposed to Christianity, and all forms of religion.

He spent most of the day in arguing with those who would dispute with him, and in pouring forth anathemas against priestcraft and the cruelty of mankind. He denounced Christ as an impostor, religion as a delusion, any particular form of worship or creed as the result or trammels of education, and that it was only tolerated by statesmen for the security of government and the benefit of the weak and erring. He was evidently a man of education and ability. His repartee, drollery, sarcasm, and a facility for turning things into the ridiculous, bore down so heavily upon those with whom he argued, that they were generally silenced though not convinced.

One day he was in high glee, and kept a crowd of passengers in a continual roar of laughter at his irreverent jokes and witticisms. On this occasion Mr. Townsend, who had hitherto refrained from entering into any dispute or controversy with him, determined to try and silence him or turn the laugh against him. He accordingly moved slowly towards the crowd the skeptic was amusing. On his approaching, the other observed:

"Well, old gentleman, I am a free thinker, what is your notion about religion?"

"Why, sir, I have always been taught to believe in the truth of the Christian religion; and have never once had a doubt of the existence of a supreme and intelligent Cause. But in turn, let me ask you a question. Do you believe in the immortality of the soul?"

"Certainly not—I have none."

"Do you deny the existence of a God?"

"Most assuredly I do."

"Then, sir, I have heard of you before."

"Heard of me before?"

"Yes, sir, I have read about you."

"Read about me? I was not aware that I was published. Pray, where?"

"In the Psalms of David, sir, where it reads, 'The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God.'"

At this unlooked-for turn in the argument, there was one general burst of laughter and hurra, at the expense of the atheist, who, confounded, and being unable to rally at being thus unexpectedly proved a fool, moved away to another part of the boat. During the remainder of the voyage the witacre was silent on religious subjects; but occasionally some of the passengers would tease him by slyly observing, "I have heard of you before."—N. O. Freeman.

THE VICISSITUDES OF FORTUNE.

The vicissitudes of human life are very strange. In 1830 President Taylor, then a colonel in the army, wrote a letter to Gen. McNeil, who had just been appointed surveyor of Boston, from which we make the following extract: "I am fully aware that it is impossible for us to pursue my profession—particularly that of arms—for fifteen or twenty years, without forming a strong attachment to it in various ways, and of course, must abandon them with considerable reluctance; but there are circumstances which should reconcile us to do so, and to justify us, not only in our own eyes, but that of the community. Could I get a civil appointment as respectable, with half the emolument attached to it that there is to the one you have received, and where I could be located so as to superintend the education of my children, I would resign forthwith; for after serving twenty-two years and upwards, in the army, all of this time on duty, with the exception of a few months, without being stationed two years at any one post, during that time, I begin to think that I need repose, but as I do not possess influence to procure a civil appointment of any grade, I consider my doom fixed."—Philadelphia Ledger.

YANKEE SPIRIT.

Hiram Pearson of California, is now travelling in Europe. Recent foreign letters say that, having arrived at Vienna, he applied to the proper authorities for permission to inspect the government buildings. He was refused, on the ground that no one but a member of the European Congress of Science, then in session in Vienna, could be admitted. Thereupon he applied to be received in the Congress as a member, stating that his diploma had been destroyed by the great conflagration in San Francisco. This demand was complied with, and he was treated with the greatest consideration by all the members of the body, except the Archduke Charles, who took exception to his admission, as he had no diploma. Col. Pearson, feeling himself aggrieved at the manner in which the archduke's objections were made, challenged him; whereupon the archduke descended from his dignity, apologized, explained, and all was satisfactorily settled. Col. Pearson was admitted to the chair of Surgery and named a vice president of the Congress.—Cincinnati Emporium.

ONE DOLLAR!

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of fine, original, humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

THE NEW STATE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, AT LANCASTER, MASS.

LANCASTER, MASS.

Lancaster is one of the finest, if not the finest town in the interior of Massachusetts. It is beautifully located on both sides of the Nashua River, one of the most charming and romantic streams in New England, and is about 17 miles north-northeast of Worcester. It embraces three villages—North Village, Lancaster and New Boston. Clintonville, another village, was incorporated as a separate town, under the name of Clinton, several years ago. Lancaster Centre stands upon elevated ground, and is particularly noted for the number and beauty of its elms, whose graceful forms add a delightful feature to the charming landscape. Lancaster contains a bank, a savings' institution, and an academy incorporated in 1847. It has manufactures of gingham, counterpanes, sheetings, combs, machinery, forks, hoots, shoes, etc. It is the oldest town in Worcester county, and the site it occupies was called by the Indians Weshakim or Washoway. The soil of the township is alluvial, and amply repays the careful culture it receives. The water-power for the manufacturing establishments is derived from the confluence of the north and south branches of the Nashua in the centre of the town. There are some excellent farms on what is called George Hill, in the westerly part of Lancaster. Several delightful sheets of water, such as Turner's, Spectacle, Fort and Sandy Ponds, add to the romantic beauty of the scenery. We present on this and the next page a series of illustrative sketches, drawn expressly for us on the spot by Mr. Kilburn, whose accuracy and gracefulness of delineation our readers have often had occasion to admire. The first picture of the set is a correct view of the State Industrial School for girls, a most noble and praiseworthy institution, dedicated on the 27th of August of the present year. We subjoin a condensed description of the buildings, and of the very interesting ceremonies which took place at the dedication. The site selected by the commissioners was one of the most eligible in the town, combining greater advantages than those of lieved to have been judiciously made, not exceeding the estimates, and the work faithfully performed. The public exercises on the occasion took place in the open air, in front of the old mansion house, John H. Wilkins, of Boston, presiding. The hymn by N. P. Willis, beginning,

"The perfect world, by Adam trod,
Was the first temple built by God," slightly altered, was sung as a dedicatory hymn. Reading of Scriptures by Rev. Mr. Doe, prayer by Rev. Mr. Bartol, both of Lancaster. Henry B. Rogers, of Boston, addressed the audience in behalf of the commissioners. In meeting to inaugurate a new institution, he said it was but carrying out the principles and usages of our Pilgrim Fathers, which had become the policy of the State, resulting in the establishment of colleges, hospitals, asylums, churches, and other institutions for the cultivation of literature, arts, science and religion. With an eloquent tribute to the public institutions of the State, which might be pointed to as her jewels, the speaker referred to the more recent attention in Europe and this country to the elevation of the less favored classes, and especially to reform schools, and gave the history of the legislation and the results of the labors of the commissioners on the subject, closing with a transfer of the property into the hands of the trustees. George S. Bontwell, secretary of the Board of Education, responded on behalf of the board of trustees, in a well-written address upon the question of reform of criminals. He deemed it a sad and mischievous delusion in the public mind that the pardoning power was useless, and assuming that the laws governing prisoners followed the laws of society, he contended that such a power had a highly beneficial effect, and that over 90 per cent. of those who had experienced executive clemency had done well. Both of the speakers dwelt upon the plan adopted of relieving the institution as much as possible of the character of a place of punishment, and giving it the moral influence to be derived in constituting each household, as near as possible, a family.

COVERED BRIDGE AT LANCASTER, MASS.

seventy others examined in various parts of the State. It is about a mile south of the railroad station, on the Worcester and Nashua Railroad, known as the Stillwell estate. The original purchase was 100 acres, on which were three houses and five barns, and to which was added ten acres of wood land, the whole cost amounting to $10,705. The estate was laid out before the Revolution by an English gentleman, who provided liberally in the disposal of the grounds, leaving an area of some twenty acres about the mansion covered with fine trees. This house is large, three stories in height, substantially built, and although a hundred years old, was believed to answer very well for the purposes of the institution, with slight alterations. Two other brick buildings have been erected under the direction of the commissioners, at equal distances from the old house. The accommodations in each are the same, comprising a parlor, work-room, school-room for thirty pupils, kitchen, laundry, and bathing-room, on the first floor, with rooms for the matron and assistant, a hospital, wash-room, and sleeping-rooms for thirty girls, in the upper stories, and a room for play in the attic. A majority of the sleeping-rooms are small, for one person only, provided with a small bureau and chair, in addition to a single bed. The rooms are well ventilated, the houses abundantly supplied with water, and in the work room of each is the beginning of a library. The buildings are so located, that should it be necessary, others may be erected upon the grounds to advantage. The water is brought from a spring a mile distant, with a head 108 feet above the lawn. This allows an ornament of a fountain to the grounds. The other houses purchased with the estate, adjoin on either side, and were fitted up at a little expense for the occupation of the superintendent and the farmer. The entire front on the road is 1200 feet, running back to Still River in the rear, nearly the whole estate being in one tract. The original purchase and the new buildings were provided for by an appropriation of $20,000 by the State, conditional upon raising the same amount by subscription. The expenditures are be-

The public exercises were concluded in a few remarks by Governor Gardner, introductory to a proclamation, in accordance with the statute, that the institution was now ready for occupation. The large company of citizens and strangers were then invited to partake of refreshments, abundantly supplied by the ladies of the town. The dinner was followed by sundry sentiments, which were responded to by Governor Gardner, and others. The act establishing the State Industrial School for Girls provides that girls from seven to sixteen years of age, on complaint of offences punishable by fine or imprisonment, leading an idle, vagrant, or vicious life, or found in the street in circumstances of want and suffering, or of neglect, exposure and abandonment, or of beggary, shall be brought before any judge of probate or commissioner under this act, and if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of said judge or commissioner that such girls are suitable subjects for the Industrial School, and that their moral welfare and the good of society require that they shall be sent to the said school, he shall commit them. The design of the institution is expressed in the by-laws, as follows:—"The intention of the State government and of the benevolent individuals who have contributed to the establishment of this institution, is to secure a home and a school for such girls as may be presented to the magistrates of the State, appointed for that purpose, as vagrants, perversely obstinate, deprived of the control and culture of their natural guardians, or guilty of petty offences, and exposed to a life of crime and wretchedness. For such young persons, it is proposed to provide, not a prison for their restraint and correction, but a family school, where, under the firm but kind discipline of a judicious home, they shall be carefully instructed in all the branches of a good education; their moral affections be developed and cultivated by the example and affectionate care of one who shall hold the relation of a mother to them; be instructed in useful and appropriate forms of female industry; and, in short, be fitted to become virtuous and happy members of society, and to take respectable positions in such relations of life as Providence shall hereafter mark out for them. It is to be distinctly understood that the institution is not to be considered a place of punishment, or its subjects as criminals. It is to be an inviting refuge, into which the exposed may be gathered, to be saved from a course which would inevitably end in penal confinement, irretrievable ruin or hopeless degradation. The inmates are to be considered hopeful and promising subjects of appropriate culture, and to be instructed and watched over with the care and kindness which their peculiar exposures demand, and with the confidence which youth should ever inspire." The officers of the institution are Bradford K. Peirce, superintendent and chaplain; A. E. Boynton, farmer; Mrs. C. M. I. Carpenter and Mrs. Mary M. Willard, matrons. The superintendent is to have the general charge of the business and interests of the institution, visit all the departments as often as convenient, and see that the officers are prompt and efficient in the discharge of their duties; have the charge of the public religious services of the schools, and shall secure the daily reading of the Bible and prayers in the different houses, also secure scriptural instruction on the Sabbath, and public devotional exercises and preaching. Over each house a matron is to have the general superintendence, and the whole care of the inmates, under the advice and direction of the trustees, and the counsel and assistance of the superintendent. In cases of persistent obstinacy, requiring more forcible punishment, such cases shall be submitted to the superintendent for advice and action in the premises, but no corporeal punishment shall be inflicted without the approval of one or more of the trustees. The trustees are Laban M. Wheaton, of Norton, chairman; William R. Lawrence, of Boston, secretary; Francis B. Fay, of Chelsea, treasurer; Wilder S. Thurston, of Lancaster, Charles Bunker, of Nantucket, James Deane, of Greenfield, Daniel Denny, of Dorchester. Messrs. Fay, Lawrence and Bunker are the executive committee. Our second picture represents a picturesque bridge over the Nashua River, a very attractive feature to the lover of landscape. We have spoken above of the five elms which characterize the scene, and in the next picture we present a noble specimen in the magnificent tree which shades the street near the old Common. This noble elm has stood for generations, and each year puts forth its garniture of leaves, spreading abroad its graceful branches, and standing a green and unfading landmark in the landscape. Another view, drawn in the centre of the village, delineates the Unitarian Church, one of the most pleasing specimens of architecture in the country. Its elevated position makes it a landmark, and renders it visible at a great distance in almost every direction. It was erected in 1816, and is in a fine state of preservation. On the right is the Town House, and Lancaster Hall, a modern building, erected in 1848. The other building is a schoolhouse. The Lancaster House, which stands immediately back of the church, is almost entirely hidden by the foliage.

LARGE ELM NEAR OLD COMMON, LANCASTER, MASS.

LOVE TOKENS.

The ancient English custom of giving love tokens on the 20th of August was a very wise and far-seeing plan for settling young ladies in life, and would, if revived, enable a mama with a large family of girls to get rid of them as quickly as pine apples at a penny a slice. It was the custom in England, a long time ago, for "enamoured maydes and gentilwomen" to give their favorite swains, as tokens of their love, little handkerchiefs, about three or four inches square, wrought round about, often in embroidery, with a button or tassel at each corner, and a small one in the centre. The finest of these favors were edged with narrow gold lace or twist; and then, being folded up in four cross folds, so that the middle might be seen, they were worn by the accepted lovers in their hats or on the breast. These favors were sold in Queen Elizabeth's time at from sixpence to eighteen pence a-piece.—Albion.

traveller has always to bargain, and offer half what is demanded; and when this is concluded, he enters into possession. At the bar, different kinds of drink (wine, brandy, etc.) and cold meats are sold; next to this are several rooms, the so-called restaurant, in which dinner is served a la carte. If you ask what is to be had, cutlets and beefsteaks are always named (since 1815, these two words have penetrated even into the heart of Asia!), they are, however, commonly of very bad quality, and very ill cooked. On the other hand, if you ask for genuine Russian dishes, the shchi (cabbage soup with meat in it), or the piroz (a kind of pie with fish or meat), you find these palatable and wholesome. The white bread is bad, the black bread good. Good tea may also be procured everywhere in tumblers, generally with a slice of lemon in it, and without milk. The genuine pious Russian drinks it ordinarily with honey, at least on fast days, because the sugar is refined with ox's blood. It is only, I have been told, when the sugar has come from one particular manufactory, where this process is not used, that an orthodox Russian will eat it on fast days. It is a curious sight to see, in the eating houses, the merchants sitting motionless in rows upon the benches ranged along the walls, —genuine bearded Russians, in blue kiltans, never moving, except to put the glass of tea to their mouth, or set it down. Thus they sit in summer days four to six hours at a time, without stirring a limb or speaking a word, swallowing glass after glass.—Tribune.

RUSSIAN HOTELS.

In place of hotels, a system of accommodation has been established in these cities for travellers who remain for months or longer. An agreement is made for board and lodging at a stipulated price; they receive one or two furnished rooms, tea, a good dinner, at the table d'hôte, and tea in the evening; and each pays for lodging, fire, candles, food, drink, and attendance, twenty-five, forty, or fifty silver roubles (£4, £6 8s, or £8) a month. Inns of this kind now exist in all the government towns, some of them kept by Germans, and these for the most part tolerably good. In places, however, where they have been established and are kept by Russians, they still present a mixture of the caravansary and Asiatic eating-house. On arriving and stopping before one of these houses, no one comes to receive you—the landlord you seldom get a sight of. You go into the house, and search for the bar, which is generally in the upper story, and there you find a kind of waiter, whom you ask for lodging. He shows you the rooms, in general badly furnished and without beds, instead of which a leather sofa serves for a place on which you can spread out your own bed. The

THE UNITARIAN CHURCH, TOWN HOUSE AND SCHOOL HOUSE, LANCASTER, MASS

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

DREAM LAND.

BY SARAH A. NOWELL.

All night have my dreams been with thee,
My own true-hearted love!
All night have I been walking
In thy spirit home above.

And even while there, I remembered
The hour when thou didst go
To the foot of the beautiful mountain,
Where eternal flowers blow.

I meet with thee there—but no farther
My steps were permitted to rove,
And I left thee with tears fast streaming,
My own true-hearted love!

I know thou art sometimes thinking
Of one who now wanders here,
And if spirits could weep, O, beloved!
Thou wouldst give me one plying tear.

I am thinking of that glad morning
When I shall be coming to thee—
When thou from thy radiant dwelling
Shalt shine in thy brightness for me.

And shall it be so, love? I weary,
I pine for that morning to come,
When I, with thy child, shall be knocking
At the door of thy blessed home.

When thou shalt look out from the lattice,
And smile with thy own calm smile,
And give me thy own dear welcome,
As thou gavest me oft erewhile.

When thou with two radiant angels,
Who were ours awhile on earth,
Shall meet me at heaven's portal,
To hail my spirit's new birth.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

FIRST AND SECOND LOVE.

BY WILLIAM D. OLIVER.

THERE was not the faintest breeze from sunrise to sunset on that long and terribly hot July day. Scorchingly the sun poured down his rays upon the glistening stones, which gave back heat and light again. Every particle of dust, every atom of white paint, every unblinded window, caught the beams of that great unwinning eye, and made new points of reflection for the blinding light.

By the seashore, the hot sands almost burned the feet that pressed them. The sails hung down idly, and the rowers lay listlessly along their boats, unable to use the oars, so intensely scorching was the heat of the sun upon their rugged frames. In one of these boats lay a figure so perfect in its proportions that one might almost have thought it a statue, while the utter stillness in which it lay would have supported the idea. The eyes were closed, not in sleep, but from exhaustion, and the wet masses of black hair curled closely around a forehead whose white breadth contrasted well with the deeply embrowned cheek.

The boat was near the shore—so near that the loud laugh of a company of bathers, who had assembled on the hot beach, was distinctly heard, and even a few words came over the still waves to the ears of the rowers. The bathing party had retired to their little rude sheds to change dresses, and soon they came out in bathing costume, and ran over the hard, dry beach, which would seem to scorch the bare white feet that left no print on its burning surface. As they rushed into the waves, the sea received their light forms lovingly, as it were, to its cool embrace; and those who could dive, were already where the hot sun had no power over them. Holding each other's hands, five or six girls had formed a ring, and were dancing merrily in the water. Here, a frightened woman was held up by her scarcely braver husband; while a black nurse was dipping two or three little children, who seemed fearless and happy under the operation.

"Wake up, wake up, Tracy, and see the mermaids!" cried one of the companions of the young men in the boat. "Here are plenty of them right upon us. Wake up, idle fellow, and do homage to the sea-goddesses."

Tracy languidly smiled and said:

"No, Bob, I would not get up to see Venus herself rising from the sea. You may lower me down as low as you please, but for heaven's sake, don't ask me to get up such a day as this, or wake up either."

His companion turned impatiently away to watch the bathers again, bidding Tracy to lie there forever, if he liked, and resumed his observation of one lady in particular, whom he had noticed from the beginning of the sport for her graceful movements in the water, her courage in diving, and her daring feats in swimming. He was not near enough to see her face, shaded by the immense straw hat which she wore; but he saw that, unlike all the others, she allowed her long hair to float over her shoulders at will. Bob could see the wet tresses shine in the sun from where he stood, and he thought if the face was as beautiful as the hair, he should like to have one look at it before he ceased his watch of the merry groups in the water.

"What a fool you are, Tracy, to lie there, while the prettiest girl is out here swimming towards you. By heavens, what a dip that was! And now she is floating over the water like a swan."

"A goose, you mean, Bob."

"Silence, blasphemer! Don't take such a lovely creature as this to crack your impious jokes upon. Vent your spite, if you choose, not upon her, but upon those would-be fashionables, who were skimming round you at the Pavilion last evening, or upon that puppy of a brother of theirs—Lord Fitz Pompos, I heard one young lady call him; he overheard her, too, but the silly fellow thought she meant Ashley, and he bowed and simpered at her to show his appreciation of her wit."

"Don't get in a passion this hot day," murmured Tracy. "It is dangerous, believe me. Let your fervid imagination cool itself in the depths of the coral caves beneath us. Think of the cool, wet seaweed floating down there. Faith, I should like to go down there myself, if it were not for the immense fatigue of the leap over the boat."

Loud cries came over the few waves that now separated the bathers from the boat, for the latter had lazily drifted down nearer the shore, and the perfect calmness of the water had tempted the former to strike out further than usual.

"Kate, Kate!" cried out many voices at once—"she is drowning. Save her, save her! See, she sinks! Fergus, do go to Kate!"

The cry roused up even Tracy Hetherstone, and in a moment he leaped into the waves. Bob was already over, and with his usual impetuosity was half way to the sinking object which caught Tracy's eye. Cool and collected, Tracy swam by him; and while Bob was making desperate, almost superhuman efforts to reach her, she was already in Tracy's arms, her long tresses hanging over his shoulder, and her pale face turned upward to the light.

The fair bathers had made for the shore as soon as they saw that she was rescued, and now stood on the beach to receive her. Bob bent his course thither also, supposing that Tracy would bring his charge to her friends at once. They were disappointed, however, for he shaped his course towards the boat, which was much nearer, and already Tracy was borne down with the lifeless weight of the girl. He had calmly calculated what was best, and showed wisdom by his decision.

He knew that the boat contained several articles of a restorative nature, as well as a large woollen shawl of his own; and what was still better, two strong and dry fishermen, who would probably know a great deal more how to bring a drowned person to life, than the wet, frightened men and women who stood gasping in their limp and dripping clothes on the beach. So he soon had the pleasure of giving the lady into the arms of Ben—a stout fellow some six feet high—while he was somewhat roughly hauled into the boat by Ben's brother.

A ghastly pair they were; for the color had all faded from Tracy's cheeks from looking on the pale lady he had carried in his arms; and by the time the two drenched figures were lying in the bottom of the boat, he needed the care of the men as much as the other. A draught from the brandy flask restored Tracy enough to sit up and direct the men to wrap the lady in his shawl, and to force some of the liquid into her purple lips.

The rough fishermen held her as tenderly as a mother would a baby; and they soon had the satisfaction of seeing her open her eyes, and draw a faint breath. She lay in the man's arms, encircled by the coarse sleeve of his jacket, and scarcely betrayed a sign of wonder at her situation, even when she recovered and looked around her. She gave almost a comic glance at the figure of Tracy, as he lay drying himself in the hot sun, and seemed to take in the meaning of the whole scene at once.

"I remember now," she said, giving him a smile that well rewarded his exertions in her behalf. "I have been drowned, and you fished me up. I don't know as it was worth the trouble, after all."

Tracy murmured some indistinct words, which scarcely reached the lady's ear. He was amazed at her rapid restoration, forgetting that the dwellers by the seashore take little note of anything short of absolute drowning. Her perfect ease of manner soon wrought its work upon Tracy, and he recovered his spirits and assurance wonderfully before the boat landed. A carriage was waiting to convey the lady to her home, into which she insisted upon his also entering; but as they were so near the Pavilion, he preferred to walk across the beach to the back entrance.

"May I wait on you this evening?" he said, as he parted from her, after wrapping her closely in the shawl.

"Certainly. My father will be happy to see you at 57 Marion Street, and thank you for the service you have rendered me."

Another smile brought the eloquent blood to Tracy's cheek, as he bowed low to her when the carriage drove off. The group of ladies had gathered round to see that Kate was well cared for. In the first moment of seeing Tracy gain the boat, they had hurried back to their bathing-rooms, and prepared to welcome her when she landed.

At the Pavilion stairs he encountered Bob coming down just dressed. He accompanied him back to his chamber, rung for a warm bath for Tracy, and performed several acts of attention and kindness; yet Tracy could see that Bob was mortified and irritated. He soothed him by earnestly entreating him to call with him in the evening to see Miss—"Bless me," said Tracy, "what is her name? I declare I don't know who to inquire for."

"The girls called her Kate," said Bob, "and that is the name. You will have to ask for her in that way, Tracy. Imagine us stepping up to No. 57, and asking if Kate is at home!"

Tracy did not quite relish Bob's rallying, especially as he did not believe that they should find a name on the door, few houses in that vicinity bearing the owner's name.

The hot afternoon dragged wearily on to the two young men. Tracy idled with a book on the bed, and Bob consumed a great many cigars. At last the early tea hour came, and they prepared for the call. No. 57 Marion Street was a tall, brick house of handsome appearance, shaded on the front by four large chestnuts.

A large yard at the side was filled with beautiful flowers, while a garden beyond showed a fine collection of rare fruit trees and splendid grape vines. Tracy was relieved when he saw a silver plate on the door, on which was engraved "Arthur Blanchard." He rang, and a gentleman came to the door, who proved to be Mr. Blanchard himself. He waited on the young men into a handsome parlor, where sat two ladies. One was an elegant woman, who was no other than Mrs. Blanchard. The other, in a plain white dress, was Kate. Half an hour's chatting made the parties quite intimate, and the incident of the morning was food for conversation. Mr. Blanchard was warm in his thanks.

"I must transfer at least half of them to my friend, Mr. Hetherstone," said Tracy. "He was even more prompt than myself, but from some cause, for which I cannot account, he made less headway than myself."

"Thank you, Mr. Cleveland," said Bob Hetherstone. "But really, you must allow me to renounce all share in the exploit. Miss Blanchard must take the will for the deed this time; although I should have been most happy to have been the favored one who saved her."

Tracy then amused them with the morning sail and Bob's anxiety that he should see the ladies. A pleasant evening was quickly passed away, and they parted, mutually pleased with the new acquaintances which each had formed.

Had Kate Blanchard known how her image mingled with the sight of the waves in the dreams of Tracy Cleveland that night, she might have felt somewhat flattered; and perhaps to her most intimate friend she would not have owned all she thought of the brave, sailor-like young man who saved her life. Bob had no chance at all with Kate. She only thought of him as the friend of Mr. Cleveland, and treated him very civilly on that account.

Week after week passed away at the Pavilion. Cool, bracing mornings and evenings, that almost required a fire in the rooms, succeeded to the sultry days of August, and the last loiterer at the watering-place had packed up and departed; all but the two young men. They still lingered, each day finding some excuse for staying on. Each one concealed, or attempted to conceal, the true reason from the other; but each knew the other's meaning, and tried to feel or appear indifferent. A morning's shooting on the beach, a drive through the woods—anything that would employ the early part of the day, was reason sufficient to induce them to remain; but the latter part was invariably spent at Mr. Blanchard's.

Mr. Blanchard did his part, too, in amusing and interesting them. His carriage, his guns, his dog, were all at their disposal; and from Kate and her mother their reception was always kind. If Kate's cheek flushed brighter when Tracy pressed her hand, when parting for the night—and if she only smiled and did not color when parting from Mr. Hetherstone, it was not the fault of either. Her heart was reflected in her pure, pale face—that face which had ever mirrored her thoughts, as the lake mirrors the sky.

"We will go to the woods to-morrow and spend the whole day," said Mr. Blanchard, one fine evening. "Kate must pack our baskets, and we will drive out early, so as to avoid the heat of the day, and return by moonlight."

The plan was pronounced charming, and they separated for the night.

Morning came, and the party breakfasted together at five o'clock, and at six they were riding through the woods. There were cool mornings and evenings then, but the middle of the day was warm and bright, almost hot. They sat down to dinner at twelve, Kate having produced from the baskets an abundance of nice cookery, most of which had been done by her own hands. Meats and pastry, fruits and ale, never tasted so deliciously as under the shade of those magnificent oaks, where the birds were pouring wild music over their heads, and tiny squirrels were flying up and down the trunks of the old trees.

Mrs. Blanchard sat on a turf seat, which Tracy had made for her, and she looked like a queen. Her husband reclined near her on a low rock, while Kate and the others were on the grass at their feet. A portable seat from the carriage served as a table, when covered with a snowy cloth and tastefully arranged. As twilight approached, they prepared to leave this scene of enchanting beauty, each wishing that they could always enjoy this wild kind of gipsy life. The mellow autumn moon was shining brightly over the sea as they returned. They lingered awhile at the point where the waves were showing whitest and highest, under her light, and talked over another excursion for the morrow.

Tracy Cleveland!—this day had done its work for him. By the light of that sweet moon shining down through the dancing leaves of the chestnut trees, and making beautiful tracery on Kate's white dress, he told her his heart history.

It was a long story, but she heard him patiently to the end. He told her of a boyish love which he once had for Margaret Allston—a beautiful girl as far as regarded mere personal attractions, but proud, haughty and capricious. Older than himself, and far more skilled in artifice, she had almost compelled him to love her; for her strong will subdued all things around her. He described to her how that, having borne her yoke for years, he had suffered martyrdom in attempting to free himself from her; that when she found herself scorned, as she said, although he was so patient and gentle when he broke from her, she had vowed, if he should ever choose a wife, she would persecute her to the death—and that for him she would reserve her sharpest, most exquisite cruelties, striking them deepest where and when he least might expect them.

Tracy drew a long breath of relief when he got over this point of his history. Then he told her how dearly he had loved her while she lay in his arms on that day when he had saved her; and how every day since had but found his love deeper and holier. He touched upon his poverty—upon the almost utter ruin which

WYZEMAN MARSHALL, ESQ.

AMERICAN TRAGEDIAN.

The accompanying portrait of Wyze-man Marshall, one of our most eminent and popular American actors, was drawn for us by Mr. Barry, after a fine photograph by Messrs. Masmy, Silsbee & Case, of this city. Mr. Marshall has recently closed a successful engagement at Willard's National, in this city; and the fresh memories he has left render the publication of this authentic likeness timely and acceptable. The subject of our sketch was born in Hudson, New Hampshire, September 26, 1816, but was brought to this city by his parents when an infant, and grew up in our midst. It was at our schools he received some preliminary training, but his education was completed and accomplished by his own unaided efforts. Good books, and a determination to inform himself thoroughly in all the branches of an English education, "supplied the want of school and college." It was in February, 1836, that, after pursuing a variety of occupations, his theatrical proclivities induced him to appear on the boards of the Lion Theatre, then under the management of the late Wm. Barrymore, Esq., in the inconsiderable character of Vithulans, in Sheridan Knowles's tragedy, "Virginia." During the remainder of the season, Mr. Marshall was attached to the company, playing small business, but studying his profession diligently, and looking forward to an opportunity of rising. During the ensuing summer, as a member of a company which performed at Providence and Newport, he appeared in such characters as Pizarro, Aogertroff, Buckingham, etc. In the theatrical season of 1836-7, he played at the National, appearing in a variety of parts. On the 27th of February, 1838, he received his first benefit, and acted Pizarro (Mrs. Pelby, Elvira; Mrs. Anderson, Cora) in the ballet of "L'Amour." In the summer of 1838, a part of the corps went to Waltham, Mass. Mr. Marshall re-engaged at the National for the season of 1838-9, receiving two benefits, on the second of which (June 29, 1839) he played "Damon." He wished to introduce Miss Eaton to a Boston audience as Calanthe. Pelby objected, thought she had no talent, etc., and it was only with great difficulty an appearance could be secured for her. The manager opened his eyes afterwards, when, as Mrs. Woodward, this lady became one of Boston's favorites, a popularity which California at present unequivocally endorses. On the occasion referred to, Mr. Ois Marshall, brother of our subject, made his first appearance on any stage as Dionysius; J. Hudson Kirby was the Pythias, and Leman the Philistius. Mr. Marshall organized during the summer a small olio company, with which he did a good business in the country, and returned to the National. February 21, 1840, he played "Virginia" for his benefit, with Henry Wallack as Dentatus; and in the summer of that year opened Boylston Hall, under the title of the "Vandeville Saloon," where he had a successful campaign of two months. He went back in the fall to the old homestead, the National, where the parts assigned him gradually increased in importance. He introduced James H. Stark, the well-known actor, to the stage, June 17, 1841, as Walter Barnard, in the "Wreck Ashore." That summer, Mr. Marshall again provincialized with a small troupe, and returned, to be promoted to a very singular combination of lines of business—first heavy business and ballet master! During the run of "London Assurance," Mr. Marshall went to Providence for a short time, and in 1842, he ceased his connection with the National. He took the Amphitheatre, corner of Haverhill and Traverse Streets, and opened it June 27, 1842, as the Eagle

WYZEMAN MARSHALL, TRAGEDIAN.

Theatre. Here Mr. Marshall had a fine company, and the casts of some pieces were admirable. We will instance one of "Hamlet," during a star engagement of the lamented Booth. Hamlet, Booth; Ghost, Marshall; Gravedigger, W. H. Smith; Laertes, McCutcheon; King, Booth, Jr.; Queen, Mrs. H. Lewis; Ophelia, Mrs. Booth, Jr. This theatre Mr. Marshall carried on till the spring of 1843, in connection with the Providence Theatre. He brought Pelby down in his prices at the National, and Mr. Pelby cut away the roof of the Eagle one fine evening. Mr. Marshall's business had been had just before, and this untoward circumstance not only put a stop to his managerial operations, but left him without a dollar. Mr. Marshall went to New York, and played a short engagement at the Chatham, then managed by C. R. Thorne, and returned to Boston, but did not act till the fall of 1844, when he supported Macready at the time when the Melodeon was fitted up for his performances. Mr. Marshall then went down East, and starred it. In May, 1845, Mr. Marshall accepted an engagement at the Chatham Theatre, New York, under the management of DeBar, and became a great favorite. In the spring of 1846, he again visited the East, but returned to the Chatham Theatre in the succeeding autumn. After a brief engagement at Welch's National Theatre, Philadelphia, he returned to New York, and closed his engagement at the Chatham, June 17, 1847. This was in consequence of having received a liberal offer from Mr. Hamblin, manager of the Bowery Theatre. He opened as Virginius to Miss Charlotte Crampton's Virginia to a tremendous house, and was received with great enthusiasm. During the vacation he played at Utica, Syracuse and Albany, returning to the Bowery at the opening of the next season. Here he played, in the course of the season, many leading parts to the entire acceptance of the audience. In 1848, he appeared at the Boston Theatre, Federal Street, with complete success. The Evening Gazette says:—"There the improvement and refinement of style brought about during his absence from Boston by intense study and close application to his profession, were most favorably noted. Eschewing the traditions of melodrama, his Shakspearian delineations won praise from the critical. They proved what could be done by a self-educated man, all whose energies, whose sole ambition, were centred in his profession." At the close of his stay here, Mr. Marshall starred in the provinces, played a few nights at the Beach Street Museum, and then went to the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia, opening as Macbeth. His engagement was so successful that Burton engaged him as acting and stage manager. Here his Matthew Elmore (Margaret, Julia Dean; Hermine, Mrs. C. Howard) and his Master Walter (Julia, Mrs. Farrea; Helen, Mrs. Booth, Jr.) were highly praised. Thence Mr. Marshall went to Baltimore, where he played a star engagement, followed by one with Forbes at Providence, and then returned to his managerial position, where he remained till the opening of 1850, when an engagement at the Baltimore Museum, where he played Tell, in compliment to the Hungarian refugees, who visited this theatre, was followed by one at Washington, which was extraordinarily successful. After fulfilling engagements at Baltimore, Albany and New York, he became manager of the Portland Theatre for a short season, thence he went South, and, in 1851-2, managed the Howard Athenæum, in this city, where he first introduced to a Boston public, Madame Anna Thillon, Laura Addison, Mrs. Warner and Lola Montes. His subsequent career is well known; he has played various star engagements, and everywhere with success. He has also been successful as a Shakspearian reader. Mr. Marshall is much esteemed in private life. He is a good husband and father, a warm friend and an exemplary citizen. We are happy to know that his professional exertions have yielded him a fortune. When not professionally engaged, Mr. Marshall resides in this city.

RUSSIAN BOATMEN ON THE NEVA.

The spirited engraving on this page presents, in admirable grouping, a party of the Russian boatmen who ply on the Neva. Their cumbrous boat is propelled by a man in the bow, while a comrade in the stern manages the heavy tiller. Three others are supping their porridge from a tub placed on a thwart midship. Their faces exhibit the true Russian type. These fellows are good-natured and industrious, but no more cleanly or scrupulously honest than their countrymen on shore. It is fortunate for the subjects of a despotic emperor, that the hardships of life, however heavy, rest lightly on their shoulders. In the distance, the profile of a portion of St. Petersburg is seen against the horizon. The recent war in the East, and the coronation of Emperor Alexander II., have contributed to awaken new interest in Russia.

RUSSIAN BOATMEN ON THE RIVER NEVA.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

A street, two hundred and twenty feet broad, is to be laid out on the Back Bay lands, Boston. — Lizzie Howard, a native of Roxbury, Mass., committed suicide in New York, on account of the dejection of one whom she had "loved not wisely but too well." At the grave, a sister in grief read Hood's touching poem, "The Bridge of Sighs," amid the tears and sobs of all present. — Rev. Mr. Spurgeon, the "sensational preacher" of London, is coming to this country. — A flour laden vessel recently sailed from Charleston, S. C., for Barcelona, being the first shipment of breadstuffs from Charleston to Spain; though but one of many cargoes recently shipped from the United States to that country and Portugal—the harvest there being deficient this season. Both Spain and Portugal have heretofore been large exporters of grain. — It is a noteworthy circumstance that fully two-thirds of the cheap books published in London during the last three years, are reprints of American works. — Water has been discovered at Tumerna, near Bathno, in Africa, on the edge of the Southern Desert, after boring to a depth of about two hundred feet. This was the first well bored on the European plan; and as the place had already suffered dreadfully from drought, the natives, it is said, manifested "frantic joy" on seeing the waters burst forth. — Good honey is raised in California. In some places, however, the bees feed upon the blossoms of the mustard plant, and thereby impart a spicy flavor to the article. — Prince Lucien is about to commence, on his return to Paris, the publication of the gospel of St. Matthew in all the Basque dialects, and after that a map of the countries in which the Basque language is still spoken. The Prince every day assembles at his table at St. Jean de Luz, representatives of the numerous dialects of that language in Spain and in France. — The lumber trade between Puget Sound and Honolulu is becoming important. Seven vessels, of 2000 tons capacity, are employed in the trade. — Owing to the failure of the apple crop in Europe, there is a large demand at New York for apples for exportation, and at least 10,000 barrels of Newton pippins, embracing the best of the crop, will be sent this fall. One firm already has contracts for England to the amount of 6000 barrels. This variety of apples has the preference above all others, though Baldwins and Russets are exported to some extent. — A horse which met Rice's circus elephant in the road near Frederick, Md., fell in the shafts and expired of fright. — In the Islands of the Pacific Ocean, there are, in connection with the London Church Wesleyan and American Missionary Societies, 119 missionaries, 45,929 communicants, 239,900 professed Protestants, and 54,709 scholars. — Edwin Forrest has recently sold Fonthill for one hundred thousand dollars. — Whiskers and cold weather seem to be coming on together. As the cold strengthens, the hair lengthens. It is a sort of natural greatcoat for man's frontispiece—and don't look bad, either. — The population of California is decreasing. — An agent of the American Bible Society, in Turkey, says that, in a recent tour in the Levant, he everywhere found an increased interest in the Bible and the Christian religion among the Moslems, who are becoming indifferent and skeptical with regard to their faith. — The weather-wise are predicting an open winter. — In London, the size of a drink of ale is established by law. Recently a pot-house keeper was prosecuted and fined for selling the beverage in measures holding less than a pint. — The Kingston (C. W.) News tells of a singular death which occurred in Belleville on Friday. A little girl, aged ten, daughter of a widow Brennan, while in a graveyard, was killed by a gravestone falling over upon her.

A GREAT CURIOSITY.

The United States frigate Macedonian recently brought from Java to this country a specimen of the mouse deer, one of the most curious and interesting little creatures in the world. When full grown they are about the size of the ordinary rabbit of our forest, and shaped like the American deer. The limbs are very delicate, and the hoof, which is cloven, is almost transparent. In color they are a reddish brown, with a white breast and stomach. From the nose, extending back to the ear, is a tan-colored stripe on each side, and the lower jaw a white stripe, forming a trident. They feed like cattle, and chew a cud like that species of the animal creation. They are easily domesticated. The eye is large and projecting, but the ears are short and oblong. They are said to be very swift, and their appearance would indicate it, as they are formed precisely like the red deer of this country.

LIBERALITY.—A year ago, says the Independent, four churches in New York and Brooklyn, the "Pilgrim," "Plymouth," "Puritans" and "Tabernacle," agreed each to raise $2000 toward the liquidation of the debt of the New England church in Brooklyn, provided that church itself should raise $8000 for the purpose. The whole work is now accomplished, so that a debt of $15,000 has been cancelled, and a property worth upwards of $40,000 is made entirely secure and safe in the hands of the New England church and society.

VOLCANO.—The lava from the volcano of Manna Loa, Sandwich Islands, has already desolated about two hundred thousand acres, which will remain forever barren. Volcanoes decidedly do not pay.

WORTH KNOWING.—It is said that a small piece of rosin dipped in hot water, will add a peculiar property to the atmosphere of the room, which will give relief to persons troubled with a cough.

LETTERS.—In Hobart Town, Australia, there is a bookstore containing 14,000 copies of valuable works. This fact speaks volumes.

Wayside Gatherings.

A young lady by the name of Humphrey was fined $5 in Albany, lately, for spitting in another lady's face.

A number of San Francisco gentlemen are forming a cricket club on the plan of the Newark, N. J., club.

A wildcat of the largest size was lately killed in Calaveras, Cal., by a Walla chief, with bow and arrow. He was sold to a Chinaman for $2.50, for the purpose of a stew.

The Friend of India estimates the number of converts to Christianity at probably one hundred thousand in India, and twenty thousand more in Ceylon.

New York has become the largest German city in the world, except Vienna, Berlin and Hamburg, and Germans exist in as full force on the Hudson as on the Rhine.

The Chicago Democrat learns that a gentleman from Scotland, a banker there, has brought on half a million of dollars to Chicago for investment in railroad and other stocks.

A man named Church visited Staunton, Va., with a load of corn from Pendleton. He is 82 years old; and his mother, aged 107, and his father, aged 112 years, are both living.

The Chicago papers state that another vessel is about being fitted out at that port for Europe. The owner proposes to freight his craft with corn, and is going out as supercargo.

An exchange says down in New Orleans it requires three persons to start a business firm—one to die with yellow fever, one to get killed in a duel, and the third to wind up the business.

Vivier, the celebrated French musician, is engaged to come to the United States, but is so frightened at our numerous railroad accidents that he demands a life insurance for fifty thousand dollars.

A curious phenomenon has recently been observed in Greece. The lake Copais has completely dried up, and an immense tract of fertile land is thus rendered available for the purposes of agriculture.

The catalogue of Williams College for 1856-7, just published, shows a total of 224 students—seniors, 55; juniors, 58; sophomores, 60; freshmen 51. New York furnishes 88, and Massachusetts 60 of the whole number.

It is stated that the French government has shipped to the United States 20,000 barrels of prime mess pork, purchased in Cincinnati, Ohio, during the Crimean war. Being no longer wanted, it is sent back for a market.

The heroic Sir Charles Napier wrote very beautifully and touchingly to a lady on the eve of his great victory at Alcinca—"If I survive I shall soon be with those I love; if I fall I shall be with those I have loved."

An exchange says that metallic life preservers made of thin sheet copper, are the safest and best. It would be very easy to make every seat, table and mattress used on board a steamboat a life preserver, and steamboat proprietors should be compelled to do this.

The venerable Judge Samuel Hoar died at his residence in Concord, Mass., lately, after a short illness. The long, active and useful life of Judge Hoar made him one of the most respected and valued of our citizens, and his death will be regretted by thousands.

While we were correcting proofs last evening, we heard repeated rappings on our window, "as of some one gently tapping." On looking round, we found a little sparrow sitting on the sill and looking at the gas-light. But as we didn't raise the window, he turned away—perhaps he would if we had.—Portland Advertiser.

Among the recent arrivals of emigrants at New York, were several French political refugees. There were also thirty-six soldiers of the British Foreign Legion, who served in the Crimea. They came in uniform, and laded with their knapsacks on their backs. They are on their way to the bounty lands in Canada granted to them by the British government.

The Chinese made porcelain as early as 185 years before Christ. The porcelain paste used by the Chinese is a mixture of kaolin, which is infusible in the furnace, being merely baked. The glazing of the famous Sevres porcelain of France is more difficult to fuse than Chinese glazing.

The Royal Gazette, of Greytown, Demerara, publishes an account of the seizure of a large Camondie, a species of bon constrictor. He had seized a fine sheep, and coiling around its body, crushed the bones of the animal and killed it. A laborer, who was near, ran up to the monster and destroyed it with his cutlass. When uncoiled, it was found to measure twenty-five feet in length.

New apples, of extraordinary excellence, have been discovered in the Crimea, which will no doubt find their way to Europe and America. Pallas speaks of one called Linap Alma, which keeps until July, and only acquires its excellence before the new year. Wagon loads are annually sent to Moscow, and even St. Petersburg. There is also an autumn apple, thought to be far the best ever tasted in any country.

Horse racing is fast becoming a respectable "institution," and there is now scarcely a county in New York which cannot boast of its race track, where people can witness the sports of the turf without compromising their standing in the church or community. Of course no racing is allowed on these tracks. By a very dexterous construction, as the lawyers would say, that "sin" is avoided. The horses go around singly, and the "committee"—not the "judges," mind ye—time 'em just to see which can go the fastest.

Prof. Loomis, in the preface to his recent work on Astronomy, states that "it is but twenty-five years since the first telescope, exceeding those of a portable size, was imported into the United States. Now we have one telescope which acknowledges no superior, and several which would be worthy of a place in the finest observatories in Europe." The manufacture of astronomical instruments in this country, is said to be carried to a high state of perfection.

A package of old love-letters recently brought a man $20,000, in Bristol, England. His first flame married another man, and he himself also married, but retained the letters of his first love, against an occasional remembrance of his wife. After some years the writer of the letters died a widow, leaving her old lover $20,000, and her letters to him were essential to prove his identity. The wife is now glad she was not allowed to burn the evidence of her husband's affection for another.

Among the literary treasures in Durham Cathedral, England, is a book with a cover executed in needlework by Lady Arabella Stuart, niece of Mary Queen of Scots, and grand-daughter of Henry the Seventh, who died a lunatic in the Tower. She was a well educated woman, and worked the cover to show her respect for Greek and Hebrew learning. Her handiwork is now a little tattered, and one day, a lady visitor to the cathedral, being admitted to the library, with a woman's kindness and love of neatness, offered to "mend the cover," an offer which, of course, was declined.

Foreign Items.

Presents from the King of Siam to Queen Victoria are on their way. Amongst them is an elephant of remarkable color, which will probably cause some little excitement in England on its arrival.

There are over a thousand prisons in Germany, great and small, who receive annually from the people over two hundred millions of dollars; while a laborer works eighteen hours out of twenty-four for seventy-cents per week.

A sensible testimonial to Handel is proposed in Germany, to be ready against the anniversary of 1759. The testimonial is to be an edition of the entire works of the master, so cheap as to be within reach of the poorest musical student.

Slips of earth into the principal crater of Vesuvius have been taking place for some time past. It is feared that the entire summit of the mountain will disappear in the open chasm. Violent and continual reports have of late proceeded from the volcano.

A Hamburg correspondent of a London paper writes, that although the rent paid by the British ambassador for his hotel during the coronation at Moscow is thirty thousand dollars a month, the house did not contain an apartment large enough for a ball-room.

A little girl, of Bristol, was missed by its parents, and was supposed to have been drowned. An alarm was given, the river was drugged, and, the body not being found, the friends of the disconsolate mother commenced to console her. The child all this time was standing among the watching crowd.

Two galley slaves at Genoa conceived a mortal hatred for another convict, who had been rewarded for good behavior. They armed themselves with two sharpened nails, with which they stabbed him to the heart. One of the murderers was immediately arrested; the other had to be killed, he fought so desperately.

A statue of Froissart has been inaugurated with much ceremony at Valenciennes, the native place of the chronicler. It is by M. Lemaire, of the Institute, the sculptor of the pediment of the Madeleine at Paris, and other great works. The likeness of the historian is taken from a miniature painted in one of his "Chroniques." A cantata was executed and song, and speeches in honor of Froissart were delivered on the occasion.

Sands of Gold.

.... The desire of appearing clever often prevents our becoming so.—La Rochefoucauld.

.... Who lives to nature, rarely can be poor; who lives to fancy, never can be rich.—Young.

.... Call him wise whose actions, words, and steps are all a clear because to a clear why.—Lavater.

.... As the pearl ripens in the obscurity of its shell, so ripens in the tomb all the fame that is truly precious.—Landor.

.... Music is the most delightful, rational entertainment that the human mind can possibly enjoy.—Schubert Smith.

.... True glory strikes root, and even extends itself; all false pretensions fall as do flowers, nor can anything feigned be lasting.—Cicero.

.... Two things are necessary to a modern martyr,—come to pity, and some to persecute; some to regret, and some to roast him.—Colton.

.... Pleasure is a necessary reciprocal; no one feels, who does not at the same time give it. To be pleased, one must please. What pleases you in others, will in general please them in you.—Chesterfield.

.... There is a truth, accommodated to our nature, which poetry best conveys. There is a truth for the reason; there is a truth for the passions; there is a truth for every character of man.—Landor.

.... Whatsoever is not detrimental to society, and is of positive enjoyment, is of God, the giver of all good things, and ought to be received and enjoyed by his creatures with thankful delight.—Robert Burns.

.... Pride is as loud a beggar as want, and a great deal more saucy. When you have bought one fine thing you want ten more, that your appearance may be all of a piece; but it is easier to suppress the first desire, than to satisfy all that follow it.—Franklin.

.... The day-laborer, who earns with horny hand and the sweat of his brow, coarse food for a wife and children whom he loves, is raised, by this generous motive, to true dignity; and though wanting the refinements of life, is a nobler being than those who think themselves absolved by wealth from serving others.—Channing.

Joker's Budget.

When you see a small waist, think how great a waste of health it represents.

Punch says it requires an early start, now-a-days, for a man to get round his wife.

The boy that undertook to suck an egg plant and was choked by the yolk, has recovered.

Good taste generally prevails in the naming of English yachts. We can't, however, include Lt. Col. Mountjoy Martin's Emile.

The Mohammedans believe that their first parents forfeited paradise by eating wheat, which deprived them of their primeval purity.

A negro once gave the following toast: "De gobernor ob de State—he come in wid very little opposition—he got out wid none at all."

"You have only yourself to please," said a married friend to an old bachelor. "True," replied he, "but you cannot tell what a difficult task I find it."

A person pretending to have seen a ghost, was asked what the apparition said to him. "How should I know?" he replied; "I am not skilled in the dead languages!"

A young lady in the millinery line, having been deserted by her lover, exclaimed, "Such a menial ought to be battered to death with thimbles, and buried in a handbox!"

An Irish gentleman hearing of a friend having a stone coffin made for himself, exclaimed: "By me sowl, an' that's a good idee! Shure, an' a stone coffin 'ud last a man his life time!"

A lady in Oregon, in writing to a friend in this city, says that cattle in that region live to such a great age, their owners have to fasten long poles to the end of their horns, for the wrinkles to run out on!

A Rhode Island clergyman recently illustrated his argument in favor of corporal punishment for children by a pleasant piece of witicism. He said that "the child when once started in a course of evil conduct, was like a locomotive on the wrong track—it takes the switch to get it off."

AN ITALIAN WINE CARRIER.

THE ROMAN WINE-CARRIER.

The fine engraving on this page depicts one of those Roman wine-carriers, of whom travellers in Italy have so often spoken. He is walking beside his horse, smoking his pipe, and presents a fine type of the Italian peasant. His costume, careless and picturesque, is worn with that artistic air which distinguishes even the humblest inhabitant of the land of art. On his handsome and manly face, however, there is a shade of sadness, which is not uncommon to the expression of the Italian faces in repose—no had indices of those fervent hearts that “now melt into sorrow, now madden to crime.” Poor Italy! well may a cloud rest upon the brow of her children! Well may the Roman girl sing:

“O, Rome, Rome, thou art no more
What thou hast been,
When on thy seven hills of yore
Thou sat’st a queen.”

Vainly does the softest of skies bend over Italia—vainly does the bluest of waters lave her curving shores. Every hill, every valley, every promontory is marked by the ruins of departed greatness. Once the mistress of the world—now no longer mistress of herself.

In her fairest cities the gleam of foreign bayonets is seen, and the roll of foreign drums is heard. Austrian and French uniforms mingle in the Eternal City. The heart of the nation is crushed out. Now and then, at long intervals, there is a spasmodic movement among her people, giving rise to wild hopes of Italian liberty; but the cordon of absolutism is drawn too closely around her to afford room for hope. At one time, and in the star of Napoleon the Great, it seemed as if a bright future was in store for her; but the great emperor died without accomplishing his plans for the regeneration of united Italy.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. } VOL. XI., No. 24.—WHOLE No. 284.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

METROPOLITAN HORSE RAILROAD.

The fine engraving below is from a drawing made expressly for us by Mr. Champney. It represents the cars of the Metropolitan Railroad at the Boston terminus in Tremont Street, and embraces an accurate view of the Tremont House and the gateway of the Granary Burying Ground. The comfort, convenience and economy of horse railroads, benefiting all classes of the community, are now almost universally recognized. By another year there will be six of these lines for the purpose of accommodating the travel to and from Charlestown, Dorchester and Cambridge, and in the direction of Brookline and Brighton. The Metropolitan Railroad Company was the first chartered. This road commences at the Tremont House, and extends by a double track through Tremont Street, passing on the side of the street next to the Granary Burying Ground and the Common, to the intersection of Tremont with Boylston at the Winthrop House; thence by a single track through Tremont and Dover to Washington Street, also by another single track, from the same intersection, through Boylston and Washington to the junction at Dover Street. From this point the line runs by a double track to the Norfolk House in Roxbury. In connection with the main line, the company have a branch to the Dorchester line, near Cottage Street, in that town, by way of Eustis Street and Mount Pleasant, Roxbury. Branches will probably be added through Warren Street, Oak Street, Roxbury, and from the Norfolk House, via Centre Street, to the line of West Roxbury at Hog Bridge, the last named branch being intended to meet the Jamaica Plains road. In Boston, the Metropolitan Company have a location over the Tremont Avenue, past the Boston and Providence Railroad, crossing through Lowell Street to its junction with Centre Street, Roxbury, at Hog Bridge. This branch will be constructed in the spring. The route of the cars from the Tremont House is through Boylston, Tremont and Washington Street, over the Neck to Roxbury, returning through Dover and Tremont Street. The station-house and offices of the company are in the Metropolitan Hotel, formerly the Montgomery House, and lately occupied by our own establishment. The offices are fitted up very liberally, and embrace a complete suite of apartments for the ladies, provided with all the modern conveniences. The equipment of the company will consist of 500 horses, from 40 to 50 cars, including open and top seated cars, 50 omnibuses and 80 close and open sleighs. The cars for Roxbury are all painted a straw color, and will show a green light at both ends. Those for the Dorchester line, via Eustis Street and Mount Pleasant, are painted blue, edged with gold. The Neck cars are painted red, and will show red lights. The Neck cars will run from the Roxbury line only; the Roxbury cars to all points will run through Roxbury Street. Appropriate light-boards on the top of each of these lines will indicate their precise destination respectively. A part of these cars will show lights from the dome ventilators on the top. The cars will seat comfortably 24 passengers, and it is the intention of the company to provide enough for all to have a seat. A car will run from each main terminus every two minutes. At present the cars run from daylight to midnight, but will soon run three or four times an hour from midnight till morning.

THE METROPOLITAN HORSE RAILROAD, TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MABEL, THE RECTOR'S WARD:

—OR—

TRUTH AND TREASON IN 1777.

BY MAJOR BEN: PERLEY POORE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XV.*WEALTH AND HONOR.

"The miser lives alone, abhorred by all,
Like a disease, that cannot so be scaped,
But, canker-like, eats through the poor men's hearts
That live about him—never has commerce
With any, but to ruin them."

"It will never do to go up stairs in this plight," muttered Holbrook, as he rose and endeavored with his handkerchief to staunch the blood that was flowing profusely from a cut made in his forehead by the sharp corner of the lower stair, against which he had fallen. "Luckily 'tis only skin deep, and I will go down to Job Carr's, where I can wash off the blood."

So he left the palace, and was soon threading the lanes of the lower town, with his hat over his eyes, and his cloak drawn up about his blood-stained face. The tell tale scar was livid with rage, and the more he thought of the boldness with which the Indian girl had punished his rudeness, the more savagely did revenge gnaw at his heart. Meanwhile he arrived in that part of the city frequented by the lowest and most abandoned of both sexes, and stopped before an antiquated house, over the door of which was a sign, bearing the time-faded inscription: "Job Carr, Dealer in Marine Stores."

The door was fastened, and such a dull, heavy echo followed Holbrook's vigorous knocks, that the old house seemed deserted. Holbrook, however, knew better, and going up a side alley, he unceremoniously entered the yard, where a wrinkled old hag was washing. Familiar as she was with vice-distorted countenances, the bloody and ferocious visage of the intruder made her start, and she exclaimed:

"Be you human?"

"Human!" he hissed; "that is more than any one in this den is. Where is Carr?"

"Got something to sell?" asked the old woman, in an inquisitive tone.

"Where is Carr, I ask?" roared Holbrook, becoming more and more irritated.

"Not to home for the hangman," answered the old hag, with a chuckling laugh; "so I guess you'd better get out."

The countenance of Holbrook assumed a look of diabolical ferocity, and snatching up a billet of wood, he would surely have struck his tormentor had not a head been protruded from an upper window, as if to ascertain the cause of the difficulty. Holbrook was not to be forgotten by any one who had once seen him, and as he raised his arm, his angry purpose was stayed by a soft, yet masculine voice:

"Don't hit her—don't hit her! She's a sort of simpleton, and don't know ye. Let him in, Becky; he's a friend."

"A friend!" growled the old dame, fastening a look of malignant spite upon Holbrook as she opened the house door. "A few such friends as this would keep the ghosts off."

"Hold your tongue," said Holbrook, "and take this half guinea to buy brandy with, to make you good-natured."

The old woman clutched the coin in her skinny palm, without a word of thanks, and Holbrook entered the kitchen, which was half filled with old sails, cordage and scraps of iron. The walls were blackened with smoke, although but a few embers then occupied the huge fire place, and but little light found its way through the dirt-begrimmed windows. There was but a scanty array of old furniture, and the aspect of the place was wretched and cheerless indeed.

Yet it seemed an appropriate abiding-place for the owner, who entered from a side door. Originally tall, his meagre form was now bent by time, and long white locks hung in matted masses upon his rounded shoulders. His cadaverous countenance was formed of a succession of sharp angular lines, which gave him a look of low cunning, while his reddish eyes, gleaming from their sunken pits, seemed almost to light up the obscurity of the room. Unshaven and unwashed, with a patched, greasy suit of clothes, he appeared more like a wild beast than a civilized being.

"Well," said he, in a purring tone of voice, "have you had a tussle with your young bride?"

"What bride?" in turn inquired Holbrook.

"Why, the dear lost one for whom you went, and who you intended to bring back as Mrs. Holbrook, to crave her lady-mother's blessing, and her property."

"Half of which," sarcastically growled Holbrook, "was to go into the well-filled coffers of Job Carr."

"Nay, worthy captain,—I have no coffers. I am a poor man—a miserably poor man. But did I not discover the prize? Did I not discover, in an old anchor brought me by a Yankee cabin-boy, a clue to the missing vessel, to which I knew at a glance it belonged? Did I not then ascertain that the young heiress had been saved, and lived? And did I not give you, my valiant soldier, money to go and secure her with?"

"Give me some water," said Holbrook, with provoking coolness. "I wish to wash the blood from my face."

"But the girl—my money advanced?"

"Hang you, the girl, and your money! Give me some water."

Although burning with impatience to learn the result of Holbrook's mission, the old miser, with a heavy heart, was forced to bring a basin of water, a tiny bit of soap, and a diminutive towel that was worn thin enough to serve as a mosquito net.

"Here is what you want," said he. "Now will you have a small glass of spirits?"

"Not I!" exclaimed Holbrook, as he removed the blood stains. "But a good half tankard of it, without a drop of the liquid called water, for which I have no reverence. Bring also a clean pipe and some tobacco."

Groaning at such extravagance, the unwilling host disappeared, but soon returned with what had been so unceremoniously demanded.

"Good!" exclaimed Holbrook, after having nearly drained the tankard of its fiery contents. Then leisurely seating himself, he filled his pipe, and began to smoke in the most provoking way, apparently enjoying the uneasiness of Carr, who appeared to be sitting upon pins, so nervously did he move about. At last the expected budget of news was opened. Holbrook, it appeared, had gone to Massachusetts for the express purpose of abducting Mabel Gwynne, and forcing her to marry him, that he might secure her property. But her boldness in escaping from him, as has been previously narrated, frustrated his schemes, neither could he succeed in carrying her from the rectory, so closely did Frank Ordway keep watch and ward there.

"And so," he concluded, "having a chance to do a little business in the way of news carrying between the armies, I gave up the chase. The game is still there."

A groan escaped from Carr, which seemed to have been wrung from the depths of his very heart, while Holbrook puffed away with apparent unconcern. It was a moment of deep meditation for each one.

"I suppose," blandly remarked Carr, "that you are willing to repay me the sum which I loaned you before you started?"

"Loaned me?" exclaimed Holbrook, regarding his companion with an eye of fierce scrutiny.

"Yes—that is—well, you had the money."

"And you, sitting in this old shanty like a spider watching for flies, would have made over a hundred per cent. had I been successful," said Holbrook, with the sullen displeasure of an injured man. "So no more of that, old two per cent., but when this fighting is over, I mean to try again. Meanwhile, I have something equally good in view."

"What is it?" eagerly inquired Carr, his face beaming with the exaltation of prospective gain.

"Do many officers come here to borrow money now-a-days?"

"Yes—nearly all," replied the old miser; but then he took care to add: "Of course, I can accommodate but few of them, for capitalists are scarce in Quebec."

"O stop your poverty cant," said Holbrook. "The fact is, that Quebec is now in great danger of being captured."

"I fear it is."

"Well, for a consideration, the continental force can be rendered powerless, and their leader will surrender them with but a mockery of an engagement."

"And he asks?"

"He asks ten thousand pounds, so do I. What per centage will you discount for us at?"

"Fifty per cent."

"You extortionate old hoard-up! Never mind; I must have a couple of hundred guineas at any price."

"Two hundred demons! Why, I have not ten in the house!" exclaimed Carr, with the despairing look of a ruined man.

"You can obtain them, if not—"

Holbrook's remarks were here interrupted by the same discharge of artillery which had been heard at the Intendant's Palace, but which was so near at hand as to make Carr's old windows rattle madly in their frames.

"I must hasten to see what this is," he exclaimed, and left the house, greatly to the relief of his host, who rubbed his thin hands cheerfully together as the sound of the desperado's footsteps smote heavily upon his ear.

"Aha!" muttered the old man. "He thinks he can fool Job Carr, but he is mistaken. Madame de Frontenac will give me more to restore her daughter single, than to have her come back the wife of that rascal. I will write her at once."

About half an hour before the discharge of artillery to which double allusion has been made, a canoe, with four Indians bending its paddles as they urged it along the rapid current, had been seen coming down the St. Lawrence. It was evidently from Montreal, and as it drew near the water battery, news spread throughout the city that the governor was on board. He had been anxiously expected, and as he was very popular, crowds rushed down to welcome him.

Rumor for once was correct, and it was a salute fired as the canoe was brought alongside of the wharf, that had caused so much alarm in palace and in hovel. True, he brought unpleasant intelligence, for he had been forced to surrender Montreal, and had only escaped by using muffled paddles. Yet he was nevertheless welcome.

Vigorous and muscular, General Carlton had a commanding aspect, and his very manner and gestures bespoke that decision of action which inspires the wavering with valor, while it makes the erring tremble. The fire of genius flashed from his full eye, which never glanced at an object but looked it through and through, while equal characteristics of firm determination were easily discernible around his well-formed mouth. The very presence of such a leader restored confidence.

Acknowledging with graceful bows the cheers of the assembled crowds on the wharf, and briefly stating the position of things at Montreal, the governor hastened to the castle. Ere proceeding far on his way thither, however, he was greeted by Colonel MacLean, who had hastened to meet him, and who immediately began to explain why he had assumed so much responsibility, and how he had exercised command.

"You were right—quite right," said the governor, when he had heard all the worthy colonel's plans, "and I shall take great pleasure in giving you due honor in my despatch. Meanwhile, let me solicit your continued co-operation."

CHAPTER XVI.*PLOTTING AND COUNTER-PLOTTING.

"From the gray sire, whose trembling hand
Could hardly buckle on his brand,
To the raw boy, whose shaft and bow
Were yet scarce terror to the crow;
Prompt at the rendezvous they stood
By hundreds, prompt for blows and blood."

A REVIEW of the garrison by the governor, on the morning after his arrival, enlivened the city at an early hour. Squadrons of horse swept by at a brisk trot; field-pieces and caissons rumbled heavily along; battalions of infantry were announced by their bands, and the bagpipes of the Highlanders were echoed by the bugles of the riflemen. The line was formed on the Plains of Abraham, rendered immortal by Wolfe's glorious victory, and before all the troops had arrived, the limits marked out for the parade were defined by a large concourse of spectators, which formed a brilliant framework to the martial panorama. A glowing autumn sun gilded each sword and bayonet, and a pleasant breeze, as it stirred plaids and plumes, added to the effect. Every one appeared to be in high spirits; the smiles of beauty and the cheers of manhood encouraging those who were evidently so well prepared to defend the city.

The governor was most delighted of all, and when, in the imposing column which marched past him in review, he recognized whole companies of discharged veterans, mingled with volunteers from the merchants and the students, he exclaimed to his staff: "I had to run from Montreal, but the rebels will have to run from Quebec!"

After the review, the governor invited his principal officers to accompany him to the Intendant's Palace, that they might plan an observatory on its roof, where a watch could be kept. The spacious edifice was now only tenanted by a few domestics, Madame de Frontenac having removed her seminary to the castle; but on entering the hall, Colonel MacLean was reminded of a question which he had intended to ask earlier.

"Tell me, Dupre," said he, "have you heard that our Yankee friend attempted to insult that bewitching Indian girl who accompanied Madame de Frontenac yesterday, when she called at the castle?"

"No. The scoundrel, if it is so, I will whip him like a dog!"

"He deserves it; but my informant stated that the girl gave him a good share of punishment by pushing him over against a step, which cut his head. At any rate, such is my orderly's reason why we were not honored with his company yesterday at dinner, though I did not regret seeing the chair he was to occupy vacant."

"Of whom are you speaking, gentlemen?" asked the governor. "A fellow who brought the information that the continentals were coming here by the way of the Kennebec," replied Colonel MacLean.

"What—Holbrook?"

"The same. Does your excellency know him?"

"I received a letter on my arrival last night, cautioning me against him, as being really in the service of the rebels. I think we had better keep an eye on him."

"That will not be difficult," said Colonel MacLean, who had gone to look in the garden from a window. "Yonder he sits on the wharf, busily engaged in fishing."

"Let us go and question him," proposed the governor. "I wish, at any rate, to see if we must erect a battery in the garden."

So, followed by his officers, he directed his steps towards the river bank. Just at that moment, and as if Providence had so directed it, a canoe shot alongside of the wharf, and the Indian who had paddled it handed a large letter to Holbrook.

"Caught, by my sword-knot!" whispered Colonel Dupre. And at a signal from the governor, the party slackened their steps, that they might observe this singular interview. For some moments they were in earnest conversation, for Holbrook evidently had no idea that there was any spectator. But soon the wary Indian espied the group, and one glance convinced the traitor of his perilous position. A few words, and away the Indian shot in his canoe, while Holbrook, slowly turning around, affected to see the group of officers. Springing to his feet, he advanced directly towards them, holding in his hand the letter which he had just received, its seal unbroken.

"I suppose," said he, with great self-possession, "that I have the honor of addressing his excellency the governor?"

"You have," was General Carlton's reply, with a gracious bow.

"Then it is no more than proper that you should be the first to read a missive just received from an agent in the rebel army."

And with a low bow he handed the document to General Carlton. The governor took the letter, broke the seal, glanced at the contents, and read:

"DEAR DAN,—The game will arrive in a day or two after this, and be sure that you take good care of it."

"A brief epistle," said Colonel MacLean.

"Of little consequence, if its meaning is unknown," replied Holbrook, with a meaning smile.

"Can you interpret it?" asked the governor.

"To your excellency," was the reply, "if you will step one side a few moments."

The governor complied with his request, and after an animated conversation (during which Holbrook exhibited his passport from Lord Howe, as a "trustworthy and loyal secret agent,") he returned to the group of officers, saying:

"Colonel MacLean, you will detail a squadron of cavalry to-night for active duty, commanded, if possible, by an officer who is acquainted with the surrounding country. Let them have ten rounds of ball cartridge for their pistols, and report for duty at the castle at ten o'clock."

The old soldier raised his hand mechanically to acknowledge this order, but in his heart he wondered why it was given. It is the duty of a soldier, however, to obey, not to question.

"Now, gentlemen," said the governor, "let us again ascend the palace staircases, and see if we can contrive an observatory. Mr. Holbrook, I shall be pleased to see you at seven o'clock."

When they had left, Holbrook drew a long breath, as if he felt that he had narrowly escaped detection by the promptness of his action. Just as he was about to return to the wharf for his fishing-tackle, he saw Colonel Dupre again approaching him, and again his fears were revived, though he retained an air of self-possession.

"My good fellow," said the Canadian, "I fear I wronged you yesterday."

"Never mind—never mind," replied Holbrook, again relieved.

"You must bear in mind, though," continued Dupre, "that we Canadians feel ourselves outcasts in our native land, and are therefore very sensitive."

"Yes, I suppose so," answered Holbrook.

"Indeed, Mr. Holbrook, I am not sure, after all, that we should not do better with the colonies, if they succeed."

"Perhaps so," was the guarded response. Holbrook, like other raceals, was prompt to entertain suspicions at the slightest appearance of anything which did not look perfectly open. It occurred to him that the Canadian was endeavoring to extort some humiliating remark, and while he answered with great reserve, he encountered his questioner's gaze with steady assurance. While questions and answers were thus exchanged, the colonel had as it were led his companion into the palace, and proposed to visit the conservatory. Holbrook agreed, and when there, after having admired the floral beauties, the conversation was renewed.

"Sometimes," said the Canadian, "I feel tempted to desert, with all my forces, to the rebel standard."

"Surely, then, you must be subject to fits of derangement?"

"By no means. Look at the honors and emoluments before an officer, whose only rivals are booksellers like Knox, blacksmiths like Greene, or doctors like the leader at Bunker Hill."

"You seem posted up on the rebels' history," quietly ejaculated Holbrook. "But I see nothing in any of them to admire."

"But the cause—the sacred cause. Tell me, can you, for a large sum in gold, ascertain the probability of my receiving a general's commission from the Congress, if I go over, and thus surrender the city to Arnold?"

Such a proposition from such a source would, at any other time, have been eagerly grasped at by Holbrook, but now a vague suspicion that some snare was spread out for him had full possession of his mind. So he replied:

"Colonel Dupre, if this is a jest, it is a sorry one; if you are in earnest, Dan Holbrook is the very last man to select as a go-between. I draw the king's pay, sir, and although to serve his interests I may perform his secret service, I am not enlisting for the rebel ranks."

"Bravely spoken!" exclaimed Governor Carlton, coming out from the retreat in the centre of the conservatory, followed by his officers. "To speak frankly, Holbrook, it was deemed advisable to test your fidelity at this critical juncture, and I congratulate you on escaping unharmed from the trying ordeal."

"Thank you," uttered Holbrook. "But I think that my Canadian friend here is very apt in his part in the farce, although I had to play a new role."

"Never mind—never mind," laughingly responded the governor. "But instead of coming to tea at seven, let me see you to dine at five."

Holbrook bowed thanks, and again the officers left him, more relieved than before. "Aha!" he chuckled to himself, "it is not by such French chaff that Dan Holbrook is caught. It was a narrow escape, though."

Curiosity now prompted him to examine the retreat wherein his unseen audience had been secreted, and while he was wondering if it was constructed expressly for listeners, he heard a noise directly under his feet. Then it was evident that some one was unbolting a trap-door, and the thought occurring to him that he might in turn endeavor to glean something which might be of advantage, he whipped under a large table, which was covered by a cloth reaching to the floor. Hardly had he thus concealed himself, when the trap-door was thrown up, and the rustling of female apparel announced the presence of one belonging to the gentler sex. Holbrook drew his breath gently, and lay crouched like a tiger, ready to spring on certain yet unknown prey. But he was not long in suspense, for heavy footsteps soon entered by the door from the conservatory, and he immediately recognized the voice of Job Carr.

"I am here, madame," whined the miser.

Holbrook held his breath, then started, despite himself, as he recognized the tones of Madame de Frontenac's familiar voice. Years had passed since he had heard it last, each year marked by crime and wrong, yet it swept across his troubled heart as the sound of a Sabbath bell does to one condemned to die near the home of his youth.

"I also am prompt," said she, "although I cannot imagine why you should have sent me so urgent a request for a private interview, and here."

"I have news for you that you will value."

Madame de Frontenac looked steadily into the man's face with an inquiring glance, and then, with lips quivering with eagerness, she exclaimed:

"News! Can it be that you have news of—"

She had not the courage to finish, but the miser supplied the word—that word for which her heart thirsted:

"Of your daughter! I have."

Her daughter! The fate of her child had been a bitter drop which had poisoned her cup of life, and made her long for a cooling draught of the waters of oblivion. She had neither murmured nor complained, but in silence had wept over the lost one, guarding a hope of again clasping the wanderer to her heart as a secret treasure. Again hope lit up her pale countenance, and she inquired:

"Where is she?" She dared not ask how she was.

"A long way off, madame, but money will bring her back," replied Carr, with a chuckle, as if counting the gold which he was certain of securing.

Madame de Frontenac's cheeks, which had burned with excitement, became pale as death. The news had broken upon her so suddenly as almost to deprive her of the power of thought, yet she had felt a faint hope that she might soon see the long lost idol of her heart.

"Name the sum," at length she ejaculated, "and it shall be forthcoming. But where is she?"

"Ah, madame, I have spent thousands in tracing her out, sure that you would repay me. Now say two thousand guineas as a first instalment, I will—"

"You will receive such a drubbing as you little dream of!" interrupted Holbrook, in an ironical voice, as he suddenly crawled out from beneath the table,—"you will receive such a drubbing as you little dream of, if you do not leave here and hold your tongue, you contemptible skindint!" And seizing the affrighted Carr by the collar, he whirled him so near the door that the terrified miser bolted out and took to his heels.

Madame de Frontenac, sinking upon a seat, endeavored to quiet the busy tumult of feeling in her heart, and though an occasional tear rolled down her careworn cheeks, her features resumed their wonted expression of melancholy impenetrability.

"No, Louise,—no!" said Holbrook. "It is not by bribing that fellow that you can obtain your child."

The sound of a voice hated above all others made the distressed woman tremble, but fixing her clear eyes upon her old tormentor, who quailed before their glance, she said, with dignity:

"I am not now the girl, sir, with whose feelings you once trifled, and whose happiness you once ruined. But upon what terms can I have my child?"

"By ordering her to marry—"

"Who?"

"Your humble servant—myself."

"God forbid!" shrieked Madame de Frontenac. Then rising, she approached the door. Holbrook advanced as if to stop her, but she hurried past him as she would have passed a reptile, exclaiming: "Touch me not, sir, I warn you!"

Just then, voices were heard in the conservatory, and Holbrook dared not detain her. The new-comers, however, were only a party who had come to see the palace, now vacated, and the baffled villain slunk away, muttering curses upon the female sex, as ever thwarting his plans.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE MOSCOW OF TO-DAY.

In Moscow, with its glorious undulating site, its long irregular streets of handsome villas, interspersed with greenery, its handsome magazines, and its constant rattle of equipages, you feel as if surrounded by human interest, and cease to wonder why neither despotic power, nor long neglect, nor systematic preference for a rival, can wear the true Russian from his love for the ancient cradle of his race. And now it looks brighter and gayner than ever. Paint, and lime, and varnish, have done wonders, making even the old Chinese town look sprightly and modern; while the gilder has given to the thousand domes, minarets and spires of Moscow a splendor only to be appreciated by being seen. Stand on the esplanade of the Kremlin, and having first curiously examined its battlemented walls, its ancient treasury, its grotesque church—the Assumption, its gay modern palace, and its thousand and one quaint details; watch for a moment the people, high and low, military and civil, as they reverently doff their hats while passing under the sacred gate; and then turn suddenly toward the vast city that spreads itself out beneath your feet, count its innumerable church spires of delicate green, bright golden, or royal red, learn to distinguish its fortress-like convents, its regal palaces, its great public institutions, and you must admit that you are gazing on a panorama to which the civilized world can offer but few parallels. —Paris Univers.

GROWTH OF CITIES.

A writer in Hunt's Merchant's Magazine, in speaking of the progressive growth of cities, says:—"New Yorkers do not doubt, and, indeed, have no reason to doubt, that their city, now numbering little more than one-third the population of London, will within the next fifty years be greater than the metropolis of the British empire. New York, with her immediate dependencies, numbers about 900,000. Since 1790, she has established a law of growth which doubles her population once in fifteen years. If this law continues to operate, she may be expected to possess 1,800,000 in 1871, 3,600,000 in 1886, and 7,200,000 in 1901. If twenty years be allowed New York as her future period of duplication, she would still overtake London by the end of fifty years. London may then have five millions; New York will almost certainly have more than that number."

We find means to cure folly, but none to reclaim a distorted mind.—La Rochefoucauld.

ALPHABET OF SELF-MADE MEN.

The following from "Household Words" gives, in a brief space, the names and characteristics of eminent living characters, who have raised themselves by their own exertions.

To begin with the letter A, and dash hastily and skipingly on through the alphabet, we find that Anderson, the popular Danish novelist, was the son of a cobbler, and educated at a charity school, and that he tried for years to gain a living by various handicraft trades, being very frequently on the very brink of starvation. Beranger, the celebrated French lyric poet, neglected by his vagabond father, lived with his godfather, a poor tailor, and was a gamin in the streets of Paris till promoted for a time to the dignity of a poet-boy. Eliza Harriet, as all know, was a blacksmith's apprentice. Carleton, the Irish novelist, who now enjoys a pension of £200 a year, is the son of a peasant, and begged his way to knowledge. Rafael Carrera, president of the republic of Guatemala, began life as a drummer-boy and a cattle driver. Mr. Golden is the son of a small farmer, and, entering a warehouse in London when a boy, rose through its various grades of service. Sir William Cubitt was a working miller, then a joiner, and then a millwright. Dumas, the great French novelist and dramatist, is the illegitimate son of a planter and a negress, and was in all but starvation in Paris, till he hit upon the way to distinction. Faraday, the eminent chemist, the son of a poor blacksmith, and began his career as the apprentice to a book-binder. Millard Fillmore, late president of the United States, was first a plough-boy, then tried the trade of a clothier, and was then apprentice to a wool-carder. The present emperor of Hayti was born a slave. Herring, the animal painter, began the profession of art with sign-boards and coach-poles. Jasmin, the Baron of the south of France, is the son of a tailor, and the grandson of a common beggar. Mr. Lindsay, M. P., the great ship-owner, left his home with 3s. 6d. in his pocket, to push his fortunes as a ship boy; he worked his passage to Liverpool by assisting in the coal-hole of a steamer; and for a part of the time after he arrived, begged during the day, and slept in the sheds and streets at night. Lough, the distinguished sculptor, began the world in the capacity of a plough-boy. Minie, the inventor of the well-known rifle, was a private soldier. Robert Owen was a shop-boy to a grocer, and then a draper. Johannes Ronge, the leader of the German Catholic movement, tended sheep when a boy. Stanfield, the distinguished landscape painter, was a cabin boy, and a shipmaster was his first patron. Thiers, the well-known historian, and ex-minister of France, is the son of a blacksmith, and was educated gratuitously at the public school of Marseilles. Thomas Wright, the Manchester prison philanthropist, was a weekly worker in an iron foundry for forty-seven years, till a large sum of money was raised by subscription to enable him to carry on his philanthropical labors.

There is encouragement here, we fancy, for the poor and down-hearted; and likewise rebuke for those who are continually harping on the wrongs of the indigent, and the impassable barriers between the high and the low.

BURIED FORESTS.

Extensive forests, covering valleys and hillsides, are overturned, and the uprooted trees form a gigantic barrier, which prevents the flowing off of the waters. An extensive marsh is formed, particularly well adapted for the various kinds of mosses. As they perish they are succeeded by others, and so for generations, in unceasing life and labor, until, in the course of time, the bottom, under the influence of decay and the pressure from above, becomes turf. Far below lies hard coal; the upper part is light and spongy. At various depths, but sometimes as much as twenty feet below the surface, an abundance of bogwood is found, consisting mostly of oak, hard and black as ebony, or of the rich chocolate-colored wood of the yew. Such ancient forests every now and then rise in awe-inspiring majesty from their graves. The city of Hamburg, its harbor and the broad tracts of land around it, rest upon a sunken forest, which is now buried at an immense depth below the surface. It contains mostly limes and oaks, but must also have abounded with hazel-woods, for thousands of hazel nuts are brought to light by every excavation, not exactly made for nuts. The city of New Orleans, it has been recently discovered, is built upon the most magnificent foundation on which a city ever rose. It was the boast of Venice that her marble palaces rested in the waters of the Adriatic on piles of costly wood, which now serve to pay the debts of her degenerate sons; but our Venice has not less than three tiers of gigantic trees beneath it. They all stand upright, one upon another, with their roots spread out as they grew; and the great Sir Charles Lyell expresses his belief that it must have taken at least eighteen hundred years to fill up the chasm, since one tier had to rot away to a level with the bottom of the swamp before the upper could grow upon it.—De Vere's Leaves from the Book of Nature.

THE GOLD FISH.

Among the many members of the animal kingdom from foreign parts which have been fully domesticated here, may be enumerated the gold fish, which are so frequently seen in ornamental fountains and reservoirs. These beautiful fish are native to the southern districts of China, and generally speaking, are identical with the English carp. The first specimens seen in this country were brought from England, we are told, by Mr. Robert Morris, who successfully bred them in sheltered ponds, after which he introduced them into the Schuylkill. There are plenty of these fish now in the river above the dam at this city, and many of the creeks in the interior contain them in considerable quantities. So prolific are they, that a pond soon becomes stocked after the introduction of a few to commence the colony.

The naturalist, Pennant, informs us that the gold fish was brought to England, in 1691, but was not generally known until 1728. It is now completely naturalized, both here and in Europe; and in Portugal, large quantities of them are raised and exported in trading vessels, making an article of considerable commerce. In the still, spring-fed ponds of Long Island, gold fish have been abundant ever since we can remember; and they are now constantly hawked about the streets of New York, by urlians, who get for them from six to ten cents each.—Philadelphia Evening Journal.

MARY STUART.

Prince Alexander Labanoff, of St. Petersburg, is such an intense admirer of the unfortunate Mary Stuart, that he has passed a great part of his life in studying her history, and collecting materials connected with it. About twelve years ago, he published seven volumes of her letters, and recently he has brought out a notice, in 226 pages, of the numerous portraits of her which he possesses, and which he has got together after infinite pains and expense. The portraits are 136 in number, namely, 12 paintings and 144 lithographs or engravings. He also possesses 29 engravings of events in which the queen figured, and a great many portraits of contemporary statesmen and sovereigns.—Literary Gazette.

SCHAMYL AND THE CIRCASSIANS.

The fine engraving on this page presents us with an elaborately executed equestrian portrait of Schamyl, the Circassian hero, concerning whose prowess in arms so many romantic sketches have been from time to time published. The redoubtable warrior is here depicted sitting on his war-horse with easy grace, and armed to the teeth in the Circassian style, which carries us back to the days of chivalry. On his head he wears a helmet, and on his body a cuirass of chain armor. In his belt is a straight poignard, and beside him hang his bow and quiver and his trenchant sabre. In his bearing and appointments, he looks almost like a paladin of Charlemagne. Romance and poetry have thrown a golden veil around the actual life of this chief, and many feats of daring attributed to him doubtless originated in the fertile brains of western writers; but enough is known respecting him to warrant that admiration which is due to gallantry in the field, to prudence in counsel, and a lofty spirit of patriotism and independence. We know that he is fighting for his country, and that to his influence, they are called Kasachi. They inhabit the following districts:—Great Kabarda, Little Kabarda, Beslen, on the Great Laba, which flows into the Kuban, Temirgoi, on the Schagwascha, Ahassia, chiefly on the River Pschaha, Besdudch, in the lower districts of the Rhuasch, Hadukai and Bschana. These hard names, like most of the words in the various unwritten dialects of the Circassian tongue, are almost unpronounceable by European organs. Schamyl has endeavored to promote a spirit of unity among the people, who would have been a formidable nation had they not been divided into a number of petty principalities. The most important of the Circassian branches of the Kaban are the Temirgoi; they inhabit more than forty fortified villages, and can send two thousand men into the field. The Schagacki, below the fortress Anapa, had a prince who formerly maintained vessels on the Black Sea. The Kabarda Circassians, a half-civilized nation, inhabit a fertile country on the northern frontier of the Terek, and are distinguished from all the other nations of the Caucasus by their superior beauty. In many parts of Circassia the soil is fer-the girls are still sold, and not given away to their future husbands. Courtship and the union of hearts are things unheard of in Circassia. The Circassian prince or nobleman—that is, every one who does not serve, and possesses a horse, is constantly armed with a dagger and pistols, and seldom leaves his house without his sabre and quiver. A helmet and a coat of mail cover his head and his breast. Kabarda furnishes fifteen hundred noblemen or uzdens, and ten thousand peasants or serving-men, capable of bearing arms. But the princes of Kabarda destroy each other by constant hostilities, though of late years they have seen the necessity of uniting against the common foe. The soil of Kabarda is excellent for agriculture, but the winter is severe, and the warm season of short duration. The inhabitants neglect the gifts of nature, and make no use of their mines, from which they might extract the most useful of metals, such as iron and copper, for the manufacture of their weapons. A great part of their wealth consists of goats, sheep, oxen and horses. Their horses are famous for beauty, speed and endurance. The Circassian cavalry climb the steep-est mountain passes with the agility of goats; they brand colts of a good breed, and set almost as much store by them as the Arabs do. Their fensal system is worthy of notice. The subject is the property of the prince, though he cannot be sold, and is compelled to perform all personal services, but pays no taxes. The nobleman maintains order among the people and serves the prince in war. The latter keeps an open table, and all those who have herds contribute to it. Immediately after the birth of a princely child, it is taken from the house of its parents, and its education is confided to a nobleman. The boys are instructed in hunting, plundering and fighting, and the girls in sewing and braiding straw and embroidery. By their laws of hospitality, a host is responsible for the safety of his guest; and when a murder has been committed, the relatives of the deceased are allowed to take the life of the murderer. The different tribes of Circassians strongly resemble each other, but differ very greatly in their language. There are nearly a hundred different spoken dialects. None of their languages have a written character, and their sounds are guttural and harsh to an European ear. The total population does not exceed 650,000 souls. For governmental purposes, the people are divided into four different classes, over whom are the princes or Pshees. Under each Pshee or prince are the nobility, the full freemen and the serfs. Beneath these are the absolute slaves. Formerly, the prisoners taken from the Russians in war were reduced to servitude, but Schamyl has recently adopted a far better policy. To those Russians taken in arms who are willing to enrol in the Circassian army, he now promises good treatment and a tract of land to settle on. As the Russian private soldier leads a dog's life and lives on dog's fare, he will eagerly seize the opportunity of abandoning the yoke of the czar for an independent life, and we have no doubt that the future history of the war will record many wholesale desertions from the Russian ranks. During tile, and some of the forests contain the heaviest timber. Agriculture and the rearing of cattle seem to be the only industrial occupations of the inhabitants. They have no manufactures, properly speaking, and trade is only conducted as barter, money being unknown among them. Their agricultural implements are very defective, but they produce corn and wine and the usual agricultural staples in considerable abundance. The Circassians are chiefly celebrated for their physical beauty, the men and women being alike distinguished by symmetry of figure and regularity of feature. They are unquestionably the original stock from which the races now dominant throughout the civilized world are derived. The men are of lofty and commanding stature, regular features, and unequalled in the use of the sabre. The women have delicate features, fine complexions, dark hair, graceful figures, and a beauty of outline which would make them the chosen models of painter and sculptor. The Circassian girls were formerly an article of traffic, being sold by their parents to traders, who disposed of them in the slave mart of Constantinople, whence they passed into the hands of opulent Turks. This trade has now been broken up, but the war between Russia and the western powers, the Circassians were kept quiet by Schamyl, as he was perfectly willing that Russia should send as many troops as possible against the Turks, who are scarcely less hated than the Russians in Circassia. His reappearance in arms has been signalized by some important victories over the Russians, and it is the fresh interest awakened in the mountain hero that has induced us to present his portrait to our readers. There are in the character and manners of the Circassians those picturesque points which render them fine subjects for the poet and novelist, and accordingly we have seen them figuring in many a lay and many a story. But when we judge them by the standard of sound reason and morality, we find them sadly deficient. The upper classes are haughty and arrogant despots; the lower classes are serfs and slaves. Wife and children are slaves of husband and father. The Circassians trade in their own blood. They have no literature, and only the arts of necessity, and are but half-civilized savages after all, wanting many of the good qualities our Indians have. Distance too often lends enchantment to our views.

SCHAMYL, THE CELEBRATED CIRCASSIAN CHIEF.

the war between Russia and the western powers, the Circassians were kept quiet by Schamyl, as he was perfectly willing that Russia should send as many troops as possible against the Turks, who are scarcely less hated than the Russians in Circassia. His reappearance in arms has been signalized by some important victories over the Russians, and it is the fresh interest awakened in the mountain hero that has induced us to present his portrait to our readers. There are in the character and manners of the Circassians those picturesque points which render them fine subjects for the poet and novelist, and accordingly we have seen them figuring in many a lay and many a story. But when we judge them by the standard of sound reason and morality, we find them sadly deficient. The upper classes are haughty and arrogant despots; the lower classes are serfs and slaves. Wife and children are slaves of husband and father. The Circassians trade in their own blood. They have no literature, and only the arts of necessity, and are but half-civilized savages after all, wanting many of the good qualities our Indians have. Distance too often lends enchantment to our views.

ANCIENT CITY OF GUATEMALA.

OLD AND NEW GUATEMALA, CENTRAL AMERICA.

The first of the views on this page represents the old city of Guatemala, built at the foot of the Volcan D'Agua, or water volcano, by an eruption of which it was overwhelmed in 1541. It was again devastated by an earthquake in 1773, but has since been in a great measure rebuilt, and contains some 18,000 inhabitants. Many of the ancient buildings are entire, as, for instance, the fine old cathedral seen on our left. The large plaza, with its fountain, that occupies so large a space in our picture, is crowded with horsemen and footmen, with mules, water-carriers, buyers and sellers of vegetables and fruit, and presents a lively and hustling aspect, while the sweeping mountain peaks in the distance lend a sublimity to the landscape view. We present below a fine view of New Guatemala, the capital of the State of Guatemala, situated in a rich and spacious elevated plain, about 24 miles north-east of the old city, and containing 50,000 inhabitants. It is finely built, and looks like the best Italian cities. Our view represents the plaza, or square. In the background is the cathedral; on the left the president's palace. An arcade contains a row of shops, while on the left of the square are the municipality and the prison. A body of government troops are on parade, and the citizens, in their varied costumes, give life to the picture. This city is 90 leagues from the Atlantic, 26 from the Pacific, and 800 from Mexico. It has been frequently besieged, taken and plundered. The Water Volcano, at the foot of which the old city lies, is about 12,000 feet above the level of the sea. It has sometimes been ascended by travellers. In 1828, a party of five, the Netherlands consul general and daughter and three others, made the passage, the ascent to the top being so difficult that some of the party had to be pulled along by the guides with ropes round the body. The view from its summit is fine, with lovely Guatemala and its cochineal plantations at its foot and the Pacific Ocean in the distance. In 1840, Mr. Stephens ascended the mountain.

MODERN CITY OF GUATEMALA

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE RED LEAVES.

BY GEORGE H. COOMER.

Where like an old enchanted tower,
The oak uprears his blazoned eaves,
How sweetly through the yellow shower
Of sunset, glow his leaves:

As if they caught the morning gleam
Of some unknown, delightful sphere;
Like souls whose faith and glory beam
Through mortal weakness here.

My heart can feel the mellow skies,
The high inspiring leaf and breeze;
And long-neglected memories rise,
As bright as autumn trees.

The owl halloo, as one in sport,
And loud his hollow chorns rings;
A phantom he, that haunts the court
Of these primeval kings.

Great lords! I muse how o'er the rocks,
Above the ancient hills they reign;
How he of old, of golden locks,
Under the oak was slain;

How gentle hearts that plighted vows,
Ere life had passed the budding May,
Have grown in sweetness, like the boughs,
Beauteous in age as they:

How, over story, over life,
The clustering leaves of many a hue,
Show where hath been the blast of strife,
And where hath been the dew.

I see the ages dim and far,
With deed and impulse shadowy grown,
As forests in the twilight are,
As soon must be my own.

O hearts made weary long ago!
Now dreading no autumnal stroke;
Again your green leaves blooming grow,
No scarlet hath your oak.

Life, day and verdure leave in flight
Prophetic signs in earth or skies;
And never spring, nor morn, nor light,
But only weakness, dies.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE MYSTERIOUS STRANGERS.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

NEVER, since the memory of woman, has the ancient town of Pugwash been thrown into such a flutter, such a tumult of consternation and dismay, as within the past week; and for no insufficient reason has such been the case, as will be presently seen. All those who have attentively perused the papers of late, must have observed that the vicinity of the town in question has latterly been the scene of an unprecedented number of incendiary fires, burglaries and assaults; a state of things which in any locality would be likely to cause no little apprehension; but which, in a place usually so quiet, not to say dull and stupid, has wrought the people almost into a state of frenzy. Old ladies of both sexes have talked the matter over, gravely shook their heads, and wondered what the world was coming to; and not receiving any satisfactory reply, have worn out their shoes in nightly pilgrimages about the house to see that all was securely fastened and that no one was secreted in the closets. Young ladies have looked, in fear and trembling, beneath their beds and in their work-stand drawers before retiring, and informed their anxious friends, confidentially, that, in the event of a robber entering the house, the fearful result would be that they should certainly "give up," an event so much to be deprecated as to cause their respective adorers to talk valiantly of forming a vigilance committee—which, of course, has never been done—to purchase revolvers, and to tremble violently in their beds, and pull the clothes over their heads upon hearing any one about the house at night.

But notwithstanding the selectmen have offered large rewards for the detection of the culprits, and also hired, at great expense, a rheumatic old gentleman to patrol the town through the hours of darkness, the excitement had in no degree abated when the occurrence of a most unusual event caused a ripple in the current, and gave, for a time, to the swift-tongued villagers a new subject of conversation; and this unusual occurrence was no other than an arrival of strangers at the Swan and Goosepimple public-house. The Pugwash hotel being conducted on the "European plan,"—that is to say, the guests being "accommodated" with very small rooms at a very large price, and provided with nothing at all to eat, at outlandish hours, at still higher prices—it was considered right and proper to give the house a decidedly English name; accordingly, the above eminently British appellation was selected, after much study of books of travel and such like trumpery publications.

There are, no doubt, many places on this wide extended continent where the arrival of a stranger at a public house is considered a matter of no very startling importance; but such is not the case at Pugwash. That interesting town, not being situated on the line of any important railroad, nor, indeed, of any other road, very little travel passes that way, and, as a natural consequence, whenever a voyager does put up at the Swan and Goosepimple, he at once becomes an object of universal speculation. It is not surprising, therefore, that a good deal of interest was manifested when it became known that there had arrived at the hotel a canvass-covered travelling trunk, marked T. T., a dark-colored carpet-bag, marked A. J., and a light-colored gentleman marked with the small pox, who at once inquired for a room, ordered his baggage sent up, swore at the porter, gave him twenty-five cents, and called for supper, to which he was about sitting down, when there also arrived a black moustache, interspersed with a number of red and yellow bristles, closely followed by a tall, dark-complexioned young gentleman, who inquired for the light gentleman and joined him at supper, when he ordered minced fish and a doughnut, said he would occupy the same room with the light gentleman, to which they shortly retired, locked the door, and had not made their appearance since.

In less than two hours after the first arrival, all these particulars were known, and being talked over at every house in town. Who were the strangers? what did they want in town? how long were they going to stay? where did they come from? and were they people of sufficient consequence to be patronized? were questions anxiously and rapidly asked by each young lady as she recollected that, less than a year had elapsed since Lucy Tompkins had made a splendid match by catching a wealthy southern gentleman who was stopping at the hotel, and who every young lady felt certain she might have caught herself had she only been quick enough and put herself forward as much as that artful, scheming Lucy Tompkins. The recollection lent a spur to the tongues, feet and imaginations of all who were not disposed to waste their sweetness on the Pugwash air.

As evening approached, young ladies, dressed in their best, and looking their prepared prettiest, strolled in couples with careful carelessness up the street in front of the hotel; and young ladies strolled down the street in front of the hotel; young ladies sauntered into the milliner's shop opposite the hotel; asked questions about the hotel, and glanced slyly at the hotel. Ladies of a certain age called upon other ladies of a certain age and questioned of the strangers who were stopping at the hotel; gawky brothers dropped in at the bar-room to endeavor to get a sight of the great unknown; and one or two old ladies called upon Mrs. Mixer, the landlady, whom they subjected to a vigorous pumping process, with regard to the important topic, but all to no purpose; the gentlemen having entered their room, did not leave it again that night. All that could be gathered was, that the names upon the register read "A. Jinx" and "T. Tompkins," only that, and nothing more; no title, no residence, no nothing. They were evidently travelling incog, and that they were unmistakably somebody, was equally evident from their reserved and retired manner. There was no longer any doubt in the minds of the young ladies that they were distinguished strangers travelling through the rural districts in search of sentimental damsels under difficulties, for the purpose of taking to themselves wives; for every one posted in story-book literature must be aware that such is the sole occupation of young gentlemen of wealth and talent.

Excitement and expectation ran high in Pugwash that night. Under the ruffle of many a sheep's-head night-cap flitted charming dreams of a fascinating young lover on his knees—by the way, I wonder if a chap ever did get down on his knees to pop the question? If such a thing ever did occur, the fellow was a spoony, and the lady not much better if she didn't push him over and step on him. That's not the way to do the thing. Bless your heart, it's the simplest thing in the world if you only know how. Fellows are usually too earnest about the business, and consequently, boisterous and clumsy; so different from the calm self-possession of the dear creatures themselves, that they cannot be otherwise than disgusted with the awkward flounderings of their adorers.

Now for my part—and my advice is by no means to be sneezed at, having popped the question at least fifty times, and it makes no difference that it has always been with the same result, to wit, "I shall always like you as a friend—but—" and then, they don't say it but they think it—"Poor fellow, he loves me, I know he does, by his looks; what a pity he hasn't a little more money. Well, perhaps if I don't have a good deal better offer this season or next, perhaps I may take pity on him. I wish he was rich." It makes no difference, I say, that this has always been the tenor of the reply, for practice makes perfect, whether successful or not; and my advice is, not to be too precipitate about the matter; do not commit yourself in any greater degree than does the lady also. Instead of blundering ahead with a blunt proposal, go calmly to work and gently feel your way as you go. In this, as in all other pursuits, there is little hope of success where you cannot feel your way, and keep open an avenue for a graceful retreat. What can be more absurd than a proposal by letter, in which case you place yourself fearfully in the power of your fair enemy? What should we think of that mariner, who, upon approaching a dangerous coast, should go down upon his knees on the fore-castle, and murmur, in a foolish tone of voice, "Dearest coast, you know I am dying to get into port, pray, therefore, take pity on me, and remove all reefs, rocks, and other obstacles from the course, that I may, like a second lemons, go in and be squeezed," or who should content himself by inditing a foolish epistle to the coast requesting a like favor? We should write that mariner down an ass, and so, also, would the coast to which he prayed. No, your skilful sailor, with wary eye, and lead line in hand, stands cautiously onward, sounding continually; not plunging head first toward his object, but ever feeling his way; when, if a sunken reef or shoal interposes, he has an intuitive perception of it long before it is reached, and putting his craft about, he stands along the shore for a further opening; and not having committed himself, he quits the coast with a smile and bow of such perfect good nature, as to leave the coast in some doubt as to whether he really intended an approach, or was only amusing himself, and that coast has ever a smile and a pleasant look for that mariner whenever they meet. Yea, verily! strive to become such a skipper, if you would successfully navigate a court-ship.

But this is a digression. Well, next day the campaign was resumed with renewed vigor. There was more walking, more calling upon Mrs. Mixer, more questioning, and more conjecturing; but as before, all was of no avail. The gentlemen only left their room to feed, and immediately returned, appearing to be busily engaged upon some important and secret business. The young lady who fills the poet's corner in the Pugwash Independent, had indeed caught a glimpse of the strangers as they sat at dinner, but had no opportunity of procuring an introduction, although she must say they seemed to take much interest in her conversation as she talked to Mrs. Mixer, and at them. Their personal appearance she reported as eminently distingue, and more particularly was this the case with the black moustache, Mr. Jinx, who she felt must be a congenial spirit—a being filled with high and noble sentiments, and all that sort of thing.

The excitement grew intense as another day drew to a close, bringing no developments. Old ladies, who could remember events that transpired a thousand years ago, wondered if this Mr. Jinx was any relation to the Jinx that was hung about the time Deborah was married. Young ladies wondered whether this Mr. Jinx was related to Senator Jinx, who made the celebrated speech in reply to Spink on the Goose question, when it was proposed to submit something or other to the committee on the whole. But all this conjecture resulted, as conjecture usually does, in nothing. The young lady who does the chamber work at the hotel could throw no light upon the matter. She had, she confessed, applied her ear diligently to the key-hole of the gentlemen's room, "but the silence was unbroken, and the stillness gave no token, and the only words there spoken" was an occasional "Jinx, my boy, pass that cocktail," or "Tompkins, my lad, toss us a cigar," while all the time a continual scratch, scratch, scratching was going on, for which she could in no way account.

This state of things was unbearable; the town was in a ferment; they must find out something. If it should turn out after all that there had been a Bourboa among them and they not know it, what a never ending source of regret it would be! But they didn't find out anything. Yet another day passed and left them as ignorant as before. The strangers were not communicative, and stuck to their room like a dog to a root, wholly unaware of the interest they excited. This feverish excitement could not last. There is an end to all things earthly, except—according to Solomon—the making of hooks, of which there is no end.

There was relief in prospect. The following day was Sunday, when, of course, the strangers would cease from their pursuits, whatever they were, and make their appearance at church. The dry goods stores of Pugwash drove a thriving trade that warm Saturday afternoon. Innumerable lace collars and under-sleeves having had their price "beat down," were rolled up in flimsy papers, and carried home in impassable pockets somewhere in the voluminous folds of flimsy skirts. New parasolles expanded in the sun, and none so poor but that a pair of new pink lute-string bonnet ribbons flaunted in the summer air.

The Sunday sun arose, and so did the Pugwash damsels some hours later; then, such a trying on and putting off, such a pinning and tying, such a letting down of this garment and putting a tuck in that, was never seen before. Those young ladies who were tall and thin, wore high-necked dresses, with a pretty collar and ribbon, and perhaps a pin; while those who were blessed with pretty necks wore baby waists, so extremely short at the top that little hail-stone muslin no-you-don'ts had to be called into requisition. (I am not altogether certain that I have hit upon the proper name for this latter article of dress, so I had better describe it, though if it isn't a "no-you-don't" that is what it says, fast enough). In the first place, then, the material resembles a lamella of fossil fog of extreme tenuity, made into a garment which commences at the lower extremity of the throat, around which it is made fast, thence descending on all sides, over the shoulders, back, and so forth, for a considerable distance, until it meets the upper rim of the baby waist, inside of which it vanishes. They are very taking garments, and I am amazingly fond of them, as why shouldn't I be, when they are so very near perfection? But I say, my dears, don't the little lumps of embroidery scratch your necks dreadfully?

Ah! it was a beautiful sight to see those high necks, those baby waists, those new parasolles and collars, those pink lute-string bonnet ribbons, as they quitted their homes at the sound of the bell, and hurried their little feet in little steps toward the church; and more delightful was it to look on, as they entered their pews and sat down, got up, again sat down, again got up and a third time subsided into their seats with a furtive glance around at the congregation, and began industriously fanning their fans, one after another, until the whole body of the church was alive with the ceaseless motion of these skilful performers upon their noiseless wind instruments. The house was completely packed, scarcely a seat was vacant; the out-of-town churches were deserted for the day. You would have supposed, from the crowd in attendance, that some great preacher was going to hold forth, so much excitement and expectation were apparent in the faces of all present.

Time wore on. The deacons arrived, the clergyman arrived—poor dear man, how pleased he looked to behold so many gathered to hear him—every lady arrived; but the strangers didn't. It was outrageous. People were as indignant as they could have been had the gentlemen issued tickets at a high price to an exhibition of themselves, and then disappointed their audience. They might, however, come in the afternoon. No, the afternoon passed, and still they came not. Public opinion, ever changeable, began to take a turn.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address, at the lowest club rate.

[For description, see page 881.]

BROADWAY, NEW YORK, BY GASLIGHT.

A GROUP OF CALIFORNIA INDIANS.

[For name, &c. see page 381.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AUTUMN'S COME.

BY ROBERT R. MCKAY.

Autumn's come! bark its tread;
See, the leaves are turning red—
Turning all, and now, anon,
They are falling one by one.
Falling, from each branch and tree,
Downward, slowly, silently;
What a lesson to us each
Do these falling leaflets teach.

Autumn's winds are blowing chill,
Through the meadow, o'er the hill;
In the woods, where oft we've seen
Summer flowers, robes of green,
Through each haunt we call our own,
They with mournfulness do moan;
In each cherished, favorite spot,
One by one, the leaves do drop.

Dropping, dropping on the ground,
Lodging everywhere around,
In the spring, where last we drank,
On the mossy velvet bank;
On the brook they fall like rain,
Then are borne away again;
Then do others take their place,
Following, joining in the race,

There's another—see how slow—
Yet another—down they go;
How like life its truth, we say,
That we're passing, too, away.
Round us gentle forms we see,
Like the leaflets of the tree;
They from us are fading fast,
'Neath the fell destroyer's blast.

But though death those ones obtain,
They shall brighter homes regain;
As the leaves, when spring is here,
All renewed, again appear—
So will God above give birth
To those ones who pass from earth;
Pass away but to regain
Homes where joys eternal reign.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PEEP THROUGH THE KEY-HOLE.

BY H. T. SANFORD.

I was on my first voyage, as first mate, on board the "Two Pollies" of Marblehead, with young Jack Dunmore as captain. A fine, generous, social man, too, was Captain Dunmore,—not a bit of foolish pride in him, and yet stately enough, when any occasion demanded it. He would not hear anything like an insult nor any want of obedience either; but he would speak kindly and humanely to the lowest sailor in his ship. I have seen him tend a sick boy, as a mother would her own baby; and when Ben Corwin was taken down with yellow fever at Havana, the captain waited on him with his own hands. It shamed us all, lubbers as we were, for we were terribly afraid of "Yellow Jack," as the sailors call it.

Ben got well, and always declared that he owed his life to the captain; and in all human probability he did. It was on this voyage that our ship was struck by lightning. I never wish to see such a sight as that again. As the sailors cast their eyes upward, the strong, blue flame reflected upon their faces, and gave them the look of demons.

The lightning did not much damage to the ship, but it left its memory in our heart; and from that time to this, I can never see a thunder cloud approaching, when I am at sea, without shuddering. I recall those fearful countenances, and it takes from me all power of utterance or motion.

We sailed, as I said, to Havana, and arrived back with no material incident, excepting Ben's fever and the lightning. We came into the harbor at Marblehead, under as sweet a moon as ever lighted true-hearted sailors to their homes. Onward came our vessel, like a sea-bird upon the waves, as we sailed across the bay, rounded the point and stood in for Marblehead. All was calm, and still, and bright. The town lay sleeping in its moonlight beauty. It was twelve o'clock, and not a light to be seen.

Captain Dunmore was pacing the deck, with his cigar in his mouth, and his head bent down on one side, as was his fashion when he was thinking very deeply. I came up to him suddenly, and whispered in his ear.

"No, Brooks, I will not risk anything of the kind. I am too young to play one of those tricks. It would do for Captain Welch and Captain Coffin, who could afford to be degraded from the rank of captain; but it will not do for me."

I persisted, for I thought it such a fine chance to get out the captain's goods before we went to Boston, as we should undoubtedly be ordered to do, and I begged him to allow me to do so. He refused still; but as I urged repeatedly, I could see that he was wavering. I pressed my point harder.

"Well, Brooks, I shall go home the moment we arrive. I don't choose to run the risk."

"But, captain, I am only a mate. They cannot hurt me, you know; and if you will only consent to my doing as I please, and go on shore yourself, I will do everything that is to be done."

I won a reluctant consent, and the captain went home as soon as the ship anchored. I carried him in the first boat. The second contained a prize, which the officers of the revenue would have been delighted to get hold of.

We had called up a very clever fellow, for a landsman, and he had promised to store our goods for us, until we could get them away in safety. He was a friend of Captain Dunmore, and would have done anything for him. We stowed them away in an old shed, and covered them with straw.

Part of our cargo consisted of rich spices, and our friend became alarmed at the powerful odor they emitted, and grew very anxious to have them removed. Sure enough, the officers were upon the lookout, on the suggestion of a good-for-nothing cousin of my own, who first watched and then betrayed me. I would like to have had the caning of that rascal. I will have it yet, some day, if I ever find him sober enough to "take the sense" of what I am doing to him.

We had three or four doctors on our custom-house list at Marblehead, and they, having little practice, were on the scent for smugglers, and they scented our spices. They were seized and in the custom-house before they had been out of the ship twelve hours, and Captain Dunmore was every moment in peril of being seized too. It would have been a hard thing had he been discovered, but he was so much beloved that even the officers at the custom-house sent him word to keep out of their way.

An old friend of Captain Dunmore's father undertook to secrete him, and took him to his own house, in order to prepare for his journey. While there, waiting for the carriage in which he was to go, one of the custom-house officers entered the house, in his medical capacity. Captain Dunmore evaded him by leaving by another door, disguised in a large white overcoat and a slouched hat, and thus joined his friend, who was waiting at a little distance with the chaise. Captain Coffin thus carried him away without suspicion, to Scituate, where he had a brother.

On the evening of that day, Mr. Andrew Coffin, the captain's brother, was sitting quietly with his wife and daughters at tea, when the door-bell rung loudly, and a familiar voice called for Mr. Coffin. That gentleman rose, and was absent long enough from the room to excite the curiosity of his youngest daughter, a girl of sixteen. She left the table, and peeping through the key-hole of the spare parlor, she saw her uncle and a man whose appearance certainly did not prepossess her. She wondered much what her father and uncle could have to do with such an uncouth personage. But while she looked, he changed all at once. The fair Bertha could hardly believe her eyes, when she saw the old white hat and long light hair suddenly disappear, and a noble head, with black curling locks appear in their stead. Then the loose coat fell off, and a handsome figure in black met her gaze.

Afraid to stay longer, she ran back to the tea-table, and soon her father returned, bringing her uncle, and an elegant young man, whom he introduced as Dr. Merritt.

Bertha blushed very deeply, when he was introduced, but she kept her own counsel. Captain Coffin explained that his young friend was somewhat indisposed, and would like to try the sea air for a few weeks, and that he had not any better place for him than to throw him upon their hospitality, and recommended him especially to his favorite Bertha's care.

Here Captain Dunmore stayed, week after week, until a merchant in Boston, knowing his enterprising character and seaman-like qualities, wrote to Captain Coffin, to find his young friend, and offer him a new ship that was just ready for the East Indies. Once away, the excitement would be over, and by the payment of a large fine, things were all arranged without subjecting him to imprisonment, or degradation from his rank.

It was a long voyage, and when it was over, Captain Dunmore married the young lady whom "Doctor Merritt" had wooed. Not until then did Bertha tell him of her "peep through the key-hole."

My wife and Bertha are very intimate. Through Captain Dunmore's interest, I got a fine ship belonging to the same merchant for whom he sailed; and we are often in port, and lying along side each other. On such occasions, we recall the "spicy" events of that night on the waters, and have a merry laugh together at Bertha's first peep at her husband.

The reader may well believe that we never again risked the danger of smuggling.

SPOILS OF WAR.

An English paper says there has recently arrived at Portsmouth from Kertch, taken from the museum of that ill-fated and, until lately, beautiful city, the full sized figures in marble of a lion and lioness; and although the hand of time has told upon them, they still possess in their outlines proofs of the skill with which they were sculptured. There is nothing to the uninitiated eye, in the way of inscription, to indicate their date or place of sculpture; but those who have some knowledge of such matters, attribute them to the period of the ancient kings of Pontus, of whose realms the Crimea was a portion—probably they date from the time of that celebrated monarch, Mithridates, surnamed the Great. The same vessel which brought them to Portsmouth, also brought a marble slab with some devices or scroll work sculptured upon it; and this may, perhaps, afford some clue to the date of these ancient sculptures. The lion and lioness were placed at the entrance of the Kertch Museum; they are now destined for the British Museum.—Portfolio.

TRADE IN INSECTS.

Bugs are an important article in the trade of Rio Janeiro. Their wings are made into artificial flowers, and some of the most brilliant varieties are worn as ornaments in ladies' hair. One man manages to earn his living by selling insects and other specimens to the strangers who visit the port. He keeps twelve slaves constantly employed in finding the bugs, serpents and shells which are most in demand. The nearest approach to his business that we can remember is, that of the trade of fireflies in Havana; the insect, being caught and carefully fed on the sugar cane, is used as an ornament in ladies' dresses. Being twice the size of the American firefly, it is very brilliant at night. The Creoles catch them on the plantations and sell them to the city belles; some of them carry them in silver cages attached to their bracelets. They make a fine display by lamplight.—New York Dispatch.

[Special Correspondence of Ballou's Pictorial.]

LETTER FROM PARIS.

HOTEL DU LOUVRE, PARIS,
Nov. 8, 1856.

DEAR SIR:—Wishing to see Paris in good shape, and without regard to cost, I have taken up my lodgings at the magnificent establishment from which I date this letter, and of which the Parisians are justly proud—though to one familiar with your Tremont and Revere Houses, and the Metropolitan and San Nicholas, New York, there is nothing positively stunning in this great caravan-serai. Still it is, by all odds, the grandest hotel in Europe, and is probably destined to become the general rendezvous of all tourists who have "put money in their purses." It fronts the Place du Palais-Royal, and its enormous facade is a fine specimen of architecture. Though it has some splendid suites of rooms, which can only be occupied by a fortunate speculator on the Bourse, by a banker or a Russian prince, still the establishment is not devoted exclusively to millionaires—and the directors have not forgotten that it is necessary to recruit their finances from all classes of travellers. Besides a table d'hôte in a magnificent gallery, and reminding you of that of the St. Nicholas, the hotel is provided with a restaurant of the first class. M. Edouard Dremel, proprietor of the Vittoria Hotel at Dresden, is at the head of this colossal establishment, and has thus far proved himself an excellent manager.

The Hotel des Princes is another establishment highly patronized, which I shall try before leaving this fascinating city. It enjoys a European reputation. You must go there, if you wish to become acquainted with all the seductions of Parisian luxury. Fancy a hotel in the very heart of pleasures; a world of servants ready to minister to and anticipate your caprices, carriages always harnessed in the huge courtyard, apartments furnished with every luxury, a cuisine worthy of Careme or Brillat-Savarin, always ready to lavish its marvels for your money—here, if you have that and health, you can enjoy metropolitan life, or else you are very hard to please. And do not fancy, Mr. Editor, that it costs three thousand francs a month to lodge at the Hotel des Princes. You can live there for from one to four dollars a day. A nice room, three or four flights up, however, costs only about twenty dollars a month, meals extra. But you can dine at some of the splendid restaurants in the Palais-Royal—fully equal to Parker's in Court Street—for sixty or seventy cents, whereas at your hotel, the dinner, no better, would cost you a dollar and a half or two dollars.

Paris is beginning to be very gay—it is never otherwise to the stranger, to be sure. The theatres, circuses, and other places of entertainment, are in full blast, and the balls are beginning. One of the most attractive places is the Jardin d'Hiver (Winter Garden), a sort of Crystal Palace in miniature, about the middle of the great avenue of the Champs Elysees (Elysian Fields). The entrance fee is one franc. Rare trees and shrubs are grouped here with infinite taste. The fetes of the Jardin d'Hiver are various in character—sometimes they give a concert here, sometimes a full dress ball, and sometimes a masked ball. I look forward with some curiosity to the masquerade balls, of which we have read so much. In the carnival season, the Parisians seem to enjoy themselves, I am told, only when they put on false noses and beards, and figure as impossible postilions of Longjumeau, Mexican Indians, hunchbacks, etc. The theatres minister to the delirium of the hour by changing themselves into dancing saloons. The Opéra-Comique, the Odéon, the Porte-St. Martin, the Ambigu, the Gaieté—all of them theatrical establishments—have their dress and masked balls. The Grand Opera gives the signal. That establishment draws the most prodigious crowds, and makes the most noise with its roar of drums and its mighty orchestra, led by Musard, the mighty magician, whose hoot is the sceptre of frenzied joy and tumultuous calisthenics and gymnastics.

The other day I saw the empress riding out to take an airing in a carriage, escorted by a detachment of mounted chasseurs. The engravings you have seen have not exaggerated her beauty. She does not look, however, like the spirited creature she is. But the Spanish blood in her veins is said to be as fiery as that which flows in the royal arteries of Queen Isabella. Many stories are in circulation with regard to her frolicsome disposition, which is said to have finally defied the attempts of Louis Napoleon to hold it in check. Think of her going out shooting in the woods of Fontainebleau, in a half masculine costume, and bringing down a brace of birds with her double-barreled fowling-piece, without so much as winking! The story runs that Louis Napoleon has resumed his former dissipated habits, that the empress has found him out, and that she has suspended her curtain lectures only on condition that he shall not interfere with her innocent gaieties; and that she shall not be tied down to that rigid court etiquette, which the "nephew of his uncle" sought to establish.

Among the recent deaths in this city, is that of the widow of Danton, the terrible revolutionist. She was a girl of fifteen, and married the monster about two years before he perished by the guillotine, to which he had consigned so many victims. During the consulate of Napoleon I, she married Baron Dupin. The name of Danton was never mentioned in her house.

Some weeks since the world-renowned Cafe de Paris was closed. It was opened July 15, 1822, and soon established a brilliant reputation. This restaurant occupied the ground floor of the house at the corner of the Rue Taibout and the Boulevard des Italiens. The proprietor gradually raised the rent from $4000 to $8000. The lessee grumbled and paid. But when Lord Seymour, the owner, raised the figure to $15,000, the eating-house man refused to stand the extortion, and the establishment was closed. And, as you have probably had enough of French gossip by this time, I will close my letter.

Ever yours,

CHARMION.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

NAVAL FAREWELL SERENADE—QUARTETTE.

BY LIEUT. HOLDS, U. S. N.

All. Our bark awaits the shore, love,
Our banner flouts the breeze:
Adieu to thee once more, love,
We're bounding o'er the seas.

1st. Tide is on the ebb, now,
And time upon the wing—

2nd. Gaily Youth is at our prow,
While syren Hope doth sing—

3d. Victory flings her garlands
Upon the heaving wave—

4th. Glory bids us "gather them,
Or find a watery grave!"

All. Our bark awaits the shore, love,
Our banner flouts the breeze:
Adieu to thee once more, love,
We're bounding o'er the seas.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WRONG AND INJUSTICE DEFEATED.

BY MRS. CAROLINE OSNE.

THE lamps of the great hall of Oakdale Manor-house were lighted, although the reflected brilliance of the still glowing west, had it not been for the thick, heavy drapery shading the windows, would have rendered unnecessary the aid of artificial light.

Sir Geoffrey Wilmouth, the owner of Oakdale, an estate inherited from a long line of ancestors, was alone in the hall, pacing up and down in that hurried manner which betokens mental disturbance. He was but little past the prime of life, and was, in many respects, a handsome man, notwithstanding those hard lines, denoting certain unamiable traits of character, which time had traced round his mouth. Suddenly, he stayed his footsteps, and stood in the attitude of listening.

"He comes," he murmured, half aloud, as a dull sound of horses' feet was heard in the distance. "After all, I must have been mistaken," said he, as the sound ceased.

Scarcely a minute, however, had passed, when was heard the sharp clatter of iron-shod hoofs on the pavement of the court. The travellers, a gentleman and his servant, had taken a short cut across a corner of the park, so that the noise of their approach had for a few seconds been muffled by the yielding turf. Sir Geoffrey's countenance brightened, and yet, now and then, a shade of uneasiness flitted over it. In a moment or two, the door at the upper end of the hall was thrown open, and a gentleman with a Spanish cloak thrown over his shoulders, for, though early in September, the evening air was chilly, entered the apartment.

"Welcome, Count de Silva," said Sir Geoffrey, stepping quickly forward to meet him, and offering him his hand.

"You were expecting me," said de Silva.

"Yes, though the message which preceded you was delayed. It is only two hours since I received it. But throw off your cloak. A fire was lit half an hour before sunset, which, as you will find, has agreeably tempered the coolness of the air, and removed the dampness."

"A pleasant change," said de Silva, seating himself in a deep, velvet-lined chair, "after crossing those bleak moors, with a north wind sweeping over them."

De Silva remained a few moments without speaking, enjoying the genial warmth of the fire. As he sat with the red firelight throwing its strong glare upon his features, those lines, scarcely visible in the softer lamplight, were distinctly revealed, so that the forty years which had passed over him were fully told, though ordinarily he might have passed for a man of thirty.

His complexion was dark, almost to swarthy, and his forehead, indicative of considerable mental power, was surrounded by sable curls, short and crisp, while his eyes, black and piercing, would have been handsome had they not, at times, emitted a cold, serpent-like glitter, which made those near shrink from him with a kind of instinctive dread.

"You said nothing of the charming Arabel in your last communication. I hope she is in good health, and disposed to regard me more favorably than when I was here three months ago," said de Silva, throwing himself back in his chair, with a negligent air, though it was easy to see that his indifference was assumed.

"As to her health," replied Sir Geoffrey, "it is as good as can be desired, though I am sorry to say that, according to her own declaration, she does not regard you with more favor than formerly. It will make no difference, however."

"You have decided, then, to accept my offer."

"I have. There is no alternative. The money I must have, or I am a ruined man."

"But Arabel has a will of her own—how can she be managed?"

"I hardly know, but it must be done. Some way will be found out, I think."

"Yes, if you can depend on yourself. A priest can readily be found to perform the marriage ceremony, and as for tears and reproaches—I am proof against them."

"I can say the same, when I see ruin staring me in the face. Were she my own child, instead of the daughter of a half brother I never had reason to love, I would not hesitate."

"How soon shall it be?"

"I must have the money in three days from now, or it will be too late."

"Let it be to-morrow, then."

"Rather a short time for preparation—so Arabel will think. But I suppose I can't expect to receive the money till she is your wife."

"It would be hardly discreet to part with forty thousand pounds till the bird is safe in my hand."

"You are right. To-morrow let it be. On the whole, it will be the safer course, for if Clarence Hastings should get an inkling of what is intended, even bolts and bars would hardly suffice to keep her safe."

"I could have sent a pistol-ball through that fellow's head, when I was here before, and no one would have been the wiser for it. I was a fool for letting him escape. Should the chance again happen, I think I should know how to silence any foolish qualms of conscience which might rise in his behalf."

Little did the two unprincipled men imagine that Arabel Anvers, the niece of Sir Geoffrey, had heard every word of the foregoing conversation. When de Silva entered the hall, the door was left partly open, while that of her own apartment, which was at the head of the staircase, being ajar, their voices were perfectly audible. Though no eaves-dropper, it would have been a false delicacy under existing circumstances, when she heard de Silva's questions concerning her, to avoid hearing what might be further said relative to a negotiation which was of such vital importance to herself.

Just at the moment when de Silva finished his remarks concerning Clarence Hastings, a single bugle-note, clear and prolonged, was heard in a neighboring forest. Arabel started to her feet, and clasped her hands in joyful surprise.

"It is Clarence," said she to herself, "and I shall escape the snare."

It was the work of only a moment to wrap herself in a large shawl, and hide the wealth of her golden tresses beneath a plain straw hat. Scarce longer time did it take for her to descend a back staircase, and unlock a door at its foot, of which she alone possessed the key, and which opened on a lawn, bounded on one side by the forest whence had sounded the bugle-note, and where, as she well knew, Clarence was awaiting her.

The moon was up, and poured its silver beams through the openings of the leafy wall, which enclosed one of those sylvan glades, such as one might suppose a troop of fairies might choose wherein to hold their revels. Towards this sweet and silent glade Arabel Anvers hastened with steps fleet and light as those of the roe of the hills; but ere she gained its entrance, Clarence Hastings met her.

"I didn't expect you till to-morrow evening," said Arabel, as she placed her hand in his, "but it is well that you have come. De Silva has arrived."

"I know it, and it is for that reason I am here."

"Know it? How should you? It isn't yet half an hour since he came."

"Fortune favored me. Last night he stopped at the little hostelry where I had engaged my lodging. I heard him say that he was on his way to Sir Geoffrey Wilmouth's, which was all I needed to hear. I knew what the journey portended."

"He didn't see you?"

"No; I took good care to keep out of his sight. I started on my way hither in advance of him, and was secreted in the forest when he arrived, though I thought it not best to give the signal till daylight was gone, which would give my servant a chance to reconnoitre the premises with less risk. Having made sure that the count's argus-eyed valet was fairly engaged in discussing the news and ale, together with the remains of a venison pasty, I ventured on trying the bugle note, though without much hope that at present you would find opportunity to leave the house."

"My uncle thinks me safe in my chamber. He and his guest were too busy in laying their plans, to wish for my presence. Before I heard your well-known signal, I had already determined on attempting to escape; for had I remained, it was decided that within the next twenty-four hours, if persuasion failed, I should be forced to participate in the ceremony which would make me the wife of de Silva."

"Their infamous designs will be foiled this time, I trust," said Clarence.

By this time, they had arrived at the glade, where three horses were waiting, and in a moment more Clarence and Arabel, followed by the trusty Martin, were on their way through the forest-path which soon terminated in the high road.

In the meantime, the Count de Silva and Sir Geoffrey, so deeply engaged were they in tracing out the details of their base plan, felt no impatience on account of the protracted absence of their intended victim. Not till dinner was ready to be served did her waiting-maid, who, on the arrival of de Silva's handsome valet, had obtained leave to pay a visit to the servant's room, return to the apartment of her mistress. Sir Geoffrey and the count, after waiting something like five minutes for her appearance, began to grow impatient.

"Though she puts on airs, and makes you wait now," said Sir Geoffrey, "you will soon be able to repay her, and with interest if you please."

"I will see to that," replied de Silva, "for it is no trifling matter, after four hours' hard riding in the eye of this keen wind, to be obliged to wait till the dinner grows cold."

"We will wait no longer," said Sir Geoffrey, and going to the foot of the stairs, in an angry voice commanded her to come down.

"Miss Arabel isn't in her room," said the waiting-maid, stepping forward.

"Where is she, then?"

"I don't know, sir."

"Didn't you see where she went?"

"No, sir, I stepped out just a minute—she gave me leave to go—and when I returned she was gone."

The rooms near Arabel's chamber, as well as those more remote, were now searched, though of course she was not to be found. The servants were assembled and sternly questioned, but no one had seen her leave the house. In the midst of the excitement caused by her absence, a young farmer, one of Sir Geoffrey's tenants, called with a few nice apricots, which he said the good wife had sent, with her best respects and humble compliments, to Miss Arabel, for she should never forget the nice sort of clothes she gave him de Johnny on his birthday, nor the plain pudding and pies she sent them for Christmas.

"Miss Arabel has gone—no one knows where," said the servant to whom he delivered his message.

"Gone, and nobody knows where!" repeated the young farmer. "Tis just as I say."

"Twas she. I thought of her then, and said to myself I never saw a lady that could ride so brave as she does but Miss Arabel."

"What's that you say?" said de Silva's valet, coming forward.

"Nothing for your ear."

"I will just call the count, then, and see if it is for him."

"You may spare yourself the trouble, for it is no more for his ear than for yours."

"You may find yourself mistaken."

The farmer made no reply, but turned dimbly away, saying as he did so:

"I might have known that it was Miss Arabel, and that it was the brave and noble Clarence Hastings who was with her; but if her uncle and this foreign-looking gallant aint put on their track till I do it, it will be a long time first."

When Sir Geoffrey and de Silva were satisfied that Arabel was gone, several different parties were formed to go in pursuit.

"Where is the dolt you told me about?" said de Silva, addressing his valet.

"Far enough from here by this time," was the reply, "for truly, if he be a dolt, his heaviness doesn't lie in his heels."

"After him and bring him back. But stay—I can soon overtake him. He has run away to avoid telling what he knows, I suspect. If we were in my own country, I would soon find a way to make him speak."

But he found it to be different in England; for, though the sturdy young farmer was soon overtaken, neither promises nor threats could induce him to break the promise he had made to himself not to betray Arabel Anvers. Count de Silva, however, entertained but little fear that the party headed by himself, or one of the others, would not, ere long, overtake the fair fugitive. The result showed that his expectation was not without foundation. The morning sun was not yet an hour above the horizon, when at a little distance ahead of him and his companions, he saw a lady on horseback, whom he knew to be Arabel, and riding by her side a gentleman whom he at once recognized as Clarence Hastings.

They were accompanied by several gentlemen and ladies, the faithful Martin bringing up the rear. They looked back, but instead of accelerating, checked the speed of their horses.

"Does that mean that the runaway lady has repented?" said de Silva.

He was not long held in suspense. When, being in advance of his party, he arrived within a few paces of them, they wheeled round their horses, and one of the gentlemen, greeting him by his name and title, presented to him Clarence Hastings and Arabel, his wife.

"I don't say that your assertion is false," said de Silva, "but I will say that I shall be satisfied with nothing short of proof."

"Which you can have if you will take the trouble to accompany me to yonder chapel, you see gleaming through the trees. Had you been fifteen minutes sooner, you might have witnessed the ceremony, performed by special license, which gave my friend Hastings a legal right to take the fair lady by his side under his protection."

"It is enough. I should have laid my plans better, and been more vigilant. But let Clarence Hastings remember, that if he and I live, in less than a year from now he will repent having defeated me."

The threat might have been fulfilled, if both had lived, but only a few weeks afterwards de Silva was thrown from a carriage, by which he sustained injuries which soon proved fatal.

Sir Geoffrey, whose affairs, by reckless extravagance and waste, had become so embarrassed as to tempt him to agree to accept a bribe from de Silva, was compelled to pass the remainder of his days in obscurity, on the wreck of his once princely fortune.

ONE DOLLAR. WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, at below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the Magazine gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

COL. JAMES M. THOMPSON.

COL. JAMES M. THOMPSON.

The accompanying portrait, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, from an admirable photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee and Case of this city, cannot fail to be pronounced a striking likeness of the original Col. James M. Thompson, of Thompson and Co.'s Express, one of our most widely-known and popular citizens. Col. Thompson, who is now in the prime of life, is a native of New Hampshire, but for many years a resident of Boston. He started in life a poor boy, without any advantages, but determined by the exercise of his ingenuity, industry and ability, to work his way to competence and honor, if not to fortune. As "there is nothing impossible to him who wills," we find him at last at the head of an extensive and prosperous business, and in a fair way to realize the most sanguine anticipations and hopes of his earlier years. It is now ten or twelve years since he purchased Harnden and Co.'s Express, and has ever since conducted the business, constantly enlarging the field of his operations. He has taken into partnership two gentlemen who formerly officiated as clerks in his office, Messrs. W. N. Melcher and R. L. Johnson. Col. Thompson is also a director in the Adams Express Company. The business done by Thompson and Co. is co-extensive with the Union, and embraces Canada also in the field of its operations. They have offices in all the principal cities and towns of most the Northern, Middle and Western States and in several of the Southern. Besides the conveyance of parcels and merchandise, they transact a large money business, in the collection of notes, bills and drafts. The head of such an establishment must necessarily unite many rare qualifications, as its details are complex, and its success is dependent upon perfect system. That Col. Thompson possesses the requisite energy, tact and character is amply proved by the high reputation enjoyed by the company. Col. T. is hardly less known and admired for his qualities as a citizen and man than for his business abilities. Manly, generous and independent, he commands the esteem and affection of his intimates, and the number of his friends is legion. We must not neglect to mention that he has ever taken a warm interest in military affairs, and that his rank is derived from having served as aide-de-camp on the gubernatorial staff. Thousands of our readers will thank us for publishing the colonel's "counterfeit presentment."

THE OLDEST MAN IN AMERICA.

The accompanying portrait is an accurate likeness, drawn for our paper, of Peter Nassau, a colored man, now a resident of Woodstock, Vermont, who has reached the extraordinary age of one hundred and twenty-six years! This fact has been established by N. Haskell, Esq., town clerk of Woodstock, who has taken great pains in order correctly to trace out Peter's history. When quite young, he came as a gentleman's servant from Martinique, his native place, to Boston, but for many years past Woodstock has been his home. Peter Nassau is as well known in Vermont as the Green Mountains themselves. He is of a thin, spare frame, and is nearly bald, but his skin is remarkably smooth and unwrinkled. He has no son, but seven daughters, two of whom yet live in Woodstock, by which town he is supported. Go, however, where he will, and he is fond of wandering about, he always finds friends who are glad to give him food and shelter. His eyesight is still good, and his teeth remarkably sound for a man of his age. He converses freely, but, unlike most old men, is not garrulous. While he was sitting in the office of the Windsor House, lately, some one asked him how many more winters he expected to see. "Ah!" said Peter, "if this yere house was offered to me all full of gold, I wouldn't 'cept it to live my days over again." It is almost certain that Peter Nassau is the oldest living man in America. What a history his would be if faithfully chronicled! Think of his having been born two years before Washington, and outliving all the actors in the ante-revolutionary period. He was past the prime of life—forty-six years old—at the date of the Declaration of Independence. Long before the second war with Great Britain broke out, he had passed the scriptural limit of life—threescore years and ten. He has lived to see many a man who was an infant when he was in his prime, die of old age. He has seen the population of this country increase from three to thirty millions of people. He was ten years old when Frederick the Great ascended his throne. How many wars have convulsed the world, how many changes have taken place on the surface of the globe, since Peter Nassau saw the light! There are some instances on record, of persons who have attained a greater age than Peter Nassau, but they are not many. The following among other names are mentioned by Dr. J. W. Draper, in his admirable work on Human Physiology: Attila, 124 years; Margaret Patten, 137; the Countess of Desmond, 145; Thomas Parr, 152; Thomas Damme, 154; John Rooin, 172; his wife, 164 and Peter Torton, 185. The Englishman, Parr, who was born in 1483, married when at the age of 120, and was in the full enjoyment of all his faculties, mental and physical, at the age of 140. Henry Jenkins, who died in Yorkshire, in 1670, lived 169 years.

CAVE-IN-ROCK, ON THE OHIO.

Cave-in-Rock, or the "House of Nature," an accurate view of which, drawn and engraved for the Pictorial, we present on this page, is situated on the Illinois shore of the Ohio River, twenty-four miles below Shawneetown. It is pointed out to passengers as a great curiosity, and the approach to it, as you descend the stream, is strikingly picturesque. Above and below it are lofty perpendicular limestone bluffs, surrounded by trees. The entrance to the cave is just above high water mark. It is about 20 feet high, and leads to a spacious apartment with an arched roof, about 30 feet in height, and extending inward to a depth of 125 feet. On its front are carved the names of many visitors. This cave has occasionally afforded a temporary winter asylum to families descending the river. About the year 1800 it was the rendezvous of a noted outlaw and pirate, by the name of Mason, who, with his band, subsisted by plundering flat-boats on their way down the river, or by waylaying the unfortunate boatmen on their return, and robbing and murdering them. The voyage down the Ohio was then performed in "arks," which, moving slowly with the current, occupied weeks in the distance that now requires but days. There was little to relieve the monotony of this dull progress; while the slow pace at which the ark moved, ensured their easy capture by the canoes of Indians or robbers. Mason availed himself of this, and became the terror of the boatmen. The leader of this notorious band of outlaws was finally shot by one of his own comrades, in order to gain a reward of $500 offered by the Governor of Mississippi for his head. The story of Mason has been made the subject of more than one sketch, and has, moreover, we believe, furnished the outlines of a drama. The history of the western settlements abounds in themes for the pen, as do the vast regions of the west in subjects for the pencil. In fact American scenery and history are abundantly suggestive, and afford an inexhaustible mine to artistic skill, being full of striking features and strange combinations.

THE OLDEST MAN IN AMERICA.

CAVE-IN-ROCK, ON THE OHIO RIVER.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- E. D.—Your friend is right and you are wrong. General Lopez was not a native of Cuba; he was born in Venezuela, South America, and was an adopted son of Cuba, where he married and became a citizen.
- H. S. T.—Stone cannon balls were in use for nearly a century before lead ones were adopted. Stone cannon balls are still in use among some of the Eastern nations. Cannon were first used as early as the year 1326.
- W. F.—We do not agree with you in your article against horse railroads in cities, and so decline it. Those in operation in Boston, viz. from Boston to Roxbury, and from Boston to Cambridge, have proved eminently successful.
- M. G.—You ask why so many South Carolinians are of French extraction. In 1684 a colony of French refugees, called in consequence of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, settled in Carolina, from whom many of the first families are descended. The population of Charleston is less than 40,000.
- Equinox.—The first vessel that sailed round the world and thus determined its being globular, was Magellan's. He was a native of Portugal, in the service of Spain. He was three years and twenty-nine days in performing the voyage.
- A. E. R.—It is the warlike people who inhabit the confines of Poland, Russia, Tartary and Turkey, who are known as Cosacks.
- Teacher.—Damascus is probably the most ancient city in the world, as it was in existence in the time of Abraham. See Gen. xiv. It has been under Assyrian, Persian, Greek, Roman and Saracen rule. At the present time it is the capital of a Turkish pachalik.
- H. W.—Next to the two celebrated diamonds you mention, the richest one we know of is that in the sceptre of Russia, the intrinsic value of which is half a million of dollars. The famous Pitt diamond was sold to the King of France in 1720 for the same amount.
- MARY C. V.—The Elgin Marbles are ancient works of art gathered by Lord Elgin from the Parthenon, a temple of Minerva in the Acropolis at Athens, and date back five hundred years before Christ. They are now in the British Museum, the government having given its lordship nearly $200,000 for them to place there.
- Helen C.—Bloxbury.—We now strongly suspect from whence those fragrant flowers have come, from time to time, giving a sweet fragrance to our sanctum, and mystifying us accordingly.
- HARRY.—Address "Porter's Spirit," New York—now would not engage to hunt up the pedigree of a horse for a handful of silver dollars.
- B. W.—We cannot say how far back corsets date as an article of female wear; but there is a tradition that they were invented by a hard-hearted butcher in the thirteenth century as a punishment for his wife! He thought it would partially deprive her of breath and prevent her tattling so much.
- A. H.—Mr. Herbert's residence is Newark, N. J. He calls his residence "The Cedars," and a beautiful cottage it is, on the river's bank, about a mile and a half from the centre of Newark.
- A. H. W.—It costs a trifle more to cross the Atlantic in our American steamers, than by the Cunard line, but the superior accommodations of the former over the latter are beyond comparison.
- S. B.—Very acceptable, shall be published next week.

REMEMBER!

Two more numbers of our paper will complete the volume for the present year; and all whose subscriptions end at that time, will confer a particular favor upon us, by renewing it at the earliest moment, in order that we may print an edition equal to the demand. We discontinue all subscriptions at the date to which payment has been made; therefore, to ensure an unbroken receipt of the paper, immediate renewal is necessary.

The forthcoming volume of our illustrated journal shall be the best that has ever yet appeared from this establishment. We have engaged some new and finished artists, who are added to our already large corps of designers, and several new and popular contributors to the literary department. Fresh spirit and new life will be imparted to our pages—"Ballou's Pictorial" and the "Flag of our Union," sent together to one address, for $4 per annum.

SPLINTERS.

- .... At Colchester, Eng., 72 Crimean soldiers were married in one day. There must be quite a hymeneal furor there.
- .... Merle d'Aubigne, the celebrated religious historian, will visit Boston some time in next summer.
- .... The Rev. George Bird, of Whitehaven, Eng., teaches his parishioners that it is right and moral to beat their wives.
- .... An English writer thought he had discovered the sea-serpent, but finds out it was only a line of porpoises.
- .... At Madrid, Narvaez has been caning the husband of the Infanta of Spain, the king's sister.
- .... The real force of the Pupal army is now no more than 8000 men, 7400 infantry and 600 cavalry.
- .... In 1639 the first printing-press was established in America, and the "Bay Psalm Book" was printed on it the next year.
- .... It was Bishop Horner's own opinion that there was no better moralist than the newspaper.
- .... The people of Yucatan, handed back by Great Britain to Honduras, are displeased with the transfer.
- .... In France, there is a metal-worker whose business has had the curious effect of turning his hair green.
- .... A man in the Albany Express advertises for an able-bodied Irishman to hold his wife's tongue—the brute!
- .... Col. Baylies of Taunton has made a bet that Major Ben: Perley Poore will be governor of this State next year.
- .... An exchange says an editor deserves more credit for what he suppresses than for what he prints.
- .... A false friend, like a shadow on the dial, appears in the sunshine and disappears in the storm.
- .... Julius Caesar was nervous and so were Bonaparte and Nelson and Marlborough, yet they were brave.
- .... If there are Quacks who seem to stand high, it is because of the Flats that surround them.
- .... Happiness is a perfume you cannot pour on others, without getting a few drops yourself.
- .... In Prussia, males are not permitted to marry under 25 nor females under 22 years of age.
- .... Senator Douglas, it is said, is to marry Miss Cutts, the reigning belle of Washington City.
- .... The failure of the silk-worms in France has raised the price of silk to an enormous figure.
- .... The catalogue of Yale College, lately issued, registers the names of five hundred and ninety-eight students.
- .... The author always the most appreciated by the world at large, is the author of his own fortune.

BROADWAY, NEW YORK, BY GASLIGHT.

On page 376 of the present number, we have placed a fine characteristic picture, drawn for us by A. Hill, and engraved by Darnes, representing Broadway by gaslight. Its spirit will be acknowledged by all who see it, and its truthfulness by those who are best conversant with its localities. Prominent in the line of buildings on the right is the Broadway Theatre, with its line of glittering lamps, and the people pouring into the vestibule. On the other side of the street are several noted places—Putnam's bookstore, Taylor's famous saloon, Brady's daguerrotype rooms. That line corps, the New York Light Guard, are seen filing along the sidewalk, on their return from a parade. The flag in the distance floats from the Liberty pole at the corner of Grand Street. The street, itself crowded with omnibuses and private teams, presents its usual crowded aspect, the confusion being increased by an alarm of fire, in obedience to which, a fire company with their machine and lanterns are dashing madly in the direction indicated by the signals. The whole picture will call up many an agreeable reminiscence.

Broadway is like nothing in existence but itself. In this most cosmopolitan of our cities, this great artery of life is the most cosmopolitan of streets. Other localities in New York are specialties—are American, Teutonic, Helvetian, or Batavian in their character; but the representatives of all nations make Broadway their thoroughfare. It is the finest field in the world for the ethnological student. Here you meet, throughout the day and evening, besides your own countrymen, swarthy Spaniards, mercantile Frenchmen, black-eyed Italians, sturdy John Bulls, stultish Milenians, light-haired Bavarians, meditative Germans, plodding Dutchmen, sable Africans, with here and there a Greek, a Turk, or an Armenian—and now and then a long-tailed immigrant from Central Flower-Land. Nobody would be surprised at encountering a Kafir, or a Polynesian. In fact, nothing surprises anybody in Broadway—it is so full of wonders that you cease to wonder at them. Its architecture, its magazines, its hotels, are striking features, but its passengers are most attractive, after all. What a spectacle does Broadway present in the after-dinner hours, when it is gay with glittering equipages and gay promenaders—the ladies with their loveliness and rich attire, making the sidewalks seem like a parterre of flowers! But he who knows not Broadway by gaslight, loses the most striking half of its physiognomy. It must be seen and studied when its cafés and restaurants are a blaze of light; when its theatres present their glittering illuminations; when the omnibuses thunder by with their red lights, and the whole population give themselves up to amusement. It is then that it strikingly resembles one of the Parisian boulevards. And yet it is strongly national, after all, and most essentially New York—and New York city is a world in itself.

GROUP OF CALIFORNIA INDIANS.

The striking group of Indians on page 377 of this number, was drawn for us by Mr. Champney, from a fine daguerrotype taken by Mr. Heywood at Crescent City, Klamath River, Oregon coast. The Indian with a cap and sword is a chief, and the second one next him is his son. The remainder of the group are Indians and their squaws. The costumes, appointments, attitudes and faces of these specimens of the aborigines are faithfully rendered from the daguerrotype. Mr. Heywood, to whom we are indebted for this unique group, is an accomplished artist, who has travelled extensively in this country and Europe, and has brought home many interesting souvenirs of his journeyings, in the shape of views of places, people and buildings of note. His rooms are at 228 Washington, corner of Summer Street, with a branch establishment at 103 Court Street, and are freely open to all visitors. He has won quite a reputation by his portraits and views.

THE OLD RUIN AT NEWPORT.—A special correspondent of the London Times, whom we take to be no other than Mr. Delane himself, has a dab at the famous Newport ruin, and combines the evidence that goes to prove that it was never anything but a mill, and that the old northern Vikings had nothing to do with its erection. Well, we suppose we must give it up; we'll say it's a mill, and call it square—though it is certainly round.

RUSSIA.—Russia does not appear to have lost much prestige by the late war. True she has been beaten, but beaten without disgrace; and then that coronation affair at Moscow was the most brilliant fete of modern days.

DR. KANE.—We are sorry to learn that this intrepid navigator is gradually sinking in his health. His publishers, Childs & Peterson, of Philadelphia, write us that they fear, from late advices, he will not live to return to this country.

RAILROAD FESTIVAL.—The railroad celebration at Montreal was a grand affair. The arrangements were conducted on a scale of great liberality, and the hospitalities of the Canadians were unbounded.

CINCINNATI.—Ballou's Pictorial, which has heretofore been sold in Cincinnati at ten cents per copy, will henceforth be furnished at retail for SIX CENTS. R. A. Duncan, agent, 162 Vine St.

FRANK FREELOVE.—We had marked your "Rosierian Glee" for insertion, when we ascertained, casually, that you had already published it in "Porter's Spirit."

TO EVERYBODY.—Read our prize offer on another page of this paper, and act accordingly.

THE BULL FIGHT AT BAYONNE.

On the last page of this number will be found a spirited representation of the famous bull fight at Bayonne, a recent festa, got up by Louis Napoleon expressly to gratify the empress, who, a Castilian by birth, had long regretted her deprivation of the excitement of her national sport. The emperor and empress are seen in the front of the box at the left hand, looking down upon the arena. The most famous bull-fighters in Spain and the fiercest of Andalusian bulls were engaged for this occasion. The sketch was made at an interesting point—the death of one of the bulls. The experienced matador (slayer) as the animal is making forward, in his last blind, desperate charge, puts his sword into the junction of the neck and spine, and terminates his unhappy career. In the foreground, a horse, wounded to death, is rolling over in his agony. The chulos, with their red mantles and exceedingly graceful Andalusian costumes, are hovering near, ready to divert the attention of the bull if the matador fails in killing him, and he becomes dangerous. The objects sticking in the neck of the bull are tenderillas, darts decorated with ribbons, and thrust into the animal to increase his rage and ferocity. Three mounted picadors are in the ring. They have high demi-pique saddles and huge shovel stirrups, so that it is exceedingly difficult to dismount them. Their pantaloons are made of hide, ribbed with steel, as a protection against a chance stroke of the bull's horns. The horses used on these occasions are sorry nags, for this sport is too dangerous a one to allow of valuable horses being employed, nine out of ten of the horses being almost sure to be killed or disabled. It will be noticed, that the eyes of the horses are bandaged—the broken down hacks could not otherwise be brought to face the bull, even with the sharp persuasion of the heavy rowels of the Spanish spurs. It is no less strange than true that the most delicate and refined Spanish ladies take as much delight in a bull fight, as the lowest ruffians of the streets. High and low, young and old, seek their highest enjoyment in the bull-ring. So of old the ladies of Rome thronged the Flavian amphitheatre, and looked on with tearless eyes when the gladiators hewed each other to pieces, or were pitted against Numidian lions and Indian tigers.

MORMONISM.—The Mormon missionaries in England now openly preach their pernicious doctrine of a plurality of wives, but it appears the English women don't object. The annual emigration of converts from Great Britain is computed at 8000.

THE MERRIMAC.—The London Times says that our frigate Merrimac has the "most terrible shell armament" that was ever put on shipboard. John Bull must be a good boy, and not compel us to "shell out."

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. James E. More to Miss Mary A. Dowry, by Rev. Mr. John Hart, Mr. John Robert Robertson, by Rev. Mr. King, Mr. H. S. Welch to Miss Elizabeth S. Foster; by Rev. Dr. Neale, Mr. Stephen A. French to Miss Frances E. Brackett; by Rev. Mr. Parker, Mr. Asa W. Kingsbury, of Framingham, to Miss Sarah E. Boynton; by Rev. Mr. Wells, Mr. Henry C. Knapp to Miss Ellen A. Lincoln; by Rev. Dr. Barrett, Jacob A. Corey, Esq., of New Orleans, to Miss Caroline M. Wilkinson; at Cambridge, by Rev. Mr. Harrington, Mr. Thomas Edgar French to Miss Lizzie F. Chamberlain; at Somerville, by Rev. Dr. Albion, Rev. Curtis Lawrence, of Groton, to Miss Harriet Burrill; at Quincy, by Rev. Mr. Rice, Mr. Aldeo Lombard to Miss Mary Jane Pratt, both of Weymouth; at Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Lombard, Rev. William P. Merick, of Orleans, Mass., to Mrs. Lydia H. Vale; at South Danvers, Mr. William L. Felt to Miss Sarah Jane Shore; at Essex, by Rev. Mr. Prince, Mr. James O. Lowe to Miss Abby Burnham; at Gloucester, by Rev. Mr. Rogers, Rev. Josiah L. Hatch, of Brooklyn, N. Y., to Miss Lucy W. Plummer; at Rockport, Mr. Benjamin F. West to Miss Frances Williams; at Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Steele, Mr. Thomas Fenwick, of Dayton, Ohio, to Miss Anna Louisa Kager; at Plymouth, by Rev. Dr. Kendall, Mr. John A. Joyce, of Kingston, to Miss Maria T. Alexander.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mr. George W. Briggs, 40; Mrs. Margaret M., wife of Mr. Antoine Matzel, 43; Mr. Peletiah Harmon, formerly of Portland, Me.; Miss Mary Janvier, 80; at Cambridge, Miss Nancy Fuller, 46; Mr. Robert McArthur, 92; at East Cambridge, Mr. Samuel Dannels, 41; at Dorchester, Bradish Billings, Esq., 82; Mrs. Mary B., wife of Mr. Calvin M. Thompson, 41; at Quincy, Miss Anna E. Baxter, 17; at Waltham, Mr. Samuel Lucas, formerly of Boston, 73; at Braintree, Miss Rachel Sampson, 82; at Beverly, Mr. Benjamin Wallis, 82; at Lynn, Mr. Nathaniel Rothwell, 55; Mrs. Betsey, wife of Mr. Thomas Lewis, 82; at Salem, Mr. Elihu M., wife of Capt. George C. Upson, 32; Miss Ellen Benjamin, 19; Widow Sarah Dunlap, 83; at North Danvers, Mrs. Sarah A., wife of Mr. Albert Howe, 23; at Gloucester, Mr. Aaron Bray, 74; at Newburyport, Mr. Jeremiah Waterhouse, 76; at Southbridge, Miss Catharine Fox, 45; Mr. Ira F. Barlow, 46; at Clintonville, Mr. Caleb Battles, 82; at Northampton, Mr. John F. Munroe, 79; Provincetown, Mrs. Lucy Miller, 84; at Sandwich, Mr. Francis M., 70; at Worcester, Mr. Hannah M., May, 62; at Fairhaven, Mr. Isaac Wood, 81; at South Yarmouth, Mrs. Rhoda B., wife of Capt. George Wood, 41; at Augusta, Mr. Arthur Berry, 72; at West Roseau, N. H., Mrs. Mary Ann C. Stone, 29.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary mélange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best AMERICAN AUTHORS, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

I subscribe, one year, $3 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " " 20 00
Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteen copy gratis.
* * * One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.
Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 WINTER STREET, BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 152 Yt Street, between Adams and St. Nicholas Sts., New York; J. A. Roy, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AUTUMN.

BY MRS. R. T. ELDRIDGE.

I weep not as I see thy pale flowers die;
Through my full heart a still, sad joy is stealing,
And as I gaze upon the sunset sky,
My bosom gently throbs with pent-up feeling.
O, there are thoughts too hallowed to be spoken,
I dare not whisper lest the spell be broken;
Deep in my heart there is a sacred prayer,
Low angel-whisperings soften every care.

See, how the tender vines are closely clinging Around the trees, whilst threatening storm-clouds lower;
'Tis thus fond woman, her caresses flinging,
Around man's sturdy form in sorrow's hour,
Shows him the strength that in her weakness lies,
And how her shielding arm the worst defies;
In every heart there is a spot so tender,
That 'neath love's witching smile it must surrender.

There is a charm in autumn's fading treasure;
Her oak-leaf garlands tinged with scarlet hue,
Are meet to grace the crowded halls of pleasure,
Where hearts are broken—hearts too fond and true.
O, how I love and shrink the wee pale flowers,
That ope their petals in the woodland bowers,
Loved all the more because they will not stay,
To shed their fragrance round life's toilsome way.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE COURT MARTIAL.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

THERE was trouble at Tangier between our U. S. consul there and the authorities of Morocco, and our ship was sent thither to overhaul the matter, and it was while lying in that harbor that the incidents occurred which I am about to relate.

It was on the morning of the 5th of July that the crew were not a little startled upon finding a great quantity of blood upon the deck close by the starboard bridle-port, and shortly afterwards a bloody sheath-knife was found close by. The men had not yet been called, the hammocks having not been piped up, but as the morning was warm and sultry, quite a number had come on deck. The officer of the watch was called at once, and he called the first lieutenant. The sheath-knife was recognized instantly. It bore the initials, cut into the handle, "E. T.," and was known by some of the men to belong to Edmund Thaxter.

"There's been a murder committed here, as sure as the world!" said the first lieutenant, as he looked upon the scene. "Some man has been killed and then thrown out this port. You say this knife is Thaxter's?"

"Yes, sir," returned one of the men.

"Then let us send for him at once. Mr. Orland (to one of the midshipmen), have him sent on deck—to the mast."

Orland went down and found Thaxter asleep in his hammock, and he awoke him and bade him come on deck at once.

Edmund Thaxter was a youth, not over nineteen years of age; a mild, kind-hearted fellow, intelligent and faithful, and never known to be engaged in any broils of any kind. He dressed himself as quickly as possible, and then went up to the mast.

"Thaxter," spoke the first lieutenant, with a strange, startled look, what is that on your trowsers? and on your hands, too?"

The youth looked down, and found his white trowsers all bedaubed with blood, and his hands the same. He gazed eagerly upon the strange marks, and then he put his hand up to his face, as though he would see if there was any wound there.

"What is it, Thaxter?"

"I don't know, sir—I'm sure I don't," the youth replied, in a bewildered state.

"Whose knife is this?" the lieutenant next asked, holding out the bloody weapon.

Thaxter instinctively placed his hand upon his sheath, which was attached to his belt, but he found no knife there.

"That's my knife, sir," he at length said, apparently more bewildered than before.

"Now just come forward here," the officer resumed, as he started towards the fore-castle.

The ship had a topgallant-fore-castle which reached aft beyond the foremast, and the place where this scene had been enacted was under this fore-castle clear forward. When they reached the spot, the lieutenant pointed to the blood upon the deck, and asked Thaxter if he knew what it meant.

"Good heavens, sir!" the youth gasped, as a gleam of the truth flitted before his understanding, "what do you mean?"

"Do you not know what I mean?" the officer asked, very significantly.

"No, sir—I'm sure I don't."

"Well, you can see what has probably been done, eh?"

"Done, sir?"

"Ay—you can see, can't you?"

The youth gazed first upon the stained deck, then upon the like stains on his hands and clothing, and then upon the bloody knife which the lieutenant held, and which he knew was his.

"Mercy, sir! has there been a murder done?" he finally uttered.

"Don't you know?"

"No, sir! As true as God lets me live, I don't!"

"Ah, Thaxter, this looks dubious. If I am not much mistaken you had some rum last night, didn't you?"

The youth trembled, but made no immediate reply. The fact was, the day before had been the anniversary of our nation's birthday, and quite a number of the crew had managed to obtain liquor, besides some three or four extra torts which had been served out to the men from the ship.

"Answer me! Didn't you have some rum last night?"

"I had a little, sir; but I know nothing of this. I was not drunk, sir—as true as Heaven I was not!"

But the lieutenant only shook his head. And he was not the only one. All who stood around shook their heads, and the looks which were bestowed upon the boy were anything but cheering to him.

The master-at-arms was called, and Thaxter was placed in his charge, and the corporal of the watch ordered to post a sentinel over the place where the blood was, with orders to keep the men out from beneath that side of the fore-castle. After this the captain was called, and the whole matter explained to him. He went and saw the blood, and then went around upon the other side and looked upon the suspected youth.

"O, captain!" Thaxter cried, clasping his hands in agony, "I am not guilty of this!"

"Never mind now. We shall look into it," returned the captain, as he turned to walk aft.

The boatswain was now ordered to pipe up hammocks, and as soon as the men were all up, and the hammocks stowed, the word was passed for mustering the crew. All hands came flocking to the larboard side of the waist and quarter-deck, and the fearful whisper went around amongst them that some one had been murdered during the night!

The purser's steward took his station at the capstan, and commenced to call the roll. One after another of the men answered and passed around through to the starboard gangway. At length the name of John McMull was called.

"John McMull—John McMull—John McMull."

But no one answered to that name. The rest of the names were called, and all answered or were accounted for. Then the missing man was called for again, and with the same result. He was not to be found. His hammock was hanging all alone upon the berth-deck, and its owner was absent. A reasonable search was made, and the final result was the same. John McMull was missing. He had been a youth about Thaxter's age, and also Thaxter's particular friend and crony.

After all search was over, and it was a settled thing that the man was gone, a fellow named Michael Heany came to the mast and wished to speak with the first lieutenant. Heany was a tall, stout, dark-featured man, and belonged to the crew of the fore-top. The lieutenant came up and asked what was wanted.

"Sir," said Heany, touching his hat, "I think I can tell ye somethin' about this thing. Last night, sir, about one bell (half-past twelve), I heard a scuffle under the fore-castle, and heard somebody cry out as though they was hurt. I went as quick as I could, but only met Thaxter coming out. I spoke to him, but he wouldn't stop. He went below, and then I went under the fore-castle to see what else I could find, for I supposed of course there was another one there. But I couldn't find anybody."

"You didn't see the blood, then, did you?" asked the officer.

"No, sir, for 'twas too dark; but you see I got some on my shoes." He held up one of his feet, and the blood was plainly seen.

Heany was questioned further, but nothing more of importance was elicited. He was ordered to say nothing of this among the crew, and then dismissed.

Three days were suffered to pass away, and during that time every exertion was used to find the body of the missing youth. The harbor was dragged, but without effect. There were many sharks in the neighborhood, and it was supposed the body had been devoured as it floated in the water.

On the fourth day a court-martial was organized to try the supposed murderer. The sailing-master was appointed judge advocate, and one of the passed-midshipmen, a shrewd, keen man, was appointed counsel for the prisoner to conduct the defence. The trial took place in the ward-room.

When Edmund Thaxter was brought in he looked pale and haggard, and he trembled fearfully. The judge advocate read the charge, and the prisoner was asked if he was, or was not, guilty.

"Guilty?" he gasped, with a wild start, "O, God knows I am not! I was not on deck that night! I was not! O, I was not!"

"We will come at that by-and-by," said the prosecutor.

And then the witnesses were called up and sworn. First came one of the midshipmen, who testified that on the evening previous to the murder the prisoner was the worse for liquor. Next came two men, very reluctantly, who testified that the prisoner and McMull had some difficulty on the evening in question—that high and hard words passed between them; and that the prisoner threatened to whip the other, and would have attempted it had not they, the witnesses, separated them and sent McMull below.

The prisoner's counsel questioned these witnesses some, and obtained from them that McMull went directly below and turned into his hammock, and that they then got Thaxter below, and saw him turn in also. Furthermore, they said that the prisoner was not so drunk but that he knew what he was about, and that he appeared to be very sorry after he had got into his hammock that he had had any difficulty with his crony.

The next witness was Michael Heany. He swore to the same statement he had made to the first lieutenant, relating the incidents promptly and clearly. This evidence was deemed conclusive, and a shudder ran around among those present as they heard it. Edmund Thaxter gazed upon the witness in utter astonishment. There could be no mistake in the meaning of his look.

"Michael Heany," said the prisoner's counsel—and he seemed to feel a deep interest in his client—"have not you had difficulty with both of these youngsters?"

"What youngsters?"

"With Thaxter and McMull."

"No, sir."

"Be careful, sir! Have you not threatened to flog them both when you got a chance?"

"Why, I may have said something of the kind."

"Ay, so I thought. And now answer me again. Did you not, on the evening before this affair happened, smuggle a lot of rum on board this ship?"

"No, sir."

"You did! Do you dare deny it now?"

Heany started now with fear for the first time.

"Michael Heany," said the passed-midshipman, looking the stout man sternly in the eye, "you brought rum on board that night—and John McMull saw it—and you feared he would expose you!"

"Well, sir," returned the witness, "I supposed a man was not obliged to criminate himself, and I denied having done what has no connection with this affair at all. If I did bring rum on board, and if McMull did see me, I don't know what it has to do with this. And if I had anything against either of 'em, they are both beyond my reach now."

The counsel questioned Heany further, but he could only arrive at simple facts which had no direct effect upon the testimony against the prisoner.

After this two or three witnesses were called who had seen the blood upon the prisoner's person; and the knife was also produced; and here the prosecution rested the case.

Upon the other side some witnesses were called, but their testimony only amounted to what every one before knew from the result of previous cross-questioning. The case looked dark and hopeless. Edmund Thaxter sank upon his knees and swore that he was innocent, and begged for mercy! But the officers shook their heads.

The sentence of the court was about to be pronounced, and the prisoner had sunk back into his seat, when there was a sudden commotion upon the deck, and loud voices in startled speech. In a few moments more the officer of the deck came rushing down, and informed the court that a new witness was coming. Another step was heard upon the ladder, and while the court were in anxious waiting, two men entered, and between them walked—John McMull! He looked pale and ghastly, and his step was weak and tremulous.

Michael Heany started to his feet, and having gazed for an instant upon the unexpected visitor, he made a leap for the door; but he was knocked back, and at a motion from the judge advocate he was caught and secured.

As soon as order could be restored, and the prisoner had embraced the new-comer, all the circumstances were explained to McMull. He opened his eyes with astonishment, and at length he told his own story.

"After I had got into my hammock," he commenced, "I remained awake until Ned Thaxter had come down and turned in; and then I went to sleep. I did not wake up until midnight, and after that I lay awake for some time. Just as one bell was struck, some one came to my hammock and called me by name. I looked up and saw Michael Heany. He whispered to me and told me that Ned Thaxter had gone on deck and got drunk, and that he had been trying to get him below, but couldn't, and he wanted me to come up. I thought nothing, and got out of my hammock and slipped on my trowsers, and then followed Heany up. He led me to the fore-castle, and when we had got close by the bridle-port he turned and struck me on the head with something he had in his hand, but he did not wholly stun me. I saw him draw his knife, and I felt him stab me, and then I knew that he pitched me out of the port; and I remember well of hearing him say, as he drew his knife, 'This'll settle ye both, ye bloody young villains!' The only thing I can remember after striking the water is, of feeling a dull pain in my breast, and of striking out with all the energy and strength I had. I can remember of feeling something pulling my hair; but the next thing of reality I knew, I found myself in a miserable room ashore, and an old woman standing close by me. I was in the hut of an old fisherman, and when he came in he told me how he found me."

"He was coming in from Gibraltar, where he had been to sell his fish. The wind had all died away, and he had lowered his sails, and he and his son rowed in. They saw me in the water—they said both my hands were stretched up over my head, and I seemed to be treading with my feet. They caught me and pulled me on board, and I had been in their house two days when I came to. An old Arab doctor had dressed my wounds, and he said I should recover. This morning the old man told me that somebody was going to be tried for murder on board the ship to-day, but he had forgotten the name. I asked him if it was Heany, and he said no. Then I thought of what Heany said as he stabbed me, and I asked if 'twas Thaxter, and he said yes. Then I knew that Heany had contrived to get rid of both of us because we had been the means of having him flogged, and I told the old man that he must bring me off—and he has done it. Now you know all."

There was a change of feeling after this. Michael Heany was put in double irons, and when he found that he could not escape conviction, he confessed that he did mean to murder McMull; and that he went to Thaxter's hammock and got his sheath-knife, and also went back and daubed blood on his trowsers and on his hands while he was asleep.

Edmund Thaxter recovered; but Michael Heany was not punished as the court-martial had decreed. On the fifth night after the trial he made his escape. All search was made for him on shore, but no traces of him could be found. The wind was blowing hard on the night when he slipped away, and in all probability he was drowned.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

Chinese sugar cane is coming in use at the South. Some few specimens have been raised there, and it is a pity that in this season of scarcity of sugar it could not be more generally cultivated. The cost of making a gallon of syrup in Georgia will not exceed fifteen cents, and it is thought that soon it will be made into sugar for export. — T. B. Read, the poet artist, on his passage to Europe, was obliged to take his turn at the pump six hours per day for fourteen days, to keep the ship afloat—and his health was much improved by it. — Mrs. Lorenzo Cheney, of South Gardner, met with a horrible death from burns, lately, in consequence of the explosion of a camphine lamp, which set fire to her clothes. She lived but six hours after the accident. — In Germany, where everybody drinks beer, tea is sold by druggists; and the demand for it leads to anxious inquiries about your health! — Mr. Parker A. Benner, of Waldoboro', Me., went to his store one morning, lately, apparently in health, built his fire, and in a few minutes complained of blindness; left his store and started for his house, but did not reach there before he expired. — Kansas news says fever and ague is quite prevalent in those parts. — The Nashville (Tenn.) Gazette states that some apples raised in that State, and exhibited at the late Fair, were sold by the half dozen, and as much as $5 20 per half dozen paid for them. The whole lot, about 1 1-2 barrels, consisting of seven varieties, brought the sum of $111. — Molasses is now made from the Chinese corn-stalk in Columbia, Pennsylvania. — Olé Bull, the distinguished violinist, it is stated, is now in Illinois, and since the last of August he has been unable to move about, having had a severe attack of bilious fever. — The medical profession in Austria consists of 6398 physicians, 6148 surgeons, 2951 apothecaries, and 18,798 professional women. — By recent despatches to the navy department from Commander Swartwout, of the United States steamer Massachusetts, the important fact is communicated of a discovery of valuable coal on the Straits of San Juan de Fuca. This discovery was made by Capt. J. H. Thorndyke. About four tons of it were dug out by Indians, and tested on board the Massachusetts. — The Portsmouth Journal thinks that Ben: Perley Poore should be created a baronet. — The Minnesota Pioneer, in speaking of the growth of St. Paul, and the increase of population in the territory, says that "emigration has been steady and increasing the whole season, and that the people are now beginning seriously to entertain the idea of applying for admission into the Union as a State, its population numbering, it is thought, nearly 200,000 souls." — At Rome, lately, Col. Biram Pearson, of San Francisco, was fined one thousand piastres for seating himself on the throne of the pope. — It is stated that, with the exception of a few miles in Virginia, there is now a connected line of railroad all the way from Bangor, on the Penobscot, to Montgomery, on the Alabama. Ere long the chain will be extended to New Orleans, thence to be carried westward until it reaches the shores of the Pacific. — The witty James Smith says that November is the period at which most Englishmen take leave of the sun for nine months, and not a few of them forever. — The Duke of Wellington saw a man turn pale as he marched up to a battery. "That," he said, "is a brave man; he knows his danger and faces it."

MOSAIC PORTRAITS.

We learn from the Commercial Advertiser, that in the basement of the Vatican, at Rome, there is a large manufactory for the production of mosaic pictures, which are used for the adornment of churches, and for presents to the crowned heads of Europe. The workmen are now engaged in making colossal portraits of the Popes, to be placed in St. Paul's Church, now erecting. These mosaics are made of a species of glass enamel manufactured for the purpose, and the different tints used in these works amount to more than ten thousand. It is requisite for the persons employed to have great knowledge of art, and a discriminating appreciation of the different schools of painting. Some idea can be formed of the difficulties to be encountered in these productions, when it is known that from twelve to twenty years are frequently occupied in their execution. Their artistic beauty is unrivalled.

SHORT SPEECHES.—There is nothing like short speeches. A man can put as much pith into four lines as into a two hours' harangue. On the summit of the Alps, Bonaparte's address to his soldiers was only this:—"Soldiers, we will descend from these rocks like an impetuous torrent, and we will conquer the immense plains that meet our wondering eyes. Then shall victory dispense happiness to all." And they "went and did it," as Mr. Squeers says.

FINE LOCATION.—A very pleasant place must Trevorton Minor be, somewhere in Pennsylvania. Even an auctioneer could only say of it, that it was "covered with stones, and under each stone were rattlesnakes; and nothing but hemlock knots and huckleberries were produced in addition to stones and rattlesnakes."

A BURNING SHAME.—How much wood do you suppose the railroad locomotives of the United States consume annually? Well, we happen to know—five millions cords. That's where our forests go to.

VIRTUOUS INDIGNATION.—What is called "virtuous indignation" should be sparingly indulged in. It has been justly called the handsome brother of anger and hatred.

FORMALITY.—The more polished the society is, the less formality is there in it. It is only clowns and mountebanks who walk on stilts.

Wayside Gatherings.

A man at Syracuse, N. Y., has recently been obliged to pay $200 for calling a neighbor a sheep stealer.

Newell Akeley, of Somerset, Vt., has been committed to await a trial on the charge of the murder of his own daughter.

One of the most popular dramatic writers of America is a physician in active practice. While others sleep he is wide awake.

Christ's Church, in Alexandria, six miles from Washington, is supposed to be the oldest church edifice in the country. The bricks of which it was built were brought from England.

Col. Nathan Boone, the youngest and last surviving of the children of the famous Daniel Boone of Kentucky, died in Missouri, a few days since, at the age of seventy-six years.

When the stopper of a glass decanter is too tight, a cloth wet with hot water and applied to the neck will cause the glass to expand, and the stopper may easily be removed.

Twelve city lots have just been sold in Janesville, Wisconsin, for the sum total of $14,322 50. Eight years ago $300 was paid for them, and it was then thought an enormous price.

W. F. Johnson, the owner of a lard factory on the Lake Shore, at Cincinnati, has recovered $51,000 damages from the Illinois Central Railroad Company for cutting through his property.

It is said to be an indisputable fact, that taking the whole United States together, much more money is expended for the single article of cigars than for all the common schools in the Union.

The Niagara flag consists of two blue stripes with a white stripe between them, the latter twice as wide as the former. In the middle of the white stripe is to be a red star with five points.

The net amount in the U. S. Treasury, subject to draft, is upwards of $24,000,000, of which there is in New York $11,750,000, in Boston $3,000,000, and in Charlotte, North Carolina, over $1,750,000.

Our Cincinnati friends, we see, are following the example of their Eastern brethren in the matter of opera houses. It is said that a magnificent structure is about to be erected forthwith in the Queen City of the West.

According to the report of the Committee of Emigration of New York city, immigration from Europe seems to be rapidly on the increase. 114,562 have already landed at that port the present year, and they now arrive at the rate of 3500 per week.

In 1752, an English ship stranded near Rochelle, Westchester county, N. Y. Such have been the changes in the sea that the wreck now lies in the midst of a cultivated field, thirteen feet above the sea, and around it are 2000 acres of cultivated land.

The inhabitants of Springfield, Mass., recently saw a meteor. It lighted up the town for the moment like the sun, and so that shadows were strongly cast. Its nucleus was red as fire, while its tail spread out dimmer and whiter. It was a startling sight to the beholder.

Recently, upwards of one hundred bakers of Madrid waited on the Constitutional alcaides to represent that they would be obliged to raise the price of bread. The civil governor, considering this act a coalition, caused seven of the more influential bakers to be arrested, and ordered for trial.

There is now residing in Trenton, N. J., an old gentleman, of French origin, named Peter Vanscyver, aged ninety-nine years, who served in the army of the revolution under Washington, cast his first vote for the illustrious hero, and has ever since sustained the democratic party. Long may he live.

The oldest church in Philadelphia is the Gloria Dei, which was erected in 1700 on the same site as its predecessor, which was built of logs, and served the double purpose of a place of worship and a defence against the Indians. Christ Church is where Washington and Franklin worshipped. It was also at first a log building. The present edifice was finished in 1753.

According to a statistical work lately published on the consumption of Paris, the quantity of tobacco consumed in smoking in 1854, was nearly double that of 1849, and that of cigars five times as much; whilst that of snuff, on the contrary, presented a marked diminution. It is calculated that the number of smokers in Paris, including the garrison, is about 420,000.

The New York Express says the failure in silk worms in France, the inundations about Lyons, etc., have made silks and robes enormously dear this year for our fashionable ladies—but, nevertheless, they buy and groan, and groan and buy, about as freely as ever. Nothing less than $40 can bring out of the shops anything like a fashionable robe—but about as many as ever are sold.

It has been officially announced in Great Britain that the mammoth steamship Great Eastern will be launched about the middle of April next. Her first trip will be to Portland, where ample wharves are building for her accommodation. Portland cannot reap a harvest out of an event which will attract thousands of people thither to witness the astonishing proportions of this levitating steamer.

At the state prison, New Jersey, Isaac Fuller, a convict, recently tried to break out. It was at once determined to iron and confine him in the dungeon; but on attempting to do so, he was found armed with a sharp knife, with which he threatened to kill any one who attempted to enter. It was finally found necessary to shoot him, and one of the keepers shot and wounded him in the hands. He then surrendered, and was taken to the dungeon and chained fast.

In the city of London, one of the conditions of a license to keep a tavern is, that the keeper shall, without pay, cook and salt a piece of meat for any person desiring it done. Any particular individual can step into a butcher's, pick out his steak, and see it cooked. The only reward of the publican for his fire, labor, and salt, is the chance of selling a glass of "all and 'alt" of ale to the beef-eater. The gratuitous part of the operation has been provided for by law for hundreds of years.

Clara Schumann, the distinguished pianist, during her late visit to England, was invited to a very fashionable London house, and, being requested to play, seated herself for the purpose. Amid loud talking, she began simply to prelude, thinking to command attention; but vainly; the noise kept on. "Ladies and gentlemen," said she, "if my performance annoys you, pray tell me—I am ready to stop." Silence ensued. They listened and applauded; otherwise, they would doubtless have applauded without listening.

The St. Lawrence American of Ogdensburg, says: "The largest sheep we ever saw was on board the steamer Northerner, on her passage from Kingston to this port. He was two years old, and weighed three hundred and fifteen pounds. He was an imported sheep, and was exhibited at the Provincial Fair at Kingston. A gentleman from Vermont had purchased him, and was taking him home. The price paid was $315—a dollar a pound for mutton! What think ye of that, farmers of St. Lawrence? He was as large as a steer."

Foreign Items.

It is said that during the past three years, there have been eaten by the poor of Vienna 725 horses.

A comparison of the figures of the last return of the Bank of England shows a decrease in the bullion of nearly £380,000, instead of the enormous increase stated by the European Times in its money article.

Two well known but long lost portraits have just turned up in England—that of Milton, by Faithorne, and that of Derden, by Kneller,—both are in the collection of a country gentleman in Hertfordshire.

The Univers confirms the intelligence given some days ago to the effect that the Sultan has presented to the Emperor of the French the sanctuary and church of St. Anne, held by the Turks since the capture of Jerusalem by Sultan Saladin.

A monster gun is being made at the Jersey steel and iron works at Liverpool. The barrel will be 15 feet long, 27 inches in diameter at the muzzle, and 41 inches at the breach. It will have a bore of 13 inches, and will carry a shot of 302 pounds.

The Shah of Persia has just founded a military college, for the instruction of young officers. The instruction consists of mathematics, drawing of plans, the principles of the military art, and the French language; for, strange to say, all the words of command are given in French.

A terrible accident recently occurred in London. The Rev. Mr. Spurgeon, Baptist preacher, was speaking in Concert Hall, Surrey Gardens, when some thieves raised the cry of fire, causing the audience to rush towards the doors, and several persons were trampled to death.

Sands of Gold.

.... It is not by concealing what is wrong, that anything right can be accomplished.—London.

.... The only amaranthine flower on earth is virtue: the only lasting treasure, truth.—Courier.

Music is the child of prayer, the companion of religion.—Chateaubriand.

.... The imagination of men is often the refuge of their prejudices.—Talleyrand.

.... The exaltation of talent, as it is called, above virtue and religion, is the curse of the age.—Channing.

.... The wave of prosperity had risen up to his very lips, and its ripples were forever breaking there in a succession of easy smiles.—Miss Warner.

.... Paradox is dear to most people; it bears the appearance of originality, but is usually the talent of the superficial, the perverse, and the obstinate.—London.

.... Amongst the instrumentalities of love and peace, surely there can be no sweeter, softer, more effective voice than that of gentle, peace-breathing music.—Eliza Barrett.

.... To cure us of our immoderate love of gain, we should seriously consider how many goods there are that money will not purchase, and these the best; and how many evils there are that money will not remedy, and these the worst.—Colton.

.... Every human feeling is greater and larger than the exciting cause, a proof that man is designed for a higher state of existence; and this is deeply implied in music, in which there is always something more and beyond the immediate expression.—Coleridge.

Joker's Budget.

The most potent labor-saving machine is a large fortune left by your aunt.

An old bachelor's latest.—Ladies wear corsets from instinct—a natural love of being squeezed.

A gentleman once asked a lady of his acquaintance, "What are you making, Miss Knapp?" "Knapp-sacks," was the reply.

Women will never be punctual. They scorn the "charms" that hang to a watch chain.—Punch.

Which causes as the most bother—the mails or the females? The latter keep us writing letters all the time, while the former never deliver them.

"What does your husband deal in, marm?" "He deals cards chiefly, sir." "Well, the devil will be apt to get him when the last trump is played."

Whatever we may think of woman's right to vote and legislate, there can be no disputing her right to bare arms, and the prettier the better and more irresistible. This is a right descended from Mother Eve.

Precautions.—"How is your husband this afternoon, Mrs. Spuigies?" "Why, the doctor says as how as, if he lives till the mornin', he shall have some hopes of him; but if he don't, he must give him up."

The Boston Chronicle corrects the following amusing typographical blunder:—"We tried yesterday to say that christendom had den'd pants, and all that sort of thing, to woman. The types made us say deared. Perhaps the types were right."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it emphatically a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the maximum size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS:—INVARIABLELY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the twelfth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU.

WHOLESALE AGENTS:—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Wiche, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roys, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Buch, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

THE BULL FIGHT AT BAYONNE, FRANCE.

[For description, see page 381.]

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. { VOL. XI., No. 25 — WHOLE No. 285.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

STATE OF OHIO.

The emblematic picture on this page was drawn for us by Billings, and engraved by Jehu Andrew. In the upper part of the design appear the State arms, representing the sun rising on the Ohio River, an ark floating down with the tide, and wheat sheaves in front, surmounted by the Phrygian cap, with the motto, "Liberty." On the right is an armed figure of Minerva, together with a steam engine, etc., below which a group of cattle indicate one of the leading pursuits of the State. To the left of the State arms, we see the figure of a female teaching a child to read, typifying education, a view of the observatory and the famous telescope, a palette and chisel representing art, etc. A beautiful vintage scene and the ornamental branches of grapes remind us that the culture of the grape is an important business in this State. Ohio is bounded north by Michigan and Lake Erie, east by Pennsylvania and Virginia, south by Virginia and Kentucky, from which it is separated by the Ohio River, and west by Indiana. It has an area of about 39,964 square miles, or 25,576,960 acres. April 7, 1788, a company of New Englanders made the first white settlement at Marietta. The Indians were troublesome, until their utter rout by General Wayne, in August, 1794. In the war of 1812, Major Croghan, a young man of twenty-one, with 160 men, successfully defended Fort Sandusky in this State against an attack by General Proctor, with 500 British regulars and as many Indians. There are no mountains in Ohio, though portions of the State are quite elevated. There is abundance of coal and iron, the former being found in twenty counties. Besides the Ohio, the Muskingum, Scioto, Miami, Maumee and Sandusky are considerable streams. The climate is temperate and the soil fertile, amply rewarding the labors of the agriculturist. By the assessment of 1853, Ohio had 3,733,169 sheep, 2,341,502 hogs, 1,506,563 cattle, and 574,844 horses. In the preceding year, there were, in the vicinity of Cincinnati, 1200 acres of grapes under cultivation, producing 500,000 gallons of wine, and this production has been largely increased since. There is quite a variety of forest trees in the State. Though manufactures are in their infancy, yet, in 1850, there were 10,622 establishments in the State, each yielding upwards of $500. In January, 1855, there were 2997 miles of railroad completed, and 1631 in the course of construction. There are altogether 921 miles of canal in the State. The lake and river trade of Ohio is very great. The aggregate trade of all the ports is between 130 and 140 millions of dollars. The curing of pork and the manufacture of lard oil form a great business in the State. In 1852-53, the number of hogs packed was 603,152. In the cause of education, Ohio takes a front rank among the States. In 1854, the total amount appropriated by the State for school purposes was $2,266,457. In the same year, Ohio had 12 colleges with 674 students, seven theological schools, and four medical schools. Ohio ranks third among the States in population. In 1850, it amounted to 1,980,329. The assessed value of property in the State, in 1853, was $759,381,366. It is an empire in itself.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MABEL, THE RECTOR'S WARD:

—OR—

TRUTH AND TREASON IN 1777.

BY MAJOR BEN: PERLEY POOR.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XVII.

CRIME'S LAST CHAPTER.

"So do the dark in soul expire,
Or live like scorpions girt by fire;
So writhes the mind remorse has given,
Unfit for earth, undoomed for heaven—
Darkness above, despair beneath,
Around it flame, within it death!"

THE continental force had reached the parish of St. Mary's, within about three days' march of Quebec, when Herbert Yancey, accompanied by a dozen of the Rifles, went forward with orders to reconnoitre, and, if possible, to select a suitable place for crossing the St. Lawrence. Such were the instructions of Colonel Arnold; and although Morgan remonstrated strongly against risking an officer and party of men so far in advance of the main body, Herbert never felt prouder than when he started. The field was open for individual distinction, and he felt that he might signalize himself in such a manner as to regain the position which he was too well aware his intimacy at the rector's had injured. True, he had received no insult, but it was evident that Ordway had prejudiced many against him, and he longed for an opportunity to clear all tarnish from his escutcheon by some signal service to the cause of independence.

Passing quickly onward, they arrived at night at a small hamlet, where Herbert's instructions ordered him to stop. The appearance of the man who kept the small tavern was not at all prepossessing, and he refused to let them sleep in the house, which he said was full; they could pass the night in the stable-loft, however, if they paid for their lodgings in advance. This offer was accepted, though when the hour for retiring arrived, the host told Herbert that he had a room for him.

"Not I," replied the young officer; "I prefer to go with my men," and so accompanied them up into the stable-loft, where there was a large mew of clean straw—a luxurious couch to the travel-worn soldiers. One by one they sank into the light and watchful slumber of men accustomed to snatch their repose when they can obtain it, but Herbert found it impossible to follow their example. Did he close his eyes, he soon found them open. Did he endeavor to count a thousand, he never could get higher than fifty. Now his thoughts would wander back to the scenes and faces of his Virginia home, and then he would think of Newburyport Mabel—was she true to him? Would the love-chain which bound their hearts ever be riveted by the holiest of religious sacraments? Had her father yielded to the voice of the people and changed his allegiance? But soon after midnight, though he knew it not, slumber touched him with her wand, and thoughts were exchanged for dreams.

At first, these wild dreams were of an undefinable and fantastic nature, but ere long they assumed a more definite shape. He dreamed that he was an English officer, with many who loved him, and whom he loved at home. Then he was sent on a mission to meet a traitor, who would sell his country's liberties for gold. They met, and the traitor's countenance seemed familiar, and they called the perjured wretch Benedict Arnold. He surely had seen that man before, but could not (ever dreaming) remember where. The compact was made, and he set out to return, rejoiced that he was through with his detested mission. But no. He was captured by three rebels, who refused to let him escape. He was imprisoned, tried, sentenced, and about to be shot. The word was given—"fire!"

Struggling in a convulsive nightmare, Herbert sprang to his feet. It was but a dream, yet the noise of muskets rang in his ears, and he found a combat raging around him. The Riflemen, with shouts of rage, were dealing blows with the butt-ends of their rifles upon thrice their number of assailants, some of whom were firing pistols almost in the very faces of those who refused to surrender. Drawing his sword, and shouting, "Washington and liberty!" Herbert leaped into the dark tide of conflict. Encouraged by his example, his men fought like demons, although their assailants were recruited from below. One by one the determined hand fell, and at last Herbert, knocked down by the heavy butt of a musket, staggered backwards, and was caught at the moment when consciousness was fast leaving him.

When he came to himself, he found that he was lying on a pile of straw out of doors, while two officers were hating his temples with cold water. Faint and exhausted, he was lost to all thought of the past or future, and gazed vacantly around upon the sad scene, dimly visible by the clear light of a full moon. On every hand were the dead, the dying, or the wounded.

"You made a gallant defence, sir," said Colonel Dupre—for he was the commander of the detachment sent out expressly to surprise Herbert, whose coming had been projected between Arnold and Holbrook.

But Herbert heard him not. The blow which had felled him brought on a slight concussion of the brain, and he was carried on a litter to Quebec, while the other prisoners were securely guarded. Not a single Rifleman lost his life, but over twenty of the royal forces never answered to their names again at roll-call. Colonel Dupre had several long conversations with the prisoners as they marched along, and his report to the governor embodied such a train of evidence that a warrant was forthwith made out, ordering the arrest of Dan Holbrook.

Early the next morning, before the last notes of the reveille had died away, a court-martial was held at the castle, and not only the great hall, but every avenue leading to it, was crowded with spectators. Any court sitting in judgment on a fellow mortal is imposing, but none have the power so completely as those held under "law martial." Respectfully did the dense crowd open to let the officers comprising the tribunal pass to their seats, and then all was quiet as the grave. Those officers, it was well known, were to try a fellow mortal for a heinous crime, and if guilty, they would take away that which they could not give.

"Bring the prisoner before the court," said the presiding officer. All looked towards a small door, behind the table around which the court sat, and soon Holbrook appeared, walking between his guards with an air of mingled confidence and defiance.

"Let the accusation be read," said the presiding officer. "Stay," said Holbrook, his scar gleaming like fire across his pale cheek. "I wish this court to examine this pass, signed by Lord Howe, which permits me to hold communication with the rebels, if I think I can thereby advance his majesty's interests."

As he spoke, his keen eyes glanced anxiously from one to the other of the court, for his indomitable villany had before then exasperated him from worse positions. But he could discover no ground for hope in the unrelenting countenances before him.

"The prisoner's defence can be heard at the proper time," coolly remarked the presiding officer. "He will now be silent, and the judge advocate will read the accusation."

It was a lengthy document, upon which Colonel Dupre, who had volunteered to act as judge advocate, had worked all night. At first, Holbrook's eyes flashed angry defiance, but as he went on with charge upon charge, they lost all expression. Craven terror contended with rage on his hideous features, but before the document was read, he sat spell-bound, in the stupefaction of silent terror.

"And having preferred these charges," concluded the judge advocate, "I do offer to prove them, and ask that the prisoner be put upon his trial for high treason."

The sound of Colonel Dupre's voice appeared to rouse Holbrook from his apathy; and when the presiding officer asked: "Prisoner, are you guilty or not guilty?" he replied:

"Not guilty; and I object to the jurisdiction of this court." So resolute and unflinching was his bearing that many of the spectators began to think him innocent. But the ghastly paleness of his cheek flushed for a moment into burning crimson, when he heard the judge advocate say:

"Provost marshal, call Job Carr." Yes—inflamed with rage, and stimulated by a large reward, the old miser came to testify all he knew about his old comrade in crime. In vain did the dismayed culprit attempt to stop him, for the court ordered the provost marshal to apply a gag if silence was not preserved, and so the long catalogue of crime was presented, showing up the prisoner in the worst possible light. A bundle of letters from him, written the day previous, and obtained from the messenger, whose canoe was waylaid, corroborated the old miser's statement, while the testimony of the captured Riflemen confirmed the already unquestionable evidence of guilt.

Had it not been so, the very appearance of Holbrook would have convicted him. Fioding that opposition was useless, he listened in despair to the catalogue of crime, and as his black, double-dyed treachery was exposed, he gnawed his finger-ends in anguish until the blood streamed from them.

At last the witnesses for the prosecution had all been examined, and the prisoner was asked if he had any rebutting testimony.

"No!" was his almost mechanical answer, for he knew not a living soul in Quebec who could speak well of him.

Then the judge advocate, in eloquent tones, depicted the baseness of his treachery, urging his conviction. It was labor lost, for their minds were made up. How could the court have any doubts?

"Does the prisoner wish to offer any defence?" "No."

Without leaving their seats, or even having the hall cleared, the court gave a unanimous verdict of "Guilty." The prisoner heard it unmoved, but when a murmur of applause arose from the spectators, he gave such a glance of malignant hatred that it was remembered by many to their dying days.

In view of the fact that the enemy was close at hand, and an example necessary, the presiding officer now pronounced the awful sentence, to be executed that very afternoon. "And may God have mercy on your soul!" was a conclusion to which many a one present responded "Amen!" Of all those present, not one went out thinking that justice had been wrought.

Holbrook was led to the guard-room, where a close watch was kept on him, and a clergyman was sent for. But the condemned man refused to see him, begging piteously for an interview with the governor, that he might make important revelations. Finding that this prayer was not granted, he endeavored to bribe his guards, promising them large sums in the frenzy of his despair if they would suffer him to escape. But all was of no avail. The hour arrived; and when the provost marshal and his guard appeared to convey him to the place of execution, he had sunk from pusillanimous fear to the apathy of despair.

It was a beautiful autumnal afternoon as the wretched criminal was brought forth, his hands tied behind his back, and escorted by a strong guard to a temporary gallows which had been erected at the spot where he had been seen to hold communication with the enemy. Every spot which commanded a view of the fatal rope was crowded, and when the procession appeared, it was greeted with a murmur of approbation, sounding like the sullen craving for human life with which the storm-king dashes the tempest-tossed bark against a rocky coast. The sullen attitude of the prisoner, who actually refused to speak to a clergyman on the scaffold, added to the general indignation, and execrations could but reach his ear.

But when all chances of hope were shut out by the drawing down of the hangman's cap, then the helpless victim called for "mercy!" in piteous tones. It was too late for repentance then. Fearful cries spoke the agony of his soul; a shriek rang out like a demon's welcome, and then a senseless mass of humanity, fluttering in the breeze, was all that remained of the traitor.

Somehow, news of the trial of his tool reached Colonel Arnold, and on the day that his army crossed the river, he sent a flag of truce to Governor Carlton, thanking him for having executed one who had—as he worded it—"deceived them both."

"He deceived me," said Colonel MacLean, when the governor read him this hypocritical message; "but I think if we could hang all his accomplices, the rebel force would lack a commander."

"Nay—nay," replied the governor. "We could not hang any one who may yet be of service to the crown. Indeed, I should try what influence a bag of gold would have on him now, if I did not know that Montgomery has arrived and taken command."

"Have you heard that the principal witness against this fellow Holbrook, when he was tried, died himself that afternoon?" asked Colonel MacLean. "I have just learned the particulars."

"What were they, pray?"

"Why, it seems that he had promised to give Dupre some information about Madame de Frontenac's long missing husband and child, but refused to say a word while Holbrook lived. So about an hour after the execution, the colonel went to the old man's house. It was barred up, but an old hag who kept it for him, and who was delighted at the justice done Holbrook, found a way in. As they opened a door leading to the kitchen, they saw, to their horror, old Carr lying on the hearth, with the blood trickling from a wound in his temple, caused by falling against a sharp-cornered andiron, as he stooped to light a candle. The colonel raised him up, but the last traces of life were extinct."

"Poor old fellow!" said the governor; "he has joined his old comrade in crime, and the betrayer scarcely outlived the betrayed."

"There is some mystery about the cause of their quarrel," said Colonel MacLean, "and I believe that again Madame de Frontenac has lost track of her husband and child."

"She deserves to find them," replied the governor, "for she has taken the entire charge of the hospitals. Already she and her Indian girls nurse the sick of the garrison and the prisoners taken yesterday, and they have volunteered for the siege."

"Noble creatures!" exclaimed the gallant MacLean. "Such is not the prudish philanthropy of some women, but it is emphatically that 'loving kindness' which has made the name of Mary immortal."

CHAPTER XVIII.

CARRIED, BUT NOT CAPTURED.

"The bursting shell, the gateway wrenched asunder,
The rattling musketry, the clashing blade,
And ever and anon, in tones of thunder,
The diapason of the cannonade."

FORTUNATE was it for Herbert Yancey that, on reaching the hospital at Quebec, Madame de Frontenac superintended in person the dressing of his wound; for while unloosing his cambric neckcloth, she discovered—fresh beacon-light of hope—the gold cross given him by Mabel Gwynne. How she longed to learn how it came where she now gazed upon it! and when she ascertained that the wearer would not be free from delirium for some days, it was with difficulty that she restrained her impatience. Although Herbert was in reality a prisoner, taken in arms against his sovereign, yet such was the sympathy excited by his ensnarement by the agency of Holbrook, that the governor granted her request that he might be removed to the castle, and placed in one of the rooms now appropriated to her.

There, aided by Estelle, she watched the stranger with jealous care, and ere many days, his toilsome restlessness subsided into an incoherent half-consciousness. The seventh day came, and he settled by degrees into a torpid lethargy, that left him in the semblance of a deep sleep without its refreshing calm. From this he awoke. Nay—did he not still dream? He had fancied himself on the battle-field, and he found himself in a large apartment, fitted up in splendid style, although everything had a look of mouldering decay. Richly gilded cornices surrounded the walls; the mantel-piece, of white marble, was curiously carved; old portraits hung in tarnished frames, and heavy curtains of faded damask hung over the windows, almost excluding the light of day.

Neither was he alone, for by his side sat Estelle, her fine eyes bent upon some head-work which she was making for a friend. Never, to him, had a mortal appeared so lovely, and at last he said, in a faint voice:

"Where am I?" "Hush!" said Estelle, raising her finger to her lips. "The young warrior is not to speak until his wound is healed. But he is among friends."

Herbert said no more, but crowds of memories danced across his brain. At length his ideas began slowly to crystallize, and he remembered his capture.

"I am a prisoner?" he asked. "You are among friends," replied a voice, the tones of which he at first thought were those of Mabel Gwynne. But when he saw the speaker, he found that she was much farther advanced on life's journey. It was Madame de Frontenac.

"Thanks—thanks!" whispered the invalid, and again he sank into partial insensibility. But when he next awoke to consciousness, he was able to tell his story, and to ascertain where he was. His kind nurses wrote to his mother, and when they left him at sunset, he felt that he was indeed among kind friends. An old veteran attended to his wants, brought him news from his comrades in the hospital, and he slept calmly and quietly.

The next morning, after the visit of the surgeon, Herbert obtained ink and paper from the veteran, that he might write to Mabel Gwynne. As may be imagined, he had much to say, so that when Madame de Frontenac came to see him, four closely-written sheets lay on the bed. Bringing his missive to a conclusion, he folded it, and directed it.

"Can this be sent to Boston by the first courier?" he asked.

"I will try and send it," replied Madame de Frontenac; "but who, pray, is this Miss Mabel Gwynne?"

"The ward of the Episcopal rector at Newburyport," replied Herbert, his pale cheeks lighting up.

"Ah! I see that she would be the one to minister to your wants just now," said Madame de Frontenac, with a smile.

Herbert did not reply, but it was evident that he was of the same opinion. Just then the distant sound of martial music was heard, and it was answered by drums beating "to arms" throughout the city. Then arose three loud shouts, and soon the streets were filled with troops, marching in various directions.

"What does this mean?" inquired Herbert, of the old veteran, who soon after entered.

"Mean, sir? Why, it seems that your Colonel Arnold either wishes to sell his men or to frighten us, for he has just paraded them in a line outside the walls. His music played, his troops gave three cheers, then the music played again. We all expected an attack, and hurried to the different posts, but, lo and behold! when the tune had been played out, he wheeled his men into platoons, and away they went to their camp. What it all meant, I do not know."

Neither Herbert Yancey nor Madame de Frontenac could conjecture. After some conversation, she inquired:

"Did you ever see a gentleman bearing my name in the provinces?"

"No," replied Herbert.

"Or a lady?" she went on to ask, looking at him earnestly and with hope.

"No. Indeed I do not know that I have ever been fortunate enough to know any French lady."

"You speak the language, though?"

"Yes—I acquired that from my tutor at Cambridge."

Again the sad-hearted mother felt that her exertions were fruitless, and that disappointment was her lot. Bidding Herbert good-day, she retired, nor did he thenceforth see her more than once a week.

As Herbert recovered, he wished to take exercise, and spoke of going out, but the veteran informed him that this was forbidden.

"You are in my custody," said he, "but I am ordered to permit you to go out upon parole, that you will not leave the city, or bear arms again against your lawful sovereign."

"Nay," replied Herbert; "that is asking too much." And he resolved to himself that he would consent to neither proposition. Besides, the weather was very cold, and he was yet feeble. Sometimes, when he heard the batteries of the besiegers, or saw at night their bombs bursting high in air, he would wish for liberty, that he might combat with his old comrades. But there appeared but little chance for him, and his attendant, who was not at all disposed to converse, could give him no information as to the progress made by the besiegers. It was a dreary phase in his life, upon which he never looked back with any degree of satisfaction, although he was afterwards informed that had it not been for the warm intercession of Colonel Dupre, he might have met the fate of a spy.

One bitter cold night—it was the 31st of December—there was another general alarm. The court-yard of the castle was filled with adjutants and orderlies, waiting to receive orders, and it was evident that an attack was expected. One by one they left, though occasionally some would return for fresh instructions, and Herbert could scarcely persuade himself that any attempt would be made, for the snow fell fast, rendering it impossible to see many feet off.

But about four o'clock in the morning, a discharge of rockets at four different points showed that the enemy was in earnest, although it afterwards appeared that two of the storming parties were only instructed to make "feints," in order to divert attention from the two attacks. Another moment, and a fire was opened from all the batteries on the advancing columns, the drums of which, beating the charge, made Herbert almost frantic. "Why am I not there, with Morgan and my comrades," was his involuntary exclamation, "to fight or fall for liberty?"

"The young warrior can go, if he wishes," said a musical voice at his side. "The doors are open, and it is not well for the eagle to remain caged when the war-clouds look dim."

Herbert did not need a second invitation. "Thanks," he replied; then seizing his sword, which Colonel Dupre had brought to his room, he sallied into the street. There everything was confusion, while the thickly-falling snow soon enveloped Herbert with a fleecy coat not to be distinguished from that of the British.

Guided by the noise of musketry, Herbert found his way to the lower town, where the cracking rifles and ringing war-whoops told him that Morgan was within the walls. Soon he came in sight of the fray, where the Highlanders, under MacLean, were disputing a narrow street, inch by inch. Pressing forward, and not above thirty yards from them, were the Virginians, the fire of their rifles flashing through the snow storm, while Morgan was urging them on.

Just then, along came a field-piece, and Herbert saw that it was to be "masked" in an old building, while the Highlanders were to retreat past it, when they had cleared its range, it was to rake the advancing column.

Could he not give warning? Every one was covered with snow; every one was intent upon the work of carnage, and it was not yet sunrise. So it was not to be wondered at that Herbert slipped gradually through the Highlanders, who either did not observe him, or thought him a staff officer of the garrison.

But he was too late. Scarcely had he worked his way to the head of the retreating column, when the gunner applied his match, and the priming blazed. Herbert threw himself to the ground, almost beneath the window from which the muzzle of the piece protruded. There was an explosion, but by some providential chance, the piece had been over-elevated, and the Ruffles dashed on, unharmed, beneath the iron rain.

"For'd, boys,—for'd!" shouted Morgan; and ere Herbert was on his feet again, the gallant Virginians had dashed past, as if confident of victory.

Herbert was about to follow them, when his attention was arrested by a groan from a wounded man, wearing the continental uniform, who lay in the centre of the street.

"Can I help you, friend?" asked Herbert, kneeling, and raising up the sufferer's head.

Raising his hand to his forehead, the wounded man wiped away the blood with the cuff of his coat, then sprang to his feet, exclaiming:

"It was a narrow escape, and close quarters for a musket ball, but I believe it has only grazed the skin. But—"

He started back, for it had been reported at camp that Herbert Yancey was killed.

"Is that you, Mr. Yancey?" he asked.

"Why, Ordway!" exclaimed Yancey.

"Yes. Who would have thought that when I last night told Major Morgan how I had wronged you, who I believed was dead and gone, that I should see you, and see you here?"

Just then, along came a man wearing the continental artillery uniform, shouting: "Montgomery is killed, and Arnold is wounded! The orders are to retreat!"

On he went, but ere he had gone a hundred yards, he was stopped by a company of Canadians, who had been marched around to flank the Rifles.

"This way—this way!" said Herbert Yancey, seizing Ordway by the arm, and hastening up the hill.

It was evident, however, that the engagement was over, as only a few straggling shots were heard, and the idea occurred to Herbert that it might be advisable to return to the place from whence he had started. Luckily for him and his companion, the troops were all engaged in repulsing the enemy; there was not even a sentry to oppose them.

Entering his room suddenly, Herbert started, for there, upon her knees, was Estelle.

"Ah!" she cried, springing to her feet. "Are these British tyrants conquered?"

"I fear not," mournfully replied Herbert. "Had we not good reason to believe that the case was hopeless, you would not see us here."

"But your companion is wounded," said the noble-hearted girl. "Let me bring Madame de Frontenac." She turned towards the door, but then stopped to say: "Of course, Mr. Yancey, you will not let any one know how you found your door open?"

"Never fear," replied Herbert; and she disappeared.

"What lovely creature is that?" asked Ordway. But ere he could hear Herbert's reply, he fell back upon the bed near which he stood, faint from the loss of blood, which continued to stream from his wound.

While Herbert was endeavoring to restore him, the door was slowly opened, and Estelle came in, attended by a domestic.

"Is it here," she inquired, with apparent ignorance, "that there is a wounded man? Madame de Frontenac cannot leave, and has sent me to do the best I can. Ah! he has fainted. Get some water, Jacqueline."

Bathing Ordway's forehead with cold water, soon restored him to consciousness, and on opening his eyes, he gazed up with a look of vacant inquiry into the beautiful face that was bending over him. Then, as his recollection returned, he began to stammer thanks.

"Nay, sir," said Estelle; "you must be quiet." Taking her scissors, she clipped the hair from the wounded temple, and having washed away the clotted blood, dressed it in a style that would have done honor to a veteran practitioner. "There," she at last remarked; "the wounded warrior must now remain still for a few days, and he will be ready to serve his country again. Good-morning."

"Ah, Yancey," exclaimed Ordway, as she tripped from the room, "you are a lucky fellow!"

"What—to be cooped up here?"

"Yes—with an angel to attend on you. Never did I expect to see any one whose charms rivalled those of Mabel Gwynne, but—"

"You have not seen one yet, surely?" interrupted Herbert.

"What—do you not give this lovely sargeon the preference?" eagerly inquired Ordway.

"Not I. There is no one on earth, Frank Ordway, who, in my estimation, is equal either in point of beauty, accomplishments or heart to your rector's ward."

"And your devotion for her is not transferred?"

"To Estelle? Not a particle of it. She has been kind to me in my captivity, but my love for her is that of a brother for a sister."

"Think God!" fervently exclaimed Ordway. Nor was it long before both of them, weary with the fatigues of the night, fell asleep.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

NO ENTERTAINMENT IS SO CHEAP AS READING. NOR IS ANY PLEASURE SO LASTING.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION

IS AN ELEGANT MISCELLANEOUS FAMILY JOURNAL.

On the first of January we shall commence VOLUME XII. of our favorite journal. It is now the most popular weekly paper in America, a reputation which it has enjoyed for nearly eleven years!—circulating at the present time more than any other miscellaneous weekly journal in the country, with the exception of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL. It is devoted to polite literature, and it embraces written expressly for the paper by the most popular writers of the country. It is also spiced with a record of the notable events of the time, of peace and war, of discoveries, and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, with a record of all that is new and noteworthy, forming an intelligent and instructive companion. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral, discussing, neither directly nor indirectly, the tenets of any sect or clique; therefore making it emphatically

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, STORIES OF THE SEA, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR, AND NOVELETTES,

A PAPER FOR THE MILLION,

and a welcome visitor to the home circle, north or south, east or west. It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to possess the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of THE MAMMOTH SIZE, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming, in all its departments,

AN ORIGINAL PAPER,

embracing among its regular contributors over forty well-known and popular names.

The FLAG is printed on fine white paper, with new, clear and beautiful type, and contains 1240 square inches, being a large weekly paper of eight super-royal quarto pages, and is filled to the brim each week with choice, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Few papers can compete with "The Flag of our Union" as it regards its originality, numbering, as it does, among its contributors a large list of the best names, while its matter is always concise and entertaining.—Daily Era, Boston.

Carefully printed upon fine white paper, and filled with original matter from beginning to end, "The Flag of our Union" merits the extraordinary popularity which it has enjoyed for ten consecutive years.—Ladies' Repository.

The best of the Boston weeklies.—Arkansas Herald.

Go where you will, from Maine to California, you are sure to see "The Flag of our Union," in nearly every family circle. Mr. Ballou evinces great taste and liberality in the publication of this charming weekly.—Burlington (Vt.) Sentinel.

Parents need not fear to place this charming weekly journal in the hands of their children. It contains all vulgarisms, and its tone is moral and refined. As long as bright eyes love to read delightful stories, it will continue to enjoy the extraordinary circulation which it has attained to.—Tribune.

Justly unrivalled in circulation, "The Flag of our Union" presents its immense list of subscribers with choice original matter, which they can obtain nowhere else. The best writers are engaged upon the paper.—Daily (Phila.) Ledger.

A Boston weekly journal, long and well established, beautifully printed on very fine paper, and filled with choice reading for the friends. Without coming in the sphere of a teacher, it inculcates a large amount of information, and cultivates in the young a love for reading.—National Intelligencer.

"The Flag of our Union" is a choice paper, and merits all the many good things said about it. It is entirely original, and numbers among its contributors many of our best writers, both male and female. It is a treat to see so handsomely printed a paper—clear, bright, and fresh in every line.—New Orleans Delta.

There are few miscellaneous papers so widely known, or so deserving of the popularity they enjoy, as "The Flag of our Union." It is cheerful, entertaining, beautifully printed, and choice in all respects, it is a companion for the home circle.—Richmond Waig.

Mr. Ballou furnishes his elegant illustrated weekly, "Ballou's Pictorial," and "The Flag of our Union," together, for $4 a year. These two papers will render any domestic fire-side cheerful all winter long.—Ohio Sentinel.

No paper upon our exchange list is so eagerly sought for by our family as "The Flag of our Union." It should be a weekly visitor to every American fire-side; for it is eminently a delightful family paper, combining an unusual amount of pleasant original miscellany, with all that is noteworthy in the current events of the day.—Lone Star, Texas.

"The Flag of our Union," in its wide spread circulation, penetrates the log cabin of the far West, and the stately mansions of our Atlantic cities. It is the pioneer of the miscellaneous weeklies; and ten years of successful enterprise has only served to improve and perfect it, until there is nothing left to desire.—Lynn Bay State.

The pioneer among the miscellaneous weekly press, "The Flag of our Union" has proved the most popular and successful. After ten years of profitable existence, it is now more pleasing and attractive than ever.—Quincy (Mass.) Patriot.

A charming weekly visitor to the home circle is "The Flag of our Union"—choice, moral, and very instructive in each issue, and edited, not by a pair of scissors, but by an experienced and careful hand.—Charleston (S. C.) Mercury.

Catering for no clique or sect, it is a universal favorite.—Alabama Planter.

Mr. Ballou, the editor, has many years of editorial experience, and understands just how to make a paper that will please every body. Hence the vast circulation and popularity of "The Flag of our Union."—Barnstable Patriot.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together, $4 per annum.

☞ Sample copies sent by mail when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

EUROPEAN SCENES.

SERVIAN MINSTRELS.—We present on this page a very picturesque groups of Servian Minstrels, in their national costume, performing in an eastern coffee house. In the balcony, between which the two musicians are performing, sits a Greek with his pipe to his lips. A turbaned Turk and one or two Armenians are also seen in the gallery. The costume of the minstrels is almost identical with that of the Greeks,—the fez or cap with its long tassel, the gay jacket, the rich sash, the loose breeches and white petticoats. The instrument used is the "goosely," a sort of viol with a single string, and played upon by the bow. The melodies these people perform are sweet and plaintive, and their voices are rich and pleasing; so sad and tender, however, are their strains, that the listener is often painfully affected. At the present time, when the settlement of the Danubian principalities is a question mooted in almost every newspaper we take up, in its department of foreign intelligence, our readers cannot help feeling curious about so interesting a people as those who inhabit Servia. Even in a military point of view, the Servians are the reverse of contemptible. Their regular military force does not amount to more than 2000, but every male capable of bearing arms is enrolled in the militia, and they have thus the power, in case of emergency, of collecting no fewer than 40,000 fighting men. It is now about eleven centuries since the Servians, who belong to the wide-spread Slavonian stock, with which a great part of Eastern Europe is peopled, migrated from the Carpathian Mountains to the Danube; but it was not till the twelfth century that the petty states which they formed were united into a single feudal monarchy similar to those which, in the middle ages, existed all over Europe. This continued until 1389, when the Servians yielded to the conquering arms of the Turks. Centuries of submission followed, till a revolt was headed by Czerny-George, a native chief, who, in 1806, took Belgrade, and governed the province till the peace of 1814. At that period, Servia again submitted to the Porte; but next year, a new revolt, under Milosh Obrenowitsch, was successful; and he, after ruling Servia till 1839, owing, as is supposed, to the influence of Russia, was obliged to resign in favor of his son Michael. Being an agricultural country, not boasting of any seaport, and having no commercial class of its own, Servia's population consists principally of peasantry. Attired in coarse frieze jackets and boots, the Servians strike strangers as a remarkably tall and vigorous race of men, their forms indicating thorough physical strength, and their countenances much intellectual energy. The women are considered particularly attractive, having fine complexions, dark, glossy hair, and figures decidedly handsome. Their beauty, which they preserve for a considerable time, is set off by a peculiar head-dress. This consists of a Greek fez, from which is suspended a gold tassel, that contrasts with the black hair laid smoothly down the temple, and is well calculated to heighten the charms of the fair wearer. One ancient custom in which the gentler sex take part is worthy of mention. When a long drought has occurred, a young woman—of course one who is handsome—is so dressed up in grass, cabbage leaves, and flowers, that her face is all but invisible. Thus attired, and accompanied by several damsels of her own age, she goes from house to house, singing a song, of which a prayer for rain forms the burden. The mistress of the house throws a little water over her; and this superstitious ceremony, known as the "Dodola," inspires the natives with the hope of refreshing showers. Like the Russians a few generations back, the Servians, even at this date, are sufficiently ungallant to consider the women as somewhat inferior beings, only to be made use of as playthings in youth, and as curses in old age; but much more enlightened views have been adopted in Belgrade, and will doubtless spread, ere long, all over Servia. In some respects, the character of the Servian is thought to resemble that of the Scottish Highlander. Even the outlaws, who, at the beginning of this century, infested the forests that spread over the country, were so many Rob Roys in their way—rebels as well as robbers; and under the impression that in plundering rich Moslems, while displaying generosity to the poor, they were really doing nothing unjustifiable. Moreover, the Servians are like the Highlanders, brave in battle, hospitable to strangers, and fond of plaintive music. LYTHAM, ENGLAND.—The very striking and interesting picture on the next page is an excellent general view of Lytham, England, a picturesque old town and a place of great resort during the bathing season. It is in Lancaster County, on the coast of the Irish Sea, about five and a half miles west-south-west of Kirkham, with a station on the Preston and Wyre Railway, and contains a little over two thousand inhabitants. On the right is the principal street, with its long line of houses, many of stick, twistings of the "narrative," and similar mild persuasives. The numerous promenades on the level plain impart a liveliness to this seashore picture. In the distance, beyond the windmill, we have a glimpse of the Irish Sea, and of the canvass-covered bathing machines on the sands. These machines are covered carts on four wheels, drawn by a horse. The driver takes the machine out into deep water, wheels it round, and the ladies or gentlemen who change their bathing dresses inside, spring into the water from the rear of the vehicle. We are not aware that there are any of these machines in this country. It is said that the English, staid and stiff at almost all other times, unbend in their aquatic sports, and frolic about in the water like veritable mer-men and mermaids. Be that as it may, a trip to the seaside, in the warm season, is with them, as with us, an obligato episode in English fashionable life. THE ROYAL SURRY GARDENS, LONDON, ENGLAND.—We present on the next page a bird's eye view of the Surry Gardens, a favorite place of resort, which has recently been remodelled and decorated, and is now a delightful place. On the borders of the lake, which forms one of the most striking features of the scene, is erected a beautiful music hall which will hold 10,000 persons. Here excellent musical entertainments are given, at a price which secures large audiences. On these occasions, the hall is brilliantly lighted, and as well as all the surrounding gardens, producing, with the reflection of myriads of colored lights in the water, a picture of oriental magnificence. Although the building accommodates ten thousand persons, yet, from its peculiar construction, as many more can hear the music to perfection, protected from the weather by balconies, verandahs and galleries outside, and breathing an atmosphere as pure as they would enjoy in the garden. The grounds comprise about ten acres, and contain, as will be seen by reference to our engraving, many groves of heavy timber, but there are flower beds, undulating lawns, Italian terraces, adorned with statuary and pathways, through alleys of choice shrubs and plants. Many fine American shrubs and trees are acclimated here, and are regarded as great curiosities. There are Swiss chalets, grottoes, fountains, cascades and running streams, which, combined with the attractions of the well-known lake, form one of the most beautiful gardens in Europe ever adapted for open-air entertainments, not excepting the ancient Tivoli of Paris, and the celebrated Krolls Garden of Berlin. Last season, among the most attractive exhibitions, there was a splendid view of the city of Constantinople, the Bosphorus being represented with real water. It is said that the illusion was complete, and that even an Eastern traveller might for a moment be deluded into the belief that he was again standing on the shores of the Golden Horn. An accident occurred in these gardens, a few weeks since, which was attended with fatal circumstances, but which it is a wonder did not produce yet more serious results. A popular preacher, whose audiences had become so large that his own chapel them in the quaint old Elizabethan style of architecture, stretching away into the distance. A Gothic church rears its tall spire from the group of buildings. But perhaps the most picturesque object in the view is the huge windmill on the left, standing like a tall giant with expanded arms, soliciting the charge of some English Don Quixote mounted on a donkey. There are plenty of donkeys scattered over the wide level of the shore, for donkeys and English watering-places are inseparable—one is the complement of the other. Each donkey or group of donkeys is accompanied by a driver. They are easy saddle-beasts for the ladies, and, except when seized with one of those freaks of obstinacy, which quality is a liberal ingredient in donkey-nature, are quite passable substitutes for horses. The donkey-drivers have methods of their own for getting their animals along when they "stake," which is not an uncommon thing with them. These methods are more efficacious than humane, consisting in sundry applications of a sharp did not accommodate a tithe of them, engaged the new music hall for four successive Sunday evenings. On the first evening, a vast concourse, estimated at twenty thousand persons, assembled to hear him preach. The building has two or three tiers of galleries, galleries inside and balconies outside, and all sorts of devices for hearing, whether sitting or standing. On this occasion, fifteen thousand of the audience were jammed inside, and five thousand perched together on the exterior. Something, in the course of the evening, occurred to create an alarm, either a neighboring bell, or a cry of fire, or the suggestion that the roof was settling. The whole of that vast multitude, seized with an awful panic, poured tumultuously out of the building, rushing, screaming, trampling down one another, clogging the staircases, breaking the balustrades, tumbling over to the bottom, falling one upon another. By a merciful Providence, not six hundred, but only six were killed, and rather more seriously hurt.

SERVIAN MUSICIANS.

LYTHAM, ENGLAND.

SURRY GARDENS, LONDON.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE RUINED CASTLE.

BY JAMES F. FITTS.

Behind its walls the river steals
With slow and noiseless wave,
And drooping foliage conceals
The shores its waters lave:
Each broken roof and battlement
Is mirrored in the stream,
And beauty to the scene is lent
By th' setting sun's last beam.

The clinging ivy winds around
The moss-grown, crumbling walls,
With grass the turret tops are crowned,
And silent are the halls;
The moat with weeds is half concealed,
The drawbridge in decay:
While rusted sword and battered shield
Speak of some former fray.

And if the voices of the dead
Again could reach the ear,
Warriors from their earthly bed
Unto us could appear—
What fearful tales of knightly rage
Would from their grim lips flow!
Dark histories of feudal age,
And battles long ago.

But these are past—no longer here
Does knightly rule hold sway:
No warlike bands—no arms appear,
All strife has passed away.
These desolate and crumbling walls
Are all that now remain
Of tattered and gilded halls,
Where solemn owls now reign.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE ORPHAN'S FATE.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

FANNY LORRIMER! Bright, little, golden-tressed, blue-eyed Fanny Lorrimor! Who, that knew her in her childhood's innocent orphanage, could forget her?—forget the laugh and tones, all music and merriment, which cheered every one around her, while her frank, free, lovely face inspired many a youthful playmate with his first ideas of love? Yet Fanny was without parents, or brother or sister. Living with her father's brother, Caleb Lorrimor, a merchant "in good standing," having never known, to appreciate, the devotion of parental love, until she was sixteen, she knew little of care or sorrow; all her wants supplied, and friendship smiling upon her on every side.

Her mother had died when she was very young—so young that she could not remember that mother's face; and her father in a few years followed to the grave, leaving his only offspring in the care of his brother. Fanny was now growing into womanhood, and her uncle bethought him seriously of her future prospects. An orphan, and he her only guardian, she was quite as much an object of interest to him as was his son Arnold, a young man of some twenty years; and Lorrimor looked forward to the day when his son and his niece should be united in marriage.

But, unluckily for Caleb Lorrimor's plans, there was no similarity between the dispositions of the young twain. Fanny was of an open, generous, sympathizing nature, scorning all meanness, intrigue or artifice, while Arnold was the counterpart of his father—cold, designing and calculating. Fanny regarded him only as a cousin and household companion, but with aversion rather than preference, reserving her attachments for others of about her own age, more winning, genial and demonstrative than was he; and when they attended social gatherings, she avoided him as much as possible; feeling an instinctive repulsiveness towards him, she knew not exactly why. He was attentive, but frigid. His smile was like his father's—icy; and his manners, likewise, stiff and ceremonious.

Her sixteenth year came, and on her birthday Fanny was surprised at the disclosure of her uncle's wish and intention regarding her. At first, she treated his proposal with mirth.

"Why, uncle, ha, ha! What, marry Arnold? Marry my cousin? You are joking."

"You know I am not given to joking," he replied, with calm severity. It was true, he was not.

"But I never can think of such a thing. I must fall in love first, you know, uncle, then have a few quarrels, and then make up again, as lovers do, and all that, you know, first; and then, after making myself and him—whoever he may be—miserable for awhile, accept him romantically, and be married with all the ceremonies. That's the way I shall do, uncle. But as to marrying Arnold, that is out of the question entirely."

"But it is not, I tell you!" exclaimed he, with asperity, his dark eyes flashing with anger. "You must not oppose my will. Your father died leaving no property, and confided you to my care. It is he, you must consider, who speaks in me, and you must follow my direction."

"My father would never have urged me to marry against my will," replied Fanny, vehemently; "and I never shall, whatever comes of it!"

"So stubborn, Fanny," said Mr. Lorrimor, with a scowl and a sneer. "I suppose you are already fascinated with some young sprig of a fellow, with a pretty face. It will be labor thrown away, mark me. You shall never marry another, and you shall marry my son. Set your heart upon that, and think better of it."

And Mr. Lorrimor went angrily out of the room, surprised at this first show of resistance from his ward, and enraged that his first step towards the darling design of his heart was foiled. "The very spirit of her father," he muttered between his clenched teeth. "But I will accomplish it, or I will urge her to her ruin."

"So this house, I suppose, I must consider no longer my home," reflected Fanny, after he had gone. "I know his determined way. I despise Arnold; and as long as I remain I shall be subjected to insult and tyranny. This is a pleasant omen for a birthday. Perhaps it foretells what is to come. Which way shall I turn?"

A marked change was now observable in her uncle's demeanor, though Arnold, close-minded, and apparently indifferent to her, as usual, gave no intimation whether he knew what had passed. Mr. Lorrimor now no longer approached her with affected smiles, nor spoke to her in any way but harshly and abruptly. He was a man, as may be imagined, of no benevolence of heart, and from the time of her opposition to his will, he was continually reproaching her with a tendency to extravagance—in dress or otherwise—and utterly prohibiting her giving anything to the poor who came to the door for charity, an indulgence which he knew was one of her chief pleasures. Still, she disobeyed this injunction when she could without detection, and continued, as before, to be regarded by mendicants as the "angel of the house."

Finding so little enjoyment at home, she was impelled to seek it elsewhere, among her friends; and her absences became so frequent and sometimes so prolonged, that her uncle chid her for that; not, however, from any desire for her welfare, but to irritate her into leaving the house altogether, that she might take the first step toward the ruin and degradation he desired for her. Disappointed in his design of an alliance between her and his son, for which he had good reasons of his own, he resolved to get rid of her as soon as he could, provoking her to seek companionship, which, to a friendless and homeless orphan, young and beautiful as she was, would result in her lasting shame and the world's contempt for her.

That first step—the abandonment of his roof—was soon taken. Life there soon became intolerable to her, and the contrast between its gloom and the agreeable society she found elsewhere, determined her to forsake it wholly, and trust to God to find friends and some means of livelihood abroad.

"So she has gone at last, has she, Arnold?" said Mr. Lorrimor, one day, when Arnold informed him of the fact. "It is all for the better, and what I expected. She may die in a ditch for what I care; but she shall never cross this threshold again."

"She is getting dissipated and reckless, I think," replied his son, with a malicious twinkle in his eye; for he had long writhed under the consciousness that Fanny loathed him. "All the young men have begun to laugh and sneer about her and her associates. I suppose she has gone to live with some bad character. She has the look and ways of one already."

"She will no longer disgrace us, then," said his father. "Besides, she has now removed an obstacle which I long wished to be rid of. I will tell you more of this, some day. But I should like you to keep watch upon her movements, if you can ascertain where she is. It may be of great service to us."

Arnold promised to play the spy, like the dutiful son of his father. Such a commission well assorted with his tastes.

Among the many acquaintances whom Fanny Lorrimor's beauty had drawn towards her and made her a favorite, was a young man named Bertram Gay. He was employed in the counting-house of two brothers, Asa and Aaron Hill, tradesmen with whom Mr. Lorrimor had extensive dealings. He was one of their most important customers, and a good commercial understanding existed between them in consequence.

Gay had often visited Fanny at the house of her uncle, and at the time when she made such a mysterious departure from it, he suspected that it was rather owing to ill treatment, than from what her cousin intimated to him was the real cause of her flight.

"No—Fanny, innocent as I have ever thought her, is incapable of leading a life of iniquity. They must have driven her abroad by unkindness. Could I but find her, I could soon ascertain. Her cousin shows no mortification, but joy, rather, at her being gone; and there is no wonder that she should be unwilling to live with two such disagreeable beings as he and his father. It cannot be that she has been evil-minded or weak-minded enough to abase herself. I don't like the appearance of old Lorrimor. That he is a designing and unprincipled man he has proved by his conversation in the store. He is not a man of integrity in business matters, and were it not for his wealth, he would find it difficult, with his reputation, ever to rise. I will learn more of him if I can, and help Fanny, if possible."

Such were the thoughts of Bertram Gay, as he pored over the accounts of Hill and Co. While thus ruminating, he overheard the two brothers in conversation about Lorrimor.

"Has old 'Grumpy' been in to-day?" asked the elder brother. "I met him in the street," was the reply, "and he appeared very cheerful, for him."

"Old 'Grumpy' cheerful! And how did that miracle happen, pray?"

"He told me, but pretended at first to be quite mournful about it, that his niece had run off, and become an abandoned character. She had been fractious for a long time, he said, and he found it impossible to do anything with her. But he could not conceal his real feelings long. He is glad of it—and you and I can guess the reason."

"Of course—the property." (Bertram listened eagerly.) "But had he taken no method to reclaim her?"

"He shook his head, and said it was useless—the old rogue. While he appeared to be hopeless, I could see he was most hopeful. He said she would not listen to the idea of marrying his son —that chip of the old block—and I have no doubt he would be glad to have her a confirmed profligate, and die miserable and ignorant of her father's will. But you should have heard how briskly he talked upon matters of trade. He promised us a large order soon. We know what that is for, too."

Here the elder brother made a sign to be silent upon that subject, pointing slyly, with his thumb, over his shoulder at Bertram, whose curiosity was aroused, and who felt chagrined that he could hear no more. He had heard enough, however, to confirm his previous suspicion that Fanny was the innocent victim of her uncle's villany, and that his employers were either knowing to, or perhaps partners in the plot.

When Fanny Lorrimor fled from her uncle's house, she repaired to the humble dwelling of a poor old man named Peter Speal, a cripple, who, being thus disabled from earning a subsistence, occasionally begged from door to door. His wife took in washing, and his daughter, about Fanny's age, earned a scanty addition to the common stock as a shop-girl. To her father, Fanny had often been kind, when he came to her door, and now, in her adversity, she applied to him for a temporary shelter.

"Why, miss! What make you here?" was his astonished inquiry, as, seated on a broken chair, she covered her face and wept aloud.

She soon told the poor family the whole story, and begged them to allow her to stay with them till she could find something to do. She desired her whereabouts to be unknown to others, lest her uncle should compel her to go back. The refuge sought was readily granted.

"We are wretchedly poor, Miss Fanny, as you may see; but not so poor as to be ungrateful—as to deny what comfort we can give to a friendless orphan. Mercy on us! I thought you were better off than this. But Heaven only knows the hidden sorrows of the world. But better days are before you, child. Don't give up."

The kind words of the poor cripple were farthered by the encouragement of his wife and daughter, and within a week the latter obtained her a place where she herself worked, as a seamstress. It was a hard change for Fanny, accustomed as she had been to living in affluence, and the bloom soon fled from her cheek and the gaiety from her eyes. But even so, she felt it was better than to be daily subject to the spleen and tyranny of her worse than heartless uncle; and though now, from fear of discovery, she was compelled to shun the society of which she was so fond, and veiled her face as she passed through the streets, the encouragement given her by those humble but faithful friends led her to hope that misfortune would not always be her lot.

One day, as she was on the way to her work, closely veiled, as usual, and hurrying along with her fellow-seamstress, suddenly she felt a hand upon her shoulder, and for an instant fearing that it was her uncle, she uttered an exclamation of alarm, not loud enough, however, to attract much notice from the passers-by. But she was suddenly reassured; for she saw Bertram Gay at her side, and at once put her veil back.

"Am I such a scarecrow, Fanny," said he, smiling, "that you should scream when I merely touch you? I was not quite sure it was you, but thought I recognized your gait. I have been these three days looking for you, but could obtain no tidings. I have something of importance to tell you—but is she"—looking at her companion, suspiciously—"is she trustworthy?"

"Perfectly," replied Fanny, blushing; for her quick penetration told her that Bertram regarded Miss Speal's poor apparel with a doubtful eye. "She is my friend."

"Your friend?" exclaimed Bertram, with surprise, his countenance suddenly changing.

"O, Mr. Gay, I know, I think, what your thoughts are; but if you knew all you would not blame me! I have no companion now but her, and no home but where she lives."

"Ah, Fanny, I know not what to think!" replied Bertram, seriously, and suspecting the worst. "Have you indeed deserted your uncle's house for—?" he could not finish the sentence, for Fanny's beautiful but reproachful glance arrested the words he was about to utter.

"I will tell you all, Bertram—for I know you are my friend—this evening, if you will come to see me then; and you shall be convinced that I am not to blame, and then you can say what you would have informed me."

Bertram received the direction, and promised to be there, though his heart sorely misgave him as he saw Fanny pass along, her face veiled again, with her ill-clad associate.

"Can it be," he muttered, as he gazed sadly after them, "that she is going to destruction? Perhaps she has even now deceived me about the address, merely to get rid of me. But I shall see, and perhaps save her yet. What a pity that she has no brother to protect and guide her."

On his return to the store, he found his employers cogged in loud and somewhat angry conversation with "Old Grumpy," as they elegantly designated him—Mr. Caleb Lorrimor—in an inner counting-room. Bertram's entrance to the outer room was not noticed, and moaning his high stool and opening his book, with pen in hand, he listened. He could not help it, and was not sorry for that.

"That is my business!" he heard Lorrimor say, firmly. "I want nobody's advice about it."

"But it is a pity such a girl should go to ruin for the want of some timely hand to help her," said the elder brother.

"I have talked to her enough, and she will have her own way," replied Lorrimor, sullenly.

"I suppose she is not still in ignorance about her father's will," said the younger Hill. "You know you told us it would be better to conceal the fact of his having left her the property, in order that she might not be spoiled by the thought that she was to be rich some day. It was a good idea, for a time, but now, it seems, she is old enough to have a will of her own, and to take care of herself."

"I told her about the will long ago," declared Lorrimer, lying, that he might divert their intentions, should they be disposed to seek her out and disclose the fact to her. "I now wish I had not told her, as perhaps it has turned her head. As to her 'taking care of herself,' as you say, you see she does bid fair to do it, after a fashion. Finally, gentlemen, I wash my hands clean of her, after this. When she is disposed to reform, I shall do my duty by her—not before. Had she the property in her hands at this moment—what would she make of it? You know, as well as I do, it would only be an instrument of her still speedier destruction. Let us talk no more upon this subject, but proceed to business at once. Here is a list of what I want—it is a large order, you see—and give me your prices."

What further conversation they had was of no interest to Bertram, relating simply to trade. He could not but feel indignant at the thought that "Old Grumpy's" "large orders" were proving an effectual silence upon Hill and Co., deterring them from revealing what was no more than Fanny's right to know.

"I am determined to forget this affair out," said he to himself, as he proceeded in the evening to the place she had designated, "if human ingenuity can do it. She is the victim, the useless, helpless victim, of a rascally plot, which, now that she has no protector, after having driven her from a shelter, would rob her of a fortune and destroy both her soul and body. She is an angel, and her uncle an own brother to the devil, if not the devil himself. So this is the house. What a rickety old shanty it is. Poor Fanny!"

He knocked and was admitted; and Fanny, having previously given the family to understand that some disclosure of importance was to be made, they, soon after his arrival, left Bertram to confer with her alone.

"Since I saw you, Miss Lorrimer, I have learned still more regarding your history, or rather your affairs; and while I tell you that you are the victim of an atrocious fraud, let me also congratulate you."

"I am at a loss to understand you. Explain, Bertram, and don't call me 'Miss Lorrimer' any more. Call me Fanny, as you used to, when we met in pleasant scenes and hours than these."

"Well, then, Fanny, let me first ask if your uncle ever informed you anything of your father's will?"

"Never, not a word. I never thought he made any. I was told, always, that he left no property."

"Indeed! Then let me tell what I know of it, and perhaps I can greatly assist you."

Bertram now related all that he had heard, with such a warmth of indignation as induced Fanny at once to look upon him as her champion; and, in return, she told him the reason for the course she had taken.

"But are you contented to remain here?" he inquired. "Should you wish a place more suitable to your taste, say the word and it is at your service."

"No, no, Bertram," she hastily answered, a quick ingenuous flush suffusing her face. "It would give my uncle a chance to calumniate me. I had rather remain here—at least for the present. But how is it, do you suppose, that my uncle's secret became known to them?"

"I don't know; but to-morrow I will state the whole case to them, and appeal to their honor, as men, to do you justice if it is in their power. I may, perhaps, learn something more to your advantage, which may enable me to work, even without their aid, should they withhold it."

With many thanks, the orphan girl took leave of him, and with a greatly lightened heart she communicated to her humble benefactors that she had heard good tidings, the nature of which they would probably soon know.

"The will! The will! That is what I want. If that is in existence—but even then, how should I get at it? No—my main dependence is in persuading my employers, after all. Without their assistance I can do nothing."

Thus reflected Bertram Gay, as, on the following morning, he entered the counting-room. He lost no time, but when the partners entered, stated Fanny's case plainly and calmly, and without a word as to her whereabouts; and informing them what he had overheard on the day before, he asked them to do as they would be done by—to befriend the orphan and maintain her rights.

"Of the existence of the will, there is no doubt in our minds, Bertram," said the elder brother. "We were both witnesses to it, when at her father's death-bed, and she a mere child. But it is a question with us, whether the girl is not as her uncle has represented her; and if so, whether it would not be sacrificing both her and the property, by being instruments in placing it in her hands. He himself says he is willing to do her justice, if she will reform."

"Reform! Reform himself!" replied Bertram, with warmth. "There is no reformation needed on her part. He has cheated and tyrannized over her, and now would destroy her character. He has told you that she knew of her father's will. She denies it, and was surprised when I informed her. Is not this sufficient proof of his intentions?—of his fraud? You have children yourselves. Do you love them? Suppose them wronged, after your death, and those to whose care you had confided them should make outcasts of them, for their own advantage. Suppose this—and then consider the mighty wrong which is being done to this poor orphan girl."

"You are right, Bertram," returned they, "and we will have an interview again with the old fellow, though he is flinty and obstinate enough; but even though we are witnesses to the will, and could swear to it and to our signatures, were it ever produced in court, it is doubtful if much good will come of it. But at any rate, we'll try. He will be here to-morrow, at ten."

During the day, revolving the affair constantly in his mind, Bertram devised an additional expedient, and informed Fanny of it in the evening.

"His private papers—it is a daring thing to attempt, I know—but if I could but gain access to them, I am willing to incur the risk of detection, for the sake of finding your father's will among them. Do you think it possible to get at them?"

"It is possible, and to further the chance, I will go with you," exclaimed Fanny, now elated and emboldened with the prospect of success. The stake was too important to be lost by any trifling neglect now.

"He will be at the store to-morrow morning at ten," said Bertram. "At that hour let us be at the house, meet what luck we may."

This plan was carried into execution. With palpitating hearts they stood upon the doorstep, awaiting the opening of the door. Their greatest fear was that Arnold might be at home—perhaps come to the door. To their relief, it was opened by a maid-servant.

"Why, Miss Fanny," exclaimed the girl, holding up both hands, "is it you have come back again? I am so glad!"

"Hush, Bridget!" whispered Fanny, as she and Bertram entered. "Is Arnold at home?"

"No, miss. He went out with his father, half an hour ago."

"Very well, then, Bridget. You can attend to your work, and we will wait till he returns."

Bridget thus disposed of, no time was to be lost. Fanny led the way at once to the library, and pointing to a secretary, and a small trunk upon it, informed Bertram that Mr. Lorrimer there kept all his personal papers, as far as she knew.

"The locks must be forced then—we must shut the doors to deaden the noise—for I have no keys."

"But what are these?" said Fanny, exultingly, as, casting her eyes down, her glance fell upon a bunch of keys, one of which was inserted in the lower drawer.

"Fortune smiles upon us!" said Bertram, seizing them instantly, and at once opening every drawer. While Fanny searched them, he took down the trunk and opened that.

"Plenty of dust upon it," he said. "I fancy it has not been opened lately, and perhaps—what is this?"

He held up, as he spoke, a document fastened with red tape, the paper grown yellowish, as if with age.

"See here, Fanny, 'Will and Testament of William Lorrimer. Codicil.' This is the all-important paper upon which hangs your fate!" exclaimed Bertram, pale with excitement, as he stripped off the fastening, and read the paper hurriedly to her. "Here, too, are their signatures as witnesses—Asa Hill, Aaron Hill,"—appended also to the codicil, which confirms your right to choose your guardian at the age of sixteen. It was a providential act in your father which added such a supplement. Could he have mistrusted the fidelity of his brother? But all's one for that. We have the document. Let us haste away, and—"

In another instant they were appalled by the sound of footsteps, and a voice—the voice of Caleb Lorrimer.

"What's here? What's all this?" he vociferated, rushing towards them, followed by his son and both of Bertram's employers. They had come to discuss the affair upon which they were at issue with Lorrimer, at his own invitation, he hoping to engage them to secrecy, as he should manage it. "Villain, who are you?" added Lorrimer, wildly, glancing at the papers scattered confusedly about. "You here, girl—begone!"

"Stay!" cried Bertram to Fanny, who, trembling, with excitement, was about to obey. "She is the rightful mistress here, and should command you to begone. There, gentlemen, is the proof!" and he held up the will in sight of all.

"Rascal! Robber! Give me!" shouted Lorrimer, frantically, seizing Bertram's uplifted arm, and endeavoring to snatch the paper on which so much depended. Finding it beyond his reach, he clutched at Bertram's throat, when a fierce but brief struggle ensued, and Lorrimer was hurled to the floor.

"Your time of triumph and tyranny is past, miserable schemer!" exclaimed the exasperated young man, again seizing the paper, which had fallen upon the floor; but as he stooped, he heard the shriek of Fanny, as she cried out, suddenly:

"Take care, Bertram, take care!"

Rising at once, he was barely in time to grasp the extended arm of Lorrimer, who, desperate and furious at his exposure and his discomfiture in the scuffle, had taken a pistol from one of the drawers, and now presented it at Bertram's breast. With the swiftness of thought, the latter bent Lorrimer's arm, with a powerful jerk, and the murderous contents were discharged into the body of the intended murderer. The red stream of life gushed from his guilty bosom, and staggering a moment, vainly striving to articulate something, he fell to the floor and expired in a few moments.

The encounter was so suddenly had, and the two brothers were so engaged in preventing Arnold from also assaulting Bertram, that no interposition was possible to avert the catastrophe. No sooner had Lorrimer fallen, however, than a score of people, attracted by the report of the pistol, entered from the street, and there heard a full explanation from Bertram's employers, while Arnold, kneeling by his father's corpse, was groaning over his bereavement.

Thus died the oppressor of his dead brother's daughter—the robber and slayer of the orphan girl—in the very house from which his cruelty had expelled her, and in the presence of the son to whom and his own avarice he would have sacrificed her. He died, too, by his own hand, the unintentional victim of his own misdeeds, yielding up the fortune he would have perverted to his own benefit, unto the rightful owner, and surrendering the life he had corrupted to the God who judged it all.

It was a solemn, useful and life-long lesson to his son, to whom his father's death thus proved of more benefit than his existence would have been. And for her, the orphan heroine of this story, now came the long and sweet reward of her early trial, the crown of which, she often says, was her happy union with Bertram Gay. Their life is happy; and, in their prosperity, they have not forgotten the family of the poor collier, who proved a true friend in her darkest hour.

$1000!!

GRAND PRIZE OFFER.

EACH ONE TO BE PAID IN GOLD DOLLARS.

The unequalled and increasing circulation of our favorite illustrated weekly Journal calls upon the proprietor for a corresponding liberality in his offers to the public, for the new year. He therefore offers as an inducement to postmasters, or any other individual, male or female, to obtain and send to us clubs of subscribers to our paper,

TWELVE PRIZES IN GOLD,

to be faithfully awarded according to the schedule below. These prizes to be divided among the individuals who shall forward us the twelve largest clubs of subscribers for the "Pictorial," between the first of December, 1880, and the first of February, 1881, being a period of about sixty days.

When it is remembered that the agent has to work with, not only the most attractive, but positively

THE CHEAPEST PAPER IN THE WORLD!

It will be realized by every one how easily a large club of subscribers can be procured anywhere.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION

Is now in its eleventh volume, volume twelve commencing on the first of January, 1881. It is the only illustrated paper of its class in America, and the pioneer of illustrated papers on this side the Atlantic. It is elegantly printed on the finest of satin surface paper, containing superior royal pages in each number, with an average of twenty illustrations weekly. These engravings are large and artistic in execution, embracing every current topic of interest, including rural scenery, maritime matters, architecture, noted localities all over this country and Europe, likenesses of eminent characters, male and female, at home and abroad, processions, celebrations, natural history, battles, fortifications, and, in short, every theme of general interest, forming an elegant

ILLUSTRATED RECORD OF THE TIMES.

Besides the illustrations, it contains eight or more super royal pages of original sketches of adventure, tales, poems, biographies and choice miscellaneous reading, humorous sketches, a careful record of events (no advertisements will be admitted), altogether forming a delightful weekly visitor to the home circle, and making two elegant volumes each year for binding, of 416 pages, with about one thousand splendid engravings.

PRESENT CIRCULATION, 103,000 COPIES WEEKLY!

THE PRIZES.

|                                                                                   |          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------|
| To the person who sends us the first largest club we will present in gold.....    | $300 00 |
| To the person who sends us the second largest club we will present in gold.....   | 200 00   |
| To the person who sends us the third largest club we will present in gold.....    | 100 00   |
| To the person who sends us the fourth largest club we will present in gold.....   | 80 00    |
| To the person who sends us the fifth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 80 00    |
| To the person who sends us the sixth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 70 00    |
| To the person who sends us the seventh largest club we will present in gold.....  | 60 00    |
| To the person who sends us the eighth largest club we will present in gold.....   | 40 00    |
| To the person who sends us the ninth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 30 00    |
| To the person who sends us the tenth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 20 00    |
| To the person who sends us the eleventh largest club we will present in gold..... | 15 00    |
| To the person who sends us the twelfth largest club we will present in gold.....  | 10 00    |

These prizes will be paid in gold dollars, that there may be no question as to their value.

No person will be considered a competitor for the prize who does not send us at least fifty subscribers.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                             |        |
|-----------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year..... | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " ".....     | 10 00  |
| 10 " " " ".....             | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis. Thus every thirteenth copy is clear profit to the getter-up of the club, except to those persons winning the first three prizes.

Any person sending us fifty subscribers, shall receive the eight volumes complete of our "Pictorial," elegantly and uniformly bound in gilt, with illustrated title-pages and indexes, containing nearly ten thousand fine illustrations.

It is very important that the names, accompanied by the money, should be sent to us as fast as they are obtained, that we may be able to print an ample number of papers to meet the demand. Therefore, as soon as ten or a dozen subscribers have been obtained, the person who has procured the club can forward them with the money, and be or she can then add to the club any number of names at the same rate, and they will be duly credited to the account of the person sending, until February 1, 1881.

It is not requisite that the entire of the club be taken in one town; we will send the papers to any neighboring post-office, but all subscriptions must come through the same agent. In order to be counted to his or her credit, this prize offer cannot be applied to any regular wholesale agent of our paper. The clubs must be bona fide, and each name sent with the money.

The result will be duly published, and evidence of the receipt of each prize, by the successful parties, will be given.

Sample copies of the paper furnished gratis when desired.
M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

Balloy's Pictorial and The Flag of our Union are sent to one address for $4 per annum.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address, at the lowest club rate.

FREE SCHOOL NEWPORT, KY.

COVINGTON AND NEWPORT, KENTUCKY.

We present on this and the succeeding page a series of very reliable sketches made expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, illustrating the principal features of Covington and Newport, Kentucky. The first-named place is situated on the Kentucky bank of the Ohio River, below the mouth of the Licking, upon a fine plain mostly above the highest flood of the Ohio. This location commands a fine view of the city of Cincinnati, which lies directly opposite. The streets of Covington, and also those of Newport, are laid out in such a manner, that, when seen from an elevated position, they appear to be a continuation of those of Cincinnati. With the latter city, both the towns above mentioned are connected by steam ferries. The first of these views represents the Free School, Newport, a fine, substantial brick building, well adapted to the purposes for which it was erected. The pupils in this school, under competent teachers, who are liberally paid for their services, receive an excellent education. The school is in an excellent condition, and the pupils evince great interest in their teachers and zeal in their studies. The second view is an accurate delineation of the City Hall and Court House, Covington. It stands on Greenup, corner of Third Street. It was erected in 1843. The architecture, it will be observed, is of a pleasing and substantial character, and it has a fine effect from the luxuriance of the surrounding foliage. The Market and Square, Covington, are next depicted by our artist, from a point of view selected on Greenup Street. It has a lively and bustling appearance. Another object of interest, also graphically delineated in our series, is the fine Suspension Bridge, which connects Covington with Newport upon the other side of the Licking. It is a fine and substantial piece of building. The Licking is a beautiful stream; the lower part, near the Ohio, is used as a sort of hospital for invalid steamboats, when they are hauled up for repairs, during the low stages of water in the Ohio. The last view delineates the Newport Barracks, garrisoned by United States troops, as seen from Cincinnati. It is very pleasantly situated, and makes a fine appearance when viewed from the river, and taken in connection with the busy life that moves on the face of the waters. Newport owes its rapid growth and importance chiefly to its proximity to Cincinnati, and the beauty of its situation. Newport, and the villages of Jamestown and Brooklyn, embracing about two thousand acres, will in a few years probably be consolidated into one town. It contains several rolling-mills, iron foundries and steam-mills, and a manufactory of silk goods; also, one bank, and one or two newspaper offices. The population, in 1853, was about 3500. At Covington, many persons doing business in Cincinnati reside, owing to the facilities of intercourse. It is connected with Lexington by a railroad about ninety miles long.

THE STORY OF JANE M'CREA.

From the third volume of Washington Irving's "Life of Washington," the following interesting sketch of the arrest and murder, by the savages, of Jane M'Crea—the story of whose love and sad fate has been the theme of many a tender ditty and exciting tale of Revolutionary days—is taken:—"In Gen. Frazer's division was a young officer, Lieut. David Jones, an American loyalist. His family had their home in the vicinity of Fort Edward before the Revolution. A mutual attachment had taken place between the youth and a beautiful girl, Jane M'Crea. She was the daughter of a Scotch Presbyterian clergyman of the Jerseys, some time deceased, and resided with her brother on the Hudson, a few miles before Fort Edward. The lovers were engaged to be married, when the breaking out of the war severed families and disturbed all the relations of life. The Joneses were loyalists; the brother of Miss M'Crea was a staunch Whig. The former removed to Canada, where David Jones was among the most respectable of those who joined the royal standard, and received a lieutenant's commission. The attachment between the lovers continued, and it is probable that a correspondence was kept up between them. Lieut. Jones was now in Frazer's camp, in his old neighborhood. Miss M'Crea was on a visit to a widow lady, Mrs. O'Neil, residing at Fort Edward. The approach of Burgoyne's army had spread an alarm through the country; the inhabitants were flying from their homes. The brother of Miss M'Crea determined to remove to Albany, and sent for his sister to return home to make ready to accompany him. She hesitated to obey. He sent a more urgent message, representing the danger of lingering near the fort, which must inevitably fall into the hands of the enemy. Still she lingered. The lady with whom she was a guest was a royalist, a friend of Gen. Frazer; her roof would be respected. Even should Fort Edward be captured, what had Jane to fear? Her lover was in the British camp; the capture of the fort would reunite them. Her brother's message now became peremptory. She prepared, reluctantly, to obey, and was to embark in a large batteau, which was to convey several families down the river. The very morning when the embarkation was to take place, the neighborhood was a scene of terror. A marauding party of Indians, sent out by Burgoyne to annoy General Schuyler, were harassing the country. Several of them burst into the house of Mrs. O'Neil, sacked and plundered it, and carried off her and Miss M'Crea prisoners. In her fright, the latter promised the savages a large reward, if they would spare her life, and take her in safety to the British camp. It was a fatal promise. Halting at a spring, a quarrel arose among the savages, inflamed most probably with drink, as to whose prize she was, and who was entitled to the reward. The dispute became furious, and one, in a paroxysm of rage, killed her on the spot. He completed the savage act by bearing off her scalp as a trophy. General Burgoyne was struck with horror when he heard of the bloody deed. What at first heightened the atrocity of it was a report that the Indians had been sent by Lieutenant Jones to bring Miss M'Crea to the camp. This he positively denied, and his denial was believed. Burgoyne summoned a council of Indian chiefs, in which he insisted that the murderer of Miss M'Crea should be given up to receive the reward of his crime. The demand produced a violent agitation. The culprit was a great warrior—a chief—and the 'wild honor' of his brother sachems was roused in his behalf. St. Luc took Burgoyne aside, and entreated him not to push the matter to extremities, assuring him that, from what was passing among the chiefs, he was sure they and their warriors would all abandon the army, should the delinquent be executed. The British officers interfered, representing the danger that might accrue should the Indians return through Canada with their savage resentments awakened, or, what was worse, should they go over to the Americans. Burgoyne was thus reluctantly brought to spare the offender, but thenceforth made it a rule that no party of Indians should be permitted to go forth on a foray, unless under the control of a British officer, or some other competent person, who should be responsible for their behavior. The mischief to the British cause, however, had been effected. The murder of Miss M'Crea resounded throughout the land, counteracting all the benefit anticipated from the terror of Indian hostilities. Those people of the frontiers, who had hitherto remained quiet, flew to arms to defend their families and firesides. In their exasperation, they looked beyond the savages—to their employers. They abhorred an army which, professing to be civilized, could league itself to such barbarians; and they execrated a government which, pretending to claim them as subjects, could loose such fiends to desolate their homes. The blood of this unfortunate girl, therefore, was not shed in vain. Armies sprung up from it. Her name passed as a note of alarm along the banks of the Hudson; it was a rallying word among the Green Mountains of Vermont, and brought down all their hardy yeomanry."

CITY HALL AND COURT HOUSE, COVINGTON, KY.

HOW WOLVES CAPTURE WILD HORSES.

Whenever wolves associate together for mischief, there is always a numerous train of smaller ones to follow in the rear, and act as auxiliaries in the work of destruction. Two large wolves are sufficient to destroy the most powerful horse, and seldom more than two ever begin the assault, although there may be a score in the gang. It is no less curious than amusing, to witness their ingenious mode of attack. If there is no snow, or but little on the ground, two wolves approach in the most playful and caressing manner, lying, rolling and frisking about, until the too credulous and unsuspecting victim is completely put off his guard by curiosity and familiarity. During this time, the gang, squatting, are looking on at a distance. After some time spent this way, the two assailants separate, when one approaches the horse's head, the other his tail, with a shyness and cunning peculiar to themselves. At this stage of the attack, their frolicsome approaches become very interesting; the former is a mere decoy, the latter is the real assailant, and keeping his eyes steadily fixed on the hamstrings or flank of the horse. The critical moment is then watched, and the attack is simultaneous; both wolves spring at their victim at the same instant—one to the throat, the other to the flank—and if successful, which they generally are, the hind one never lets go his hold till the horse is completely disabled. Instead of springing forward, or kicking to disengage himself, the horse turns round and round, without attempting a defence. The wolf before then springs behind to assist the other. The sinews are then cut, and in half the time I have been describing it, the horse is on his side; his struggles are fruitless—the victory is won. At this signal, the lookers on close in at a gallop; but the small fry of followers keep at a respectful distance, until their superiors are gorged, and then they take their turn unmolested.—Russian Sketch Book.

MARKET AND SQUARE, COVINGTON, KY.

THE COSSACK AND HIS HORSE.

The Cossack is unsurpassed in roving excursions. No European cavalry can make such long marches, without sacrificing their horses. In his campaigns in the West, the Cossack had sometimes a pack-horse with him, but even without this he can perform wonders, and forty miles a day is quite an ordinary achievement for him; he and his horse must be seen to understand this. The Cossack is generally a powerful man, and appears too heavy for his horse, although this is not really the case. The sharp withers, the handsome head and stag-neck, the long, well-formed bones of the shoulders and pelvis, and the short bones of the legs, the handsome chest, the fine and firm hoof, display all the qualities of a good animal. Persons versed in such matters will sometimes question his power of carrying a heavy weight, on observing his apparently long, though broad loins; but these animals have not unfrequently two ribs additional to other horses, and thus the great distance between the withers and loins is not necessarily a sign of weakness. A rough exterior often conceals the well-bred descent of the Cossack horse. He has to scrape his fodder, in winter, from under the snow in the Steppe, and anything he can procure is welcome—bread, oats, barley, rye, grass, straw, good or bad hay, and hard work. He can climb the hill and swim the stream. The Cossack has also a peculiar way of managing his horse. He rides in the Oriental manner, with the knee bent, the stirrup short, the saddle high. The bridle is slack; the horse having been bred in the open air, is left to his practised instinct, examining the way with his head close to the ground, and exercising his intelligence to obey his master, with as little trouble as possible. Although the knee of the horse is often bent, he rarely stumbles. People in the East cannot understand why we tie up our horses' heads, and bestow so much care in guiding an animal, which is not unfrequently cleverer than its master. The bit, as well as the bridle, of the Cossack is simple and convenient. He speaks to his horse, who understands his master's language. The Cossack himself displays unwearied activity, dismounting and leading his horse whenever practicable. The latter is accustomed to feed at any time of the day, and his rider never neglects an opportunity of feeding him. Whenever there is a halt, even under fire in battle, the Cossack may be seen reaching something to his horse, who never despises his food, however indifferent its quality and unusual the time and place in which he receives it. Whoever has once experienced the vexation of seeing his faithful charger, after a severe day's battle, refuse his fodder; whoever has seen a noble animal grow daily weaker under him from rejecting his feed, and seen the effect of bivouacking, hard riding, and fodder of indifferent quality, will be able to appreciate the value of this peculiarity of the Cossack horse. He is treated affectionately and managed easily by his master, who possesses a knowledge of his animal which practice alone can give. The Cossack is the model of a groom and rider of his own horse, as the Englishman is of the high-bred race-horse. The Cossack is bred with his horse, a hearty attachment exists between them, and their common road through life might be regarded as the model of a happy union. There is something striking and beautiful in this attachment of the Cossack to his horse, and reminds one of the fond affection of the Arab for his charger.—Records of the War.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE OVER THE LICKING RIVER.

THE ISLAND OF MADAGASCAR.

Madagascar lies off the eastern coast of Africa, from which it is separated by the Mozambique Channel, about 300 miles broad. It is more than 800 miles in length, while its breadth varies from 120 to 300 miles. It is intersected by a chain of mountains, in which many rivers have their source, one of them being navigable for boats or canoes for a distance of 100 miles. It also contains several lakes, one of which has a circuit of about 75 miles. It is said to be exceedingly rich in mineral productions and equally so in its botanical. Its shores are indented with bays and harbors so admirably adapted for commerce, that were the island inhabited by a civilized people, or were its resources properly developed, it would be resorted to by the ships of all nations for the purposes of commerce. Some twenty five or thirty years since, the larger portion of the island was brought under the rule of a native prince named Radaina, who brought about great reforms. He raised an army of 20,000 men, which he equipped with fire-arms obtained through commerce; sent several young men to Europe to be educated; encouraged missionaries and established a printing-press. Teachers were also sent to various parts of his kingdom. Things were in this flourishing state when his career was suddenly terminated by poison administered by his wife. Anarchy followed, commerce was destroyed, and the incipient steps towards civilizing the country were arrested. Several attempts afterwards made by foreigners to open a trade there were frustrated, and for the last ten years we have scarcely heard the island spoken of.—Bee.

ROOM FOR ALL.—Though the world is wide enough for every one to take a little, and there appears no reason why we jostle and make one another unhappy as we pass along, yet so it is, we are continually thwarting and crossing each other at right angles; and some lose all memory of the temper that governed at first setting out.

TRAVELLING IN 1799.

In the latter part of October, 1799, before daylight, I left my mother's house, about twenty miles west of Newburgh, and I did not reach Princeton until the next Saturday week, progressing as fast as the public conveyances would carry us. The easiest and most expeditious way was on board of a sloop, and two days and two nights in reaching New York was considered a good passage; and four or five days, and even more, as in my case, was not uncommon. From New York to Princeton the journey by stage was equally tedious. In the fall of 1807 the first steamboat came up the river—the wheels unprotected and exposed to public view. A form on cross beams, like that of a saw-mill, moving up and down, and the boat creeping along at the rate of three or four miles an hour. A real curiosity! the wonder of the country! People would come twenty or thirty miles to see the boat on the day she was to make her trip. Then came an improved boat, such as would accommodate passengers, but it was a very different thing from the floating palaces in which we may now go at the rate of fifteen or twenty miles an hour, with lodging and fare equal to the best city hotels. There was no landing at the dock; the boat lay in the river, and we had to be rowed out in a small boat. I have been dragged in one of these row-boats until we were opposite New Windsor, in a dark night, before I ascended the steamer, and then could find no convenient place to sit, or stand, or lie; perhaps it was raining; nothing to eat, and I was glad to be let off at New York, after paying three and a half dollars for the passage. At the close of my first college term, in company with three other students, I hastened to the public house to wait the arrival of the mail stage from New York. When it arrived, there were in it four sailors, just landed from a distant voyage. The rule was that not more than six passengers could have a seat within the stage unless with the consent of those already in. Two of the students immediately rushed into the stage. I was one of two without a seat. We begged to be admitted; the driver said "no," except with the unanimous consent of those occupying the seats. At last Jack cried out to me, "come in, my hammock will hold us both." The other student took a seat with the coachman on the box, and we were soon on our way. The roads were in a sad state. The stage was often so sunk in the mud that four horses could not extricate it, and we were under the necessity, as Jack said, of going "on shore." "The craft had grounded." On another occasion, returning home, we took a sloop at New Brunswick, and when we reached Amboy, the tide and wind were against us, and it was proposed to have a supper of oysters. And although I had often tried, I had heretofore failed to eat oysters; but as my companions were going to have an oyster supper, I concluded to go with them. I ordered what I thought to be sufficient for myself to be shucked and fried. These were brought forward first, and in a minute or two they were all gone. Then came the roasted; and as I saw my shipmates eating heartily, I thought it was too bad to pay fifty cents for a cup of coffee; "I'll try and eat two or three little ones." I did so; and I continued until I had as large a pile of shells as any one at the table. Thus commenced my fondness for oysters, and it has continued to the present time.—Autobiography of Rev. John Johnston.

BARRACKS, NEWPORT, KENTUCKY.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

DIRGE—O, FROST KING, TOUCH THEM LIGHTLY.

BY BLANCOU D'ARTOISE.

[We regret to learn that our esteemed contributor, WILLIAM RODERICK LAWRENCE, is dead. He had suffered with lung complaint for more than a year, and finally was carried off with it. One who stood beside him at death, informs us that "he seemed so prone to sleep like a pure child in a parent's arms," and adds, "I never saw so patient a sufferer nor so peaceful a death."]

O, Frost King, touch them lightly—
The sweet spring violets wave;
Smile on the lotus brightly,
And lay them in their grave.

O, Frost King, touch them lightly—
The roses on the bower,
Whose buds were strong so slightly,
They vanished ere the flower.

O, Frost King, touch them lightly—
The forest banners wide;
They ofttime flaunt too brightly,
And wave in garish pride.

O, Frost King, touch us lightly,
Like Ceres' golden sheaves;
And may we die as brightly
As fall yon maple leaves.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

HARPER'S MILL.

BY EUSTACE KINGMAN.

I WAS the eldest son of the proprietor of Harper's Mill. I am not ashamed to own that my father was a miller—the good old miller, whose whitened locks may Heaven forever bless! Wealth and fame have been mine, both in my own and foreign countries. At home and abroad, I have mingled with the highest, and received praise and homage from the gifted and intellectual; yet never, when the honors of the world seemed most to await me, and when the foam in my cup was sparkling highest and brightest, have I forgotten that I was the son of Thomas Harper the miller.

My younger brother had begged to remain with my father at the mill; but my father, whose business had always been good, was abundantly able to give me my choice of my future life, and I eagerly seized upon his consent to establish myself at college. I passed through with honor and credit to myself, and was fortunate enough to obtain a situation, partly as tutor and partly as travelling companion to a lad from one of the Southern States.

I roamed all over Europe, saw everything worth seeing, visited ruins, temples, churches; revelled in music, painting and sculpture; and enjoyed all with the enthusiasm of a young and romantic traveller. My companion, Philip Loftus, was a boy of strong natural sense, intermingled with a keen perception of the ludicrous. Everywhere he was well received on account of his ever-failling fund of good humor, and his talents and acquirements.

While absent I had made many drawings of the old mill, which I had delighted to show Philip, as being the beloved and picturesque home of my childhood. The scene struck his fancy, and he was never tired of admiring the random sketches which I had made of its various points of beauty.

"When we return, Philip," I often said to him, "you shall see the old place under the softest influence of our summer sky; you shall then acknowledge that we have seen no place of wilder interest, or one of more romantic situation, in Europe."

I kept my word; and immediately on our return, after having visited his Southern home, we proceeded to my father's residence. All through the latter part of our journey towards home, we had glimpses of such delicious landscapes as have seldom greeted our eyes in foreign lands. Philip was delighted, and when we arrived in sight of Harper's Mill, he warmly declared that he never yet had seen its beauty surpassed.

A few days served to strip us of our foreign dandyism, and induct us into the homely ways of Harper's Mill. My father had nearly given up the entire business of the mill into the hands of my brother, and was now enjoying the green old age of his well-spent life—waiting patiently to rejoin my mother, who had long preceded him to the land of the immortals.

In my boyish days, I had held a tender affection for my cousin, Ida Harper. Our fathers were brothers; but while mine had been contented to remain at his rustic mill, Stephen Harper's ambition had led him into the speculating ways of the great city. Here he had prospered beyond his most ardent hopes, and Ida was now no longer my little playful cousin, but a wealthy heiress, basking in the noontide sun of wealth and fashion.

Often as I thought of her and her little sister Caroline, I wondered if, amidst the glitter that surrounded them, the warm sunshine of the heart had not faded away. I resolved as soon as Philip's visit should terminate, to ascertain what had become of Ida's old affection for me. But while waiting for this, I happened to read the announcement of Caroline's marriage in the newspaper, and soon after I heard a detailed account of the same from the lips of one of my old college friends.

It seemed that it was from no very strong preference for each other, and from no very exaggerated idea of love in any way, that Frederic Sumner and Caroline Harper came together. The father of the bridegroom had long held strong business relations with the father of the bride. "Propinquity," as the lady in some old novel keeps constantly harping upon, did the whole. They married because they were continually thrown in each other's path, and because no one competed with them for the heart of either.

Mr. Harper "shelled out," as young Sumner called it, handsomely. The bride's clothes and jewels, her plate and furniture, were all selected without regard to expense, at the most fashionable establishment, and cost quite as much as the elegant house which Sumner's father transferred to their immediate possession. "Treading the same walks of life," he said—"standing upon the same plane of society, there were none of those inoffensive gaucheries to be enacted, which always happen where one party is above the other, and the higher bred acquaintances of the one have to condescend to the lower bred associates of the other."

I supposed then, by what my friend said, that all was smooth and fair in my cousin's lot. No cloud from the nagenial leaden-colored sky of poverty lowered upon the young couple. If the bright sunshine of the heart and affections was not there, there were gilded trappings of wealth and fashion—and the latter are often preferred to the former.

So the Christmas holidays, my friend told me, had found them settled with all the appointments, privileges and investments of the rich and fashionable. Parties were given in return, theatre and opera boxes secured for the season, and all the appliances for a gay, if not an absolutely dissipated winter bargained for. It was no wonder that, in the style that prevailed throughout the families of Harper and Sumner, one of them should have forgotten that he, at least, was not born into that magic circle, but came into it by degrees, and in ways which he had rather not remember.

Mr. Stephen Harper did not like retrospection; he would have said: "Don't tell me what I have been, but tell me what I am now." He did not even like to think of his brother, the miller, at Harper's Mill; and still more sensitively he would flinch from the idea that away off in an obscure country town, there was once a miserable old farmhouse, with its shattered roof and tumble down chimneys, and empty barns and granaries, where he, Stephen Harper himself, first opened his eyes on this changeable world. He did not love to remember that his eldest brother, the miller, had impoverished himself to take his widowed mother, and his younger brothers and sisters, into his own family; had given Stephen his first start in life, and had given the two feeble sisters and bed-ridden mother that assistance which Stephen, in his wealth, had never thought of sharing with him. All this was perfectly true; but Stephen Harper, Esq. never believed it. He ignored the very name of Harper's Mill—still more that of Harper's farm, the dilapidated place where he was born; and had so often told the story of his being an only son, and of his parents dying in his boyhood, in easy circumstances, that all his friends received that version of his life.

Like old Coloeel Thornton, who made himself the hero of many battles, until he came really to believe in his own exploits, Mr. Harper at last began to put faith in the statements he had manufactured so often. All this I heard from my friend, and it did not stimulate me at all to wish for a renewal of intercourse with the family of my uncle. And yet there was the long-cherished image of my cousin Ida rising fresh, and bright, and beautiful on my vision, as I remembered her in her angel childhood.

Surely, surely, I thought, so fair a promise must ere this have realized as fair a noon. Ida Harper could not be very different to the being I had known in my boyhood. I remembered our last parting. I was at the venerable age of fifteen, and she was some two years my junior. Ten years had elapsed, and her father had grown rich and powerful, while mine still bore the appellation of the miller of Harper's Mill. How would she look at my presumption, should I ever dare to address her again as my "little wife?"

What though I was nothing but a poor tutor, and Caroline had married the son of a merchant prince, did that place me in fact upon any point beneath that on which Frederic Sumner stood? My heart answered no, and I obeyed the impulse, and set out the next morning for town; and in two hours after my arrival, I was in the presence of my cousin Ida.

Dear soul, she had not kept me waiting one moment; but in the simplest of morning dresses had flown over the stairs, with the card still in her hand, which I had sent up by the servant, and on which I had written "Gilbert Harper, of Harper's Mill." She had remembered me, then, through all these long years, and she now came up to me with a charming frankness, that made me despise myself for the doubts I had cherished respecting her. Our interview was long and pleasant, and we parted with the promise of speedily meeting again. I contented myself with merely asking after her father and Caroline, thinking I would wait for time to develop the way in which they would receive me.

I pass over the subsequent interview which I had with Ida. It is enough to say that our affections were irrevocably engaged; but while the spell which united us seemed to be drawing closer and closer around us, still the dread came stronger upon us both of the opposition that might be expected from her father. I dreaded it even more than Ida, for I felt I could not ask her to disobey her father, although my heart told me she, with her present feelings, would cling closer to me than ever, if his consent was denied.

Time brought me at length into the presence of Stephen Harper, and I learned instinctively what favor I might expect when my engagement to his daughter should be known. In his behaviour towards me in his own house, there was too little of the ceremony due to a stranger, and too little familiarity which might be expected from a relation. Altogether it was deeply offensive to me; and it must be confessed, that I paid little of that court which he might reasonably expect from one who aspired to his daughter's hand. All that I could at present obtain from Ida, was an assurance of undiminished affection, and a promise of correspondence, and with this to console me for the want of her presence, I returned to Harper's Mill.

I tried to be content with Ida's letters, but still there was an uncertainty about my fate which distressed and annoyed me. Sanguine as I was, I could see no prospect of ever marrying her, except against her father's consent, and this was painful to think of. Restless and discontented, I soon found my way back again to town, where, with the means which my father supplied me, I established myself in a business which would leave me half the year to visit Harper's Mill, or to go abroad, as I might choose.

This time I saw more of my uncle; and emboldened by what I fondly hoped was increasing kindness on his part, I one day almost blantly asked him for the hand of his daughter. He looked surprised, and briefly answered, that any man who would become his son-in-law, must show his enterprise by amassing a fortune, as he himself had done.

"And how is it, Mr. Harper?" I asked. "Has nothing else any weight with you? Do you consider the acquisition of wealth the only good in life? Are talents, qualifications, perseverance and energy of no account in your estimation?"

He frowned and bit his lips. "If a man lays claim to all those in reality," he said, "he will show that he possesses them, by acquiring the wealth of which I spoke."

"That may be partly true, Mr. Harper," I answered; "but we read that 'the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong.' Undoubtedly you can remember many persons who started with you in the race of life, whom you considered as men of enterprise, who have fainted by the way in the pursuit of wealth." He could not but own the truth of what I said, although seemingly unwilling to do so. "Even you yourself, Mr. Harper, may not always enjoy the wealth you have attained."

He looked daggers at me. "Do not name it," he said. "I have not so lightly laid my plans—no danger of that kind can be apprehended."

I went back to the subject matter of our discourse, and asked him if I might consider that as his ultimate decision.

"Certainly," he answered, and we parted.

Slowly, but surely, for the next three years my business progressed. Everything on which I laid my hands seemed to be transmuted at once into gold. It gave me no joy, excepting so far as it assured me that through its means I might win Ida. Ida, whose beauty had already begun to fade under the influence of anxiety and hope deferred, I strove to comfort with the hope of my success. She listened with a mournful smile. Her hopes had withered under long continued expectation.

"You will marry some one younger than myself, Gilbert," she would say. "Ooo whose youth has not been sacrificed to a father's love of gold." I would try to cheer her then with the hope of brighter days.

I had gone home on a visit to Harper's Mill. I walked up to the post-office one night, hardly daring to hope for a letter from Ida. The boy at the window awkwardly shuffled over a package of letters, and told me there were none for me; as he put them back again, my eye caught sight of a delicate envelope, which I could not help hoping might have come from the only correspondent from whom I cared to hear.

"Let me see that letter, my boy," I said, as I pointed to the one in question.

The boy mattered, and unwillingly passed over the letter. There it was, in Ida's fine Italian handwriting, Gilbert Harper, Esq. I opened it then and there. The paper seemed to swim before my eyes, as I read the following words:

"Come to me immediately, dear Gilbert. We are in the greatest confusion imaginable. Officers in the house, Caroline and my father almost distracted, and I sick at heart witnessing their distress. I have a vague feeling that your presence will restore us to something like peace and order again. But come at all events, and that speedily.
IDA."

I got the boy at the mill to drive me to the station, whence I took the night train, and at nine o'clock was in town, and at the door of my uncle's house. I rung and asked for Ida; she came to the door on hearing my voice, pale but collected.

"I am glad you are come, Gilbert," she said, mournfully. "My father is almost out of his senses, and Caroline is, if possible, still more so. The firm has failed, and Frederic says we are all completely ruined. I do not care for money, you well know, Gilbert; but it will be hard to see my father's gray hairs steeped in poverty, when gold has been his idol so long."

It was but too true; they were irretrievably ruined. Everything was brought forward and given up to the creditors; for my uncle, though grasping, was at least not dishonest. A day was appointed for the sale of their effects; but before it came around, I had hurried Ida and her father down to Harper's Mill, where my father gave them a most cordial welcome.

Back I went to town to attend the sale, at which I purchased Ida's harp and piano, all the plate which was marked with the family name, a few of the most valuable pictures, and my uncle's favorite arm-chair and writing-desk. I procured Frederic Sumner a lucrative situation as clerk, and saw him established, with his wife and father, at a comfortable boarding-house, and then went home to join Ida. Already my father had begun to love her as a daughter. For herself, she was in raptures with the mill, the old homestead, and all the scenes which she had remembered so well from her childhood.

"Would you be content to live here always, Ida?" I asked her one night, as we strayed by moonlight down to the old mill.

"I should ask no greater happiness," she answered, "than to know I should never again behold the busy town. Here I could live and die in peace."

No more opposition could reasonably be expected from Mr. Harper; and while I pitied his misfortunes, I could not but feel that they were calculated to make him wiser and better. In another month, then, Ida will become my wife, without waiting for any additional delay to our joy. The clouds which had hitherto rested upon our lot, seem to have passed away. The future seems brightening before us; and although we have waited beyond the glowing period of youth, still I do not despair that, after all, we shall enjoy a fair portion of happiness.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

O, WHENCE FLIES MY SPIRIT?

BY IRVING MONTAGUE.

O, whence flow my spirit, elastic with gladness?
The breath of such air is aroma of wine!
Then why on my soul lies this load of deep sadness—
When heaven, air and earth are no less than divine!

O, whence flies my spirit, elastic with gladness?
High poetry—godness! I've thrown down thy lyre—
But laved not in Lethe—a Pilegethon's madness
My heart-strings consume with unquenchable fire.

But whence flies my spirit, elastic with gladness,
From the rich, sunny dale where it took such delight?
Abandoned—I'm left here to all trials and in sadness—
I conjure thee back, thou weird minstrel of night!

I returned thee, my lyre—for stern poverty claimed me!
I vowed I would shun thee henceforth to the goal!
I spurned thee for riches—but now I reclaim thee—
Enchained have I found thee to chords in my soul!

We'll part not, my lyre! 'e'en though poverty claim us;
Amidst thou dost torture—anon thou dost soothe!
But while upon earth the Fates longer detain us,
We'll wail away care with the lays that we love.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE COLLEGIANS.

A TALE OF THE SOUTH.

BY HELL BRAMULE.

"WELL, 'tis 'an ill wind that blows nobody good," said my Uncle Caustic, brushing the ashes from his cigar, on reading in a New Orleans paper of the appointment of the Hon. Paul Clement to some post of trust and emolument abroad. "I remember Paul Clement—as noisy and unpromising a scamp as ever headed a row in 'old South Middle,' in my college days. There were four of us, known to tutors and professors well, as mauvais sujets; and never referred to by Fresh or Soph, save with a not very commendatory valediction, as 'The Quartette Club.' Three of the worthy conferees hailed from the South, while the fourth, Latham, belonged to the North. Fred Selbourne, a noble young fellow, belonged to an aristocratic old Mississippi family, while Clement, like myself, was a Creole of Louisiana.

While pursuing his studies in a preparatory school in New Haven, Selbourne, who was the son of a wealthy cotton planter in the vicinity of Vicksburg, formed a friendship for his classmate, Robert Latham, which lasted unchanged during the whole of his collegiate course. Talented, and of peculiarly winning manners, Latham had so fully ingratiated himself in the warm feelings of the young Creole, to whom his society had become indispensable, that on his migration to New Orleans the following winter, the old bond was renewed by Selbourne inviting him to spend the Christmas holidays with him at 'The Oaks'—the name of his plantation home—where the family at the time resided, and where he soon became a favorite with the whole household; added to that matter-of-fact sort of education, which most Northerners give their sons, fitting them to act well their part on life's stage, wherever in after life that stage may be.

With the prestige of a successful collegiate course, a fine person, and agreeable manners, young Latham had become the favored suitor, when a student in the New Haven law school, of a Miss Dashcroft, long toasted by juniors and seniors as the college belle; but his circumstances forbidding the idea of marriage at the time, he migrated to New Orleans, where an injury received by a railroad accident, followed by ill health and depressed spirits, so won upon the sympathies of Fred Selbourne, that he prevailed on his father for permission to invite his former classmate to make 'The Oaks' his home until he might be enabled with renewed health to resume his profession.

During his stay at 'The Oaks,' Latham's attentions to Selbourne's sister Eulalie were always characterized by an open frankness, that would have precluded any one less susceptible from imagining that he felt a preference; but she, poor girl, thought otherwise, and she soon became to him in the stead of society, friends, everything. Born beneath the burning sun of a tropic clime, her feelings had imbibed a portion of their warmth; and if, under other circumstances, she had felt admiration for the brilliant and elegant Latham, how much a dearer object had he become as an invalid dependent on her care and sympathy!

Reading, drawing, singing, driving out with him, was just the situation to draw forth, in all its fervor, the warm love of her impassioned nature. It might be that Latham was incapable of tampering with her affections; or it might be, incapable of comprehending them, since he must have observed that his constant attention had established an interest in her heart (for men soon discover this), long before her own sensitive delicacy would admit, even to herself, that she loved him. A look, a word casually spoken, and to which he possibly attached no importance, would afford ground for hope in her romantic nature; and as often would an averted look, or careless word, spoken with as little thought to wound, send her to a sleepless pillow, tortured with doubt of whether her love was returned—wherein, could she have read his cold, calculating, selfish nature aright, she would have seen he had no love to give—at least to her.

Could men but see how often their attentions, slight though they may be, are translated;—could they but know the agony of hopes raised but to be wrecked;—could they but note the pale cheek, the quivering lip, the pulse's accelerated play when some slight compliment was paid by them, and to which they perhaps attached no meaning;—or could they see the blanched lips, from which the color had fled to support the fainting heart, or the tear-dewed pillow when a night of unrest had followed as slight a mark of admiration for another, when their long-continued assiduities had made the seriousness of their intentions no longer a matter of doubt, they would pause to reflect whether it was right to longer play the trifler's part.

The family had come for the season to their winter's residence in New Orleans. Days had become weeks, and weeks had glided into months, and still Robert Latham lingered near the side of Eulalie Selbourne, her constant escort in her rides and to all places of public amusement; while she, pleased with the dangerous proximity, lavished her whole wealth of love on her brother's friend, until ministering to his slightest expressed wish by day, and dreaming of him by night, had become a part of her being.

The winter had passed, and Eulalie was roused from her bright dream of hope and happiness, by Latham informing her that he had received letters from the North relative to the disputed will of his Uncle Sheffield, that would compel his immediate return for an indefinite period. Alas, for the poor dreamer! So closely had her love become interwoven with every thought of her existence, that the bare possibility of separation from him had never occurred to her. Hitherto, the spoiled child of affluence, the pride of fond parents, the pet of a darling brother, her life had been but as a summer's dream; her now only relief, solitude and tears. Summer came, and the family once more returned to 'The Oaks.' For a time her brother received letters from Latham; and though her name never occurred therein, save in a casual or commonplace way, still it gave the satisfaction of again meeting him when the lawsuit that had taken him to the North had terminated.

Only those who have had their dearest hopes overthrown, and then again re-illuminated, can form any idea of the excitement, amounting to wild delirium, with which she devoured the contents of the letters her brother occasionally received, and without a suspicion of the value placed on them by his romantic sister, would carelessly hand them to her for a perusal; or the agony with which the last hope in life was crushed from out her young heart when they ceased altogether. The summer had passed, and the tall sycamores that shaded their plantation home had donned the gorgeous drapery of the autumn, when with the dews of death on her brow, round which her dark hair clung in moist and wavy masses, her dream of tranquillity and solitude was disturbed by removal again to their town residence, when stretched wan and emaciated on her couch, the sweet, pale face of the yielding, broken-hearted girl was laid on her pillow, where the last blow aimed at her peace was that of hearing of his arrival in the city, accompanied by his bride. In vain would she argue, as a check to her rebellious constancy, that she had no claim upon him. What recked it? She had shipwrecked her all of earthly happiness in the hope of his return; and now to hear that he had come, accompanied by one who bore the name, and held the place in his heart she had fondly believed would have been hers, rang the death-knell to her hopes, extinguishing them forever. The mere knowledge of his presence in her vicinity when another bore his name and claimed his heart, but helped to prostrate and accelerate her doom.

The friends of the Selbourne family, little dreaming that every word uttered a barbed arrow in the torn breast of the stricken one, often spoke, when admitted to her darkened, silent room, of the wealth, beauty and accomplishments of Mrs. Latham—none, save her brother, noting the deadly pallor of her cheek when that name was spoken; and none, save he, felt that the sun of her earthly happiness had set forever. Premonition of consumption, an alarming cough set in, and the late beautiful girl, who a year before had left the boarding-school in the pride of her radiant loveliness, begged, as the last request, to return to the tranquil shades of 'The Oaks' to die.

Her request was complied with. She was taken to her Mississippi home the shade of her former self; yet with the shrinking delicacy of her nature, closely allied, as it was, with a high-souled woman's pride, had the gentle girl so schooled her feelings, as never to allude to him. Yet was the memory of Robert Latham ever present, even unto her dying hour, and his name the last articulate sound that passed her sweet, pale lips ere her gentle spirit winged its way to where disappointment and the heart blight come not.

If, with the knowledge of her fervent romantic nature, Latham had wilfully tampered with her affections, a fearful expiation was before him. It afterward transpired that a college friend of Latham's, Paul Clement—he who had first informed Fred Selbourne of Latham's engagement to Miss Dashcroft, and of his repulse when it was yet uncertain how the lawsuit respecting old Sheffield's will might terminate—had himself long been on the list of the New Haven belle's admirers, and indeed supposed her favorite suitor, until old Sheffield's will placed Latham's more prosperous circumstances in the ascendant.

Paul Clement was decidedly the preferred swain of the college belle at the time Latham migrated to New Orleans to push his fortune in that then Peru of the South. Not being of the cast and calibre to remember that the woman who could waver between two objects was unworthy of either, no sooner had his uncle's legacy enabled him to aspire, than he proposed to Miss Dashcroft and was accepted. Accepted the more readily, that she was beginning to be considered somewhat musty by the succeeding classes of sophs and juniors of Yale, having flirted with the members of every graduating class, until placed on the shelf with those designated by Yalensians as 'students' widows,' and fearing to become a judgment of an old maid among them, she eagerly grabbed at the returned limb of the law; while young Clement was at the time not sorry to be rid of her. But when the next winter he again met her in New Orleans, where she was quite the fashion—that is, among the gentlemen; her bold, dashing manners—not being to the taste of the dignified matrons of the South, who cast her society at once—he renewed his assiduities, and report said, was not frowned upon.

One morning, about a month after Eulalie's death, he called upon her brother, and taking a letter from his vest, said:

"I have come to you, Selbourne, to act for me in this affair. That fool, Latham, has seen fit to send me a challenge."

"And you fight him, of course?" asked Selbourne.

"Not I! I'm in no particular hurry to be ushered where I have doubts of my credentials passing muster respectably—perching myself to be shot at for Latham's amusement, in particular, and the edification of my friends generally—not I!"

"Then, in what way am I to understand that you want me to serve you?"

"By going to the dwelling idiot, and smoothing matters over, if you can; for if his infernal wife's name gets mixed up with mine, it will injure me some with the governor, or I'm mistaken."

"Really, Clement, I seldom see Latham of late—moreover, I scarcely comprehend how I'm to serve you."

"Well, to come to the point, he has got hold of some of my billets to the infernal jilt, and—"

"The lady, if you please," interrupted the fastidious Southerner.

With something that sounded like the ghost of a strangled oath in reference to being punctilious, Clement began his story "at the beginning," with his first introduction, when a fresh, to the New Haven belle, ending with a not very commendatory valediction of himself for being such a donkey as to have been inveigled into a second flirtation with the quondam Miss Dashcroft.

Aware of what might be considered the palliating circumstances of a case, Selbourne promised to call on Latham, and propose that the high-flown notes on both sides should be returned, engaging that Paul Clement should leave immediately for Europe—proposing, too, that Mrs. Latham, for the sake of her infant child, should return to the protection of her father, avoiding all newspaper publicity, in the hope that time might heal the memory of his domestic wrongs in the memory of his irate husband.

But Latham was in no mood to listen—as he called it, "to be dictated to"—literally applying the terms scoundrel and coward to the naughty Paul Clement; when, as his wrath waxed "fast and furious," he added that of liar to the catalogue, Selbourne, Creole-like, impulsive and high-spirited, forgot he was only a second, not a principal, in the affair—and after administering a proof on Latham's eyes that his college boxing-lessons were not forgotten, repaired direct to the pistol-gallery, to make preparations for any further satisfaction his friend might require.

As might have been foreseen, he was challenged; and the two collegians met next morning at day-break a short distance from the Bayou, on the Metairie Road, where Selbourne's bullet reached his heart, who, whether he had trifled by design, or by only pursuing a course of unmeaning attentions towards his impulsive, gentle-hearted sister, had left her to die—too sensitive to prate of wrongs, too proud to acknowledge neglect, too forgiving to complain, too gentle, all too gentle to upbraid where she loved—to die of a broken heart. Selbourne went abroad, and has never returned; the dead were soon forgotten by the fashionable world, and now Paul Clement's star shone bright in the ascendant.

Still magnificently beautiful, the dashing Widow Latham seemed no bad spec, whereby the young limb of the law was to rise in the world. No longer fearing the governor's wrath on seeing his name associated with that of the wealthy widow, he soon succeeded in persuading her to adopt him. And often, in after years, when the former college belle would be pointed out to me, circled with a crowd of followers, whether blazing in jewels at the opera, or in her stylish equipage dashing along the lake road, her haughty features set off with magnificent attire and radiant with rouge, and when I have heard her beauty and the faultless taste of her stylish surroundings commented on, I have always turned away with a sigh, to the memory of 'The Collegians.'

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WESTWARD EMPIRE. By E. L. MUGGER. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 445.

The object of this work is to demonstrate the westward movement of civilization, by linking together the great leading events of time. The design is well executed, and the book cannot fail to convey instruction, and awaken thought. For sale by Redding & Co.

HARPER'S SCHOOL HISTORY. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 450.

A well-defined outline of ancient and modern history, with questions to each paragraph, illustrated by 150 maps and engravings. It is written in a plain style, and may be placed in the hands of quite young children. It is a valuable addition to our list of school books. For sale by Redding & Co.

NEW MUSIC.—From Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington Street, we have "Root, Tree, and Branch, or Expiry," one of Oliver's songs. "I have thee stay," "Amusement Waltz," for the piano. "The Merry Seign," a song, and the "Morning Hymn," from the oratorio of Ed.

A CHILD'S HISTORY OF ROME. By JOHN BUNYAN, author of "A Child's History of the United States." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 18mo. 2 vols. pp. 375-395.

A very well-written and well-arranged compendium of Roman history. The author never forgets that he is addressing youthful readers, while the publishers, by their liberal illustrations, all well executed, have completed the efficiency of the work. For sale by Redding & Co.

THE IOWA HAND-BOOK FOR 1856—with a new and correct Map. By NATHAN H. PARKER. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 187.

An excellent and reliable account of Iowa, its climate, soil, cities, towns—in a word, everything the emigrant needs, besides being a valuable addition to our statistical library.

THE MINNESOTA HAND-BOOK. By NATHAN H. PARKER. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 159.

Uniform with the last mentioned work, by the same author, and crowded with reliable details. These works will have an extensive sale.

THE AMERICAN POULTRYMAN'S COMPANION. By C. N. REMENT. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 4to. pp. 384.

Mr. Rement is reliable authority on the subject of fowl-breeding, and his treatise is comprehensive, thorough and practical. The book before us is finely printed, and has 120 beautiful illustrations on wood and steel. Every man who has a poultry-yard should own this book. For sale by Redding & Co.

JOHN NEAL.

The accompanying portrait, from the pencil of Barry, after an admirable photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, of this city, is a reliable likeness of one of the most distinguished American writers of poetry and prose. John Neal was born in Portland, about the year 1794. In 1815, he went to Baltimore, and engaged in business in partnership with John Pierpont. The disastrous results of their commercial enterprise induced Neal, who was a man of genius, and spirit, and energy, to turn his attention to literature, for which he had a peculiar aptitude. He made his debut as an author in the "Portico," a monthly magazine, to which he contributed a series of vigorous critical essays on the works of Lord Byron. These essays were very favorably received by the public. In 1818, he published his first novel, "Keep Cool," and the next year he produced the "Battle of Niagara, Goldau the Maniac Harper, and other Poems, by John O'Catara," acknowledging the authorship in a subsequent edition. In the same year was published "Otho, a tragedy," from his pen. In 1821, appeared Allen's "History of the American Revolution," a large portion of which was from Neal's facile and busy pen. In 1822, he wrote "Logan," his second novel, published in Philadelphia, and reprinted in London. The next year appeared "76," perhaps the most popular of his stories, and "Randolph," a book which derives peculiar interest from its graphic sketches of the most prominent characters of the day. We believe that "Errata, or the Works of Will Adams," is referable to the same date. All of these compositions bear evidence of rapidity of execution, for Neal at that time was almost an impromptu writer. There are passages both in his poetry and prose which remind us in brilliancy of Wilson, and he wrote with the same facility. "Randolph," a work in two volumes, was written in the short space of a month, and "76," his best novel, in three weeks, and this while engaged in professional business. These various publications gave him a literary reputation abroad, for at that time American writers were few and far between, and the debut of a man of undoubted genius on this side of the water, was hailed as an auspicious event by the more generous of British critics. It was thus heralded, that Mr. Neal went to England, where he met with a very warm reception. His career was an exemplification of the Horatian adage: "Caelum non animam mutant qui trans mare currunt." At that time, this country, its institutions and society were very little understood in England, and John Neal took up the cudgel, in defence of his native land, with spirit and effect. His various articles in periodicals and newspapers, correcting these prevalent misrepresentations, did us "yeoman's service." The columns of Blackwood's Magais supported by olive branches, and a gilded star radiates from the expanded page. On the bow is a carved figure of a female, carrying the word of God in her hand as an offering to the benighted heathen. Rev. S. L. Pomroy, corresponding secretary of the Board of Missions, in the remarks he made at the launch, explained to the Sunday school children assembled to witness the spectacle, that she was called the "Morning Star," because, when it arose, the morning star indicated that the sun was about to shine upon mankind, and morning and light were coming; so wherever this vessel sailed, it would announce the dispelling of darkness and the dawning of the Sun of Righteousness. This fine little vessel has been built by the united contributions of the Sunday school scholars of the country. Her capital stock amounts to $12,000, divided into 120,000 shares of ten cents. The little ship-owners who watched the first meeting of the "Morning Star" with the element which, we trust, she is destined to traverse in safety for many and many a year, manifested the deepest interest. She is commanded by Captain Samuel G. Moore, of New York, and the first land she makes will be the Sandwich Islands; thence she will sail to various other islands in the Pacific. May prosperous gales waft her over the two oceans she must cross, and may her future career realize all those pure hopes and designs which gave rise to her creation!

BUDA AND PESTH, HUNGARY.

The two cities delineated in the engraving at the foot of this page are most romantically situated on the banks of the Danube, one of the most picturesque of European streams. They are connected together by the beautiful suspension bridge seen in the centre of our picture. This bridge, five hundred yards long, cost the enormous sum of $3,250,000. Previous to its erection, the only communication was by means of a bridge of boats. The suspension bridge was not fully completed until 1849, but previous to its being opened to the public, its strength was tested in an unexpected manner, for it bore the weight of the whole force of the Hungarian army pouring over it, hotly pursued by the Austrian troops. For nearly two whole days the platform of the bridge was densely crowded with masses of soldiery. Buda is a free city of the Austrian empire, and the capital of Hungary.

It is 130 miles southeast of Vienna, and is built on the right bank of the Danube, which, it must be remembered, occupies the left side of our picture. The city is situated on the slope of a hill, and is amphitheatrical in its shape. In its centre is the citadel, an old fortress, enclosing the royal palace, in which are preserved the insignia of Hungarian royalty, and the buildings of the central administration. The other principal edifices are the cathedral, the garrison church, various convents, and the palatial residences of the Hungarian nobility. It is the residence of the viceroys or palatines of Hungary, the seat of a lieutenant-general of the administration of the royal treasure, and of a commander general. The observatory on the Blocksburg, connected with the University of Pesth, is one of the finest in Europe. A type foundry, a gymnasium and several libraries on this side of the river, are also connected with the same institution. A cannon foundry and powder mills are connected with its arsenal. There are some manufactures of cloth, leather, silk and velvets in the city, and wine of excellent quality is produced in its vicinity. There are hot sulphur springs, which have led to the erection of extensive baths. Buda is supposed to derive its name from Buda, a brother of Attila, who resided here. Old Buda, a little further up the Danube, Sicambria of the Romans, was a place of some importance in their time. Buda was taken by the Turks, under Solyman the Magnificent, in 1541, was garrisoned by janissaries, and became the seat of a pacha. It was retaken by the Austrians in 1685. It was made the Hungarian seat of government in 1784. Crossing the suspension bridge to the left bank of the Danube, the right of our picture, we find ourselves in the city of Pesth, a considerable portion of which is seen in our engraving. Unlike Buda, it is situated on level ground, and is about seven miles in circumference. It is a large place, with at least 100,000 inhabitants. The older portion of the city is not very attractive, but the modern part is finely built. The principal edifices are the theatre, the casino, the artillery depot, together with various convents, churches and hospitals. It has good accommodations for travellers in the way of hotels, and many of the private residences are elegant and costly. It has the only university in Hungary. Here also are a botanic garden, a veterinary hospital, a very valuable national museum with a fine library and cabinets of antiquities, coins, medals, etc., a Hungarian academy of sciences, schools under the charge of various religious denominations, and charitable institutions. Pesth is the seat of the Royal Board of Council and the Septemviral Tafel, together forming the supreme court of appeal. Various manufactures are carried on in the place, but the principal is the manufacture of meerschaum or pipe bowls from the rough material brought from Constantinople. The city is immediately surrounded, on the land side, by the "Rahosfield," a wide plain, on which the Hungarian Diet, the great national assembly of Magyars, was held for many centuries. The gathering together of the deputies, with their vast retinue of vassals, the nobles in splendid attire, and all in picturesque costume, must have presented a most striking spectacle. More than one hundred thousand men, a vast army, assembled on these occasions. The present employment of this field clashes with its grand historical souvenirs, for it is now only used for horse races. Pesth is supposed by antiquaries to occupy the site of the ancient Transactinum. In the 13th century, it was walled in. The Turks held possession of it for more than a century and a half. The inundations of the Danube, in 1838, it will be remembered, occasioned heavy losses of life and property both in Buda and Pesth. Buda is a station for steam packets, one of which is shown in our engraving. The view of Buda and Pesth, from a high point, with the curving Danube, and bold hills in the distance, as we have shown them, is remarkably striking.

JOHN NEAL, ESQ.

THE NEW MISSIONARY PACKET, MORNING STAR.

zine were opened to him by Professor Wilson, and he contributed there some valuable papers on American topics, as well as miscellanies. It was during his four years' residence in Europe that his "Brother Jonathan" came out, and after his return to Portland, his native city and present residence, he published "Rachel Dyer," the "Down Easters," "Ruth Elder," and "Anthraxis." He also edited the "Yankee," a weekly journal for two years, and has contributed largely to our leading periodicals and papers. Mr. Neal has written much, both poetry and prose, that deserves to live, and we sincerely trust that a selection of his works, revised by himself, will be given to the public by some enterprising publisher. Since his principal works were published, a new generation of readers has sprung up, and the fire, imagination and sound sense of Neal would not appeal to them in vain.

THE MISSIONARY BRIG "MORNING STAR."

We present herewith a fine representation of the Missionary Brig "Morning Star" under canvass, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Hill. She was recently launched at Stetson's yard, Chelsea, in the presence of an immense concourse of spectators, some of them attracted by curiosity, but the greater part by the deep interest they felt in the missionary cause. She is a noble specimen of American naval architecture. She is brigantine built, 90 feet in length, 24 feet in breadth, and nine feet in depth. She has a house on deck, with accommodations for her crew, and four state rooms for passengers. Her cabin extends from the stem to the mainmast. It is commodious, and very beautifully fitted up. Her stern has a fine specimen of basso-relievo carving, gilded, and represents an open Bible, resting on a cushion, with tassels on the corners. This central figure

BUDA AND PESTH, ON THE DANUBE.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

DECEMBER.

BY FREDERICK J. KEYS.

He's come! he's come! December's come!
In the track of the wanling year;
And coldly whistle his chilly winds
Through the forests so lonely and drear.
The autumn flower that in beauty bloomed,
Through the Indian summer day,
In silence has faded and scattered its leaves,
And passed from the earth away.

He's come! he's come! December's come!
With his sceptre of faded leaves—
With his rustling robe and his frost-gemmed crown,
Which the storm and the tempest weaves.
While he rushes by on his pinnions of wrath,
Nor stops on the lighted plain;
For dark are the clouds that loom on his path,
And short is his dreary reign.

He's come! he's come! December's come!
He hastens through forest and bower;
To scatter forward upon his track
The remnants of leaf and flower.
The old oak tree and the stately elm
Bow low as he passes on.
With murmurs like sounds from shattered harps,
Whose music is dead and gone.

He's come! he's come! December's come!
On his war-horse of wrath and strife;
And many a flower at his touch shall fade
From the beautiful garden of life;
And many a lamb shall be missed from the fold
Of affection and friendship true;
Nor e'er he found by the meadows green,
Where the river of death runs through.

He's come! he's come! December's come!
O'er the chilling earth he steals
Like a spirit borne from the icy north,
With the winter at his heels.
While far from his youth in the desert of time,
Man findeth the fountain of tears;
And mourns from the lonely depths of his heart,
O'er the gloomy December of years.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SISTERS OF A KING.

A TALE OF THE NINTH CENTURY.

BY PHILIP HARRIS, JR.

In the Rue de la Harpe, in one of the oldest "quartiers" of Paris, and not far from the renowned University of the Sorbonne, stand the ruins of the Palace of Julian—one of the many monuments of Roman skill and splendor which travellers in Europe may still admire. A hoary, wicked, old ruin falling away in fragments, as it stands there grimly shivering through the long winter nights, doorless and roofless, and deserted.

Like all human greatness, it had its day, and a long and tedious one it was. One shudders to think of the crimes done within those walls. Julian the Apostate did perhaps the only great and virtuous deed that palace ever knew, when he resolved to rescind the empire from the tyranny of his own kinsman, and answered the call of his legions, who loudly proclaimed him emperor. Here were done the dark crimes, the faithless turpitudes of the two first races of Gallic kings,—deeds to be told in whispers, and in Christian charity, to be soon forgotten. So it was once a noble structure; it is now an empty ruin. Even the towers that defended it have passed away. I think they were conscious that now they had grown useless; so they shook, and tottered, and stood a little longer, nodding at each other across that vast deserted garden, till, one by one, they too fell, and men have almost forgotten them.

I wander about in the Thermæ, the spacious baths of the imperial household; I can even see the niches where the old marble bathing-tubs stood. As I stand surrounded by this desolation, funny (willing artificer!) is busy about the men and women of long ago, who used to revel and quaff their Falernian in mirth and jollity at night, and bathed here the next morning—for the sick headache, perhaps. Tastes differ; we of a better age laugh at the ancients, and, for our part, much prefer soda water or small beer to the strigil. Our posterity will use us no better, I dare say; our likes and dislikes will not be theirs; our sublime will, perhaps, be their ridiculous.

We are thinking of times long, long gone by. Ah! since those days, history has turned many a fresh leaf in the record, and covered it oftener with blood, and tears, and shame: how seldom with the golden annals of public and private virtue!

When I visited the Palais des Thermes, in 18—, it was with my learned friend L—e, a man devoted to literature, and an enthusiastic antiquarian. We went over the ruins and the neighboring Hôtel de Cluny, that quaint old mouse-hole that all antiquity has contributed to fill with curious old rubbish; and when we emerged again into the street, L—e said:

"You have now seen a ruin which a Roman emperor's heart would bleed to look upon. Who knows," he added, musingly, "but that may be their punishment in a world of retribution."

"Come, L—e," said I, "you are a dreamer. We have yet an hour before our evening walk on the Boulevards; you, who know all antiquity by heart—have you no legend of this old palace, to while it away pleasantly?"

"That I have," answered my companion, who has a true Frenchman's love for telling a story. "Come over to yonder cabaret with me, and, over a bottle of old Burgundy, I will tell you a legend of the Palais des Thermes."

When the buxom bar-maid had brought us our wine, and we had pledged each other—only once, my dear madam, I assure you,—my friend began as follows:

"Good old Charlemagne was dead and buried, and his son and heir, Louis le Debonnaire, was daily expected in the capital, where, one fine evening in February, in the year 814, a large crowd of burghers was collected in front of this old palace, even then called the Ancien Palais. People went into the street in those times, as they now make a point to read their morning paper, for the sake of keeping up with the events of the day. Every one asked his neighbor that evening, not without some visible anxiety, when the king might be expected to arrive.

"While the crowd was still on that subject, and a few others of lesser importance—a little of love-making, a good deal of gossip, and a very little bargaining, for we Frenchmen are adverse to business out of hours—"

"Which being interpreted," I put in, "means from cock-crow to curfew."

"Bah! don't be disagreeable. Burgundy?" and he pushed the decanter over to my side of the table. "Well, while this respectable crowd was thus variously engaged, two horsemen were seen riding towards the palace at a furious speed. Though they were clothed in complete armor, their raised vizors revealed countenances both handsome and manly. In those eventful days, when the honest burgher might, at any moment, see war at his very door, it needed only the clatter of hoofs to bring tradespeople to their shop-doors, and the old women to their windows. They now stood on either side of the street, holding torches, and lighting the way for the strangers as they rapidly sprung by to the palace gate. At their heels ran a ragged mob—the scum of Paris—eager for the news, and more still for their wonted dole at the hands of the new monarch. Meanwhile, the burghers indulged in every sort of curious conjecture as to this remarkable arrival.

"Our good king comes at last," said a corpulent old draper,—"the best king that ever wore a crown."

"Marry! you forget Charlemagne," answered his neighbor, an old man-at-arms in the late king's service.

"Charlemagne is dead and buried; God rest his soul! I say, long life to good King Louis!"

"As this dialogue was going on in one part of the crowd, another group were as intently engaged in their own speculations, at the opposite end of the façade.

"O, see, mama, how handsome our king is!" exclaimed a pretty maid all in blushes.

"Which one do you take to be the king, my pretty?" asked an old veteran, standing near her.

"The fair-haired one, with the scarlet scarf."

"You've missed it for once, petite: it is only a knight."

"Mon Dieu! when will he come?" asked the girl, impatiently.

"Now there stood just in front of her an honest jeweller, who had come out to air his politics, and had brought his better, and, by a good hundred-weight, his larger half with him. He heard the girl's exclamation, and desirous of showing how much he knew of the profound secrets of the state, he forthwith began talking at her to his wife.

"He will soon be here," said he; "these knights precede him but little."

"The woman did not see her lord's stratagem."

"O, you want to seem to know everything," she said, somewhat spitefully. "Did you not tell me those four horsemen who passed through our street yesterday came to announce that the king was at hand?"

"My dear," returned the jeweller, losing none of his composure, but with the air of one who has not forgotten his "swashing blow,"—"my dear, you make me blush for your stupidity. Those four were nothing but men-at-arms; these two are barons. I can assure you I have sold them jewelry more than once, and of a sort, too, that only suits your rich and noble young courtiers."

"And pray, sir, who are they?" timidly asked the little maid.

"It was what Monsieur l'Orfèvre wanted; he turned to her with his blandest smile, and said, complacently:

"The one on the black charger was Lambert Odier, the three others—"

"I didn't mean the men-at-arms, stupid! I meant the two barons who buy so much jewelry of you."

"O—ah—I—I don't know exactly. You see, one has so many customers, one doesn't—one can't—"

"The girl turned away with an air of vexation, and left our poor jeweller wishing his wife ten times as large as she was, so he might hide in a fold of her gown.

"The knights had already alighted in the court of the palace. Thence they ascended wearily into the body of the building, where they were met by the grand seneschal of the palace—an officer then not yet called by a wrong name. He commanded the doors to be closed behind them, and himself led the way into the interior chambers, signing to the young men to follow him. His manner was so extraordinary and almost ominous that the knights looked at each other in amazement at such a strange reception. Reassured, however, by the recollection of the unusual favors the king had shown them, and by the royal letter of which they were the bearers to the seneschal, they followed him in silence. A long dark vaulted passage, with a very sensible descent, brought them to a low arched hall, dimly lighted by the torches of the attendants. Here the seneschal seated himself, and proceeded to ask the young men their names.

"Paul de Ligi," spoke the younger. And the other, in a manner and tone which showed he was not ashamed of his kindred, "Robert Count de Guerci, my lord."

"The king," said de Ligi, "tarries not long; he bade us announce his coming, and we have not rested a moment since we first put foot to stirrup. So, my lord seneschal, you see before you two men as weary as a long ride could make them, and as hungry as wolves. Be pleased, therefore, to give orders for our entertainment, and let us have convenient apartments wherein to rest awhile. I promise you the king our master will not grudge you his thanks."

"The seneschal smiled grimly, without raising his eyes from the king's letter, which he had been perusing.

"De Ligi is right," added Guerci, beginning to have doubts as to the meaning of this man's conduct; "and, if we are to judge from the unusual favors our king has designed to show us—"

"You are my prisoners, my lords!" broke in the seneschal, rising abruptly.

"Prisoners!" exclaimed the young men, at one breath. "Why, and for what?"

"Question your own consciences."

"But the king's letter—"

"Is an order to guard you closely in separate dungeons."

"Divide us?—never!" exclaimed the two friends. "Dost thou hear him, Guerci? They wish to divide us! We, who have lived thus long together! But we will rather die together!"

"The seneschal would be obeyed, however; so the guards tore the young men apart, and led them each to a separate cell in the subterranean prisons of the palace.

"Left alone in that prison, over whose vaulted roof the gardens of the royal residence extended, the thoughts of Paul de Ligi were anything but pleasant. He had left Paris only a year before, full of hope and in high favor with the monarch; a daughter of Charlemagne had even smiled on his love. Now he returned to be cast into a dungeon, where he had expected a far pleasanter duration. Did Rotrude know he was languishing in a prison? Perhaps at this very moment the princess might be walking over his living tomb, and thinking of him, little dreaming he was buried alive beneath. Nor was this all his trouble. To be separated, at such a moment, from his sworn brother-in-arms, made still dearer to him because he loved Rotrude's sister—this it was that added the keenest poignancy to his grief. "O that he at least were here," exclaimed De Ligi, "that we might speak of them, and with our last breath mingle together their names and our sorrows!"

He rested his head on his hand, and remained long absorbed in bitter thought, from which a sudden sound of footsteps aroused him. The door opened, and Robert, leading a veiled lady by the hand, stood before him.

"What means this?" exclaimed Ligi, in surprise.

"Gilla—for it was she—raised her veil, and stood before him pale and trembling.

"Not a moment must he last—"

"But Rotrude?"

"My sister is near by; we knew your condition, and are here to save you."

"Come, Paul," put in Guerci, "help me, for Heaven's sake, to remove this slab. Behind it is a secret door, and Rotrude shall pay you for the trouble."

"But for love's sake, lords, depart quickly. Should the king know of this, we are all lost."

"Alas!" cried the count, bitterly, "the ashes of Charlemagne are yet warm in their urn, and Louis rules us already with a rod of iron. Accursed is he who only knows how to punish!"

"Traitors!" cried a terrible voice, as the door swung open, and from the secret passage, the king strode forth, leading the trembling Rotrude by the hand.

Paul and Robert stood aghast; the princesses had fallen on their knees, and raised their suppliant hands towards their brother. He stood over them, in an attitude of cold scorn. The king spoke at last:

"Ha! Count de Guerci, you doubt our clemency?" and he laughed that bitter laugh of his. "And you, sister Rotrude, pay me a poor compliment by flying in such horror at my approach. But come, we will be merciful. Your loves have not escaped me. Count de Guerci, you love Gilla; De Ligi, you, too, have the plighted faith of a daughter of Charlemagne. The altar awaits you. And now," continued the king, regardless of their expressions of gratitude,—"now, my brave knights, you shall don the rich armor which your king is pleased to offer you as a proof of his regard. You, my sisters, may go for the nuptial wreaths my foresight has provided."

He motioned to the esquires who had brought in the armor to harness the knights.

"You may suppose Gilla and Rotrude were not long in returning. They found the two friends clothed in magnificent armor, and seated in two large arm-chairs. At their approach, they stirred not; at their call, they made no answer; at their touch, they no longer thrilled with pleasure. Paul and Robert were dead!

"In the year 1560, in excavating some of the ruins in the old garden, there was found a helmet of such peculiar construction that, on touching a spring on the outside, the vizor would shut hermetically, while the throat-piece closed upon the victim who wore it, producing immediate strangulation. Within this helmet was found the skull of a young man. A legend of a Venetian monk reveals this mystery; but, whilst it tells this horrid tale, it goes on with the utmost serenity to give the son of Charlemagne the usual name of Louis the Good-natured!"

"Lucus a non lucendo," said I.

"Exactly. And now, how do you like it?" asked L—e, draining his glass.

"Capital Burgundy, by Jove!" said I, looking over my glass at him.

"Humph!"

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

The expenditures of the quartermaster's department for the army, for the last fiscal year, amounted to nearly $7,000,000. — In the reign of Queen Margaret, of Scotland, the parliament passed an act, that any maiden lady, of high or low degree, should have the liberty to choose for a husband the man on whom she set her fancy. If a man refused to marry her, he was heavily fined, according to the value of his worldly possessions. — James D. Porter, of Louisville, Ky., stands seven feet nine inches in his stockings, and is said to be the tallest man in America. — A gentleman residing in North Weymouth has a dog in his possession that will betake himself to the water and secrete himself among a number of decoys arranged for the purpose, until a flock of wild ducks alight near him, when he will seize upon one of their number with his mouth, and convey it ashore to his master. — In Greece, at the present day, so Mr. Baird tells us, the birth of a daughter is as much the subject of condolence, as the birth of a son is one of congratulation. — Eighty-six Peruvian llamas arrived recently at Havana, having been imported for the Cuban authorities, by M. Rohen, a French naturalist. A considerable reward had been offered to the first person who should succeed in introducing these useful animals into the island, where they are designed for beasts of burthen. — Just out of the city of Mecca, where Mahomet was born in the year 751, is pointed out the hill, where, it is said, Abraham went to offer up Isaac, in the year 1871 before Christ. — This section of Minnesota, says the Henderson Democrat, is alive with the finest varieties of game. Deer, turkeys, geese, prairie chickens, etc., abound to an extent satisfactory to the most eager sportsman. Almost every day wagon loads of wild fowls enter that place. — The bird of paradise is a native of North Guinea, near the equator. They emigrate to Arco in flights, but will not live in confinement. — The Hartford Courant is informed by several correspondents, that there are no less than twenty fair banks in full operation in that city, and that there is more gambling carried on there than in any city of its size in the Union. — Boston glories justly in her schools. Her seventy-eight school-houses have cost $1,602,333, of which $149,733 was expended last year. — Eight thousand returning emigrants have embarked at New York for Europe in the last six months—a considerable number of them, however, to visit their friends and induce them to return with them to this country. — A locomotive was thrown from the track the other day, in Maine, by coming in contact with a moose which weighed a thousand pounds. — The world is indebted to the Russian empire for one event of great importance. Religious toleration is proclaimed throughout the Turkish empire, and equal civil rights accorded to the Christians and the Mohammedans. — Charles Dickens was once a strolling actor. — The Circassians only consider a woman as of one half the value of a warrior; our fair readers will be shocked to hear, that the legal fine for slaying one is only one half the fine for killing a man. — Throughout Italy horses are fed on good baked barley and coarse wheat bread, which is sliced with a knife, and given to them several times a day, when travelling. — The noted post-office robber, Townsend, has again broke out of New-castle jail. He cut his irons, and broke a passage through the floor of the cell and is now at liberty. This is his third successful escape.

GROWTH OF NEW ORLEANS.

The commerce of New Orleans, for the past year, has been larger than for any previous year. We also learn from the Crescent, that a large number of buildings are in the course of erection in that city, involving an expenditure of more than two millions of dollars. Among them are two splendid churches, two orphan asylums, one Jewish and one Catholic, a Mechanics' Institute, one medical school, a Jewish Synagogue, a cotton press to cost about $150,000; a house for James Robb, to cost $75,000; several other houses, costing from $12,000 to $35,000 each, and a large number of stores, costing from $10,000 to $20,000 each. The new custom house will not be completed in several years; it will cost $3,250,000. We are happy to record such unmistakable evidences of the prosperity of New Orleans, one of the most patriotic and enterprising of American cities.

SEARCHING THE SCRIPTURES.—It has been asserted that no one ever read the Scriptures regularly and thoroughly without being, or becoming, not only religious, but sensible and consistent. Dr. Johnson said that Hume owned to a clergyman in the bishopric of Durham, that he had never read the New Testament with attention. People are very ready to attack what they do not understand.

DYING CONFESSION.—The infamous Cæsar Borgia, on his death-bed, exclaimed:—"I have provided, in the course of my life, for everything except death; and now, alas, I am to die, although entirely unprepared."

LANGUAGE.—Language is the amber in which a thousand precious thoughts have been safely embedded and preserved. So says Trench—and you can't "open that trench" without digging up something valuable.

LITTLE SINS.—A little hole in a ship sinks it; so a little sin sometimes produces a man's utter ruin. We should guard against "small vices," as well as great errors.

TRUE PHILOSOPHY.—Joseph Bonaparte wrote to his brother, the emperor, "All is vanity except a good conscience and self-respect."

Wayside Gatherings.

A woman in Salem, Mass., recently died in four hours from the effects of a spider bite.

Mrs. Ruth Pennington died from the effects of a severe fit of sneezing, in Baltimore.

The London Daily News thinks it probable that Queen Victoria will soon visit Canada.

The pacha of Egypt has made a contract with a French house to light Alexandria with gas.

Mlle. Tagliani, younger sister of the great dancer, has appeared successfully at Berlin as an actress.

The Prussian government, by a new decree, pronounces death against any one selling poison, by which life is lost.

Gov. Clark has pardoned Sylvanus Butler, of Utica, who was sentenced to three years in the State prison for passing counterfeit money.

A man named S. H. Patterson was shot in the streets of Charleston by Robert Lynes. The shooting was caused by an ordinary quarrel.

Miss Louisa Reeder, the actress and authoress, is no longer Miss Reeder, having married a wealthy gentleman in Baltimore. She is now Mrs. Doctor Wright.

Joseph Oakes recently shot and killed his step-brother, William Sylvester, in Baltimore, for insulting his sisters and a young lady who was paying them a visit.

It is a mistake to suppose that newspapers are printed for amusement, and that printers deem it a compliment when a friend begs half a dozen to give away.

A farmer returning home in his wagon, after delivering a load of corn, is a more certain sign of national prosperity, than a nobleman riding in his chariot to the opera.

The first bank was established by the Lombard Jews, A. D., 808. The word bank is derived from banco—a bench, which was erected in the market-place for the exchange of money.

A man of sound mind and temperate habits recently hung himself in the woods near Poughkeepsie, New York, because of some hard words with his family about sleeping accommodations.

A little son of Mr. J. D. Martin, of Greene county, Ill., was so badly gored by a vicious beast, lately, that he died from his injuries. The horn of the animal penetrated his skull just above the left eye.

A Washington letter says that contracts for deepening the Mississippi have been concluded with Messrs. Craig & Righton, of Kentucky. They contract to execute the work, and maintain it four years and a half, for $320,000.

Charlotte Smith and Louis Hines—the former twenty and the latter fourteen years of age—have been sentenced in Pittsburg, Pa., to nearly three years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, for setting fire to one of the dormitories of the House of Refuge, in which they were inmates.

Jack Cross, alias Jack Morrison, who has for several years past resided at Madison, Orange county, Texas, and whose hands are stained with the murder of some half dozen human beings, including one William Sutherland, of that parish, three years ago, was lately arrested in an interior town of Louisiana.

One of the first young men in Paris has been obliged to fly the country in consequence of heavy losses—a million of francs, it is said—by gambling at one of the fashionable clubs—debts his family refuse to pay. He is said to be en route for the Fifth Avenue. Surely, some New York lady will take pity on him.

M. Cabot, founder of the Learian community at Nauvoo, died at St. Louis, of an attack of apoplexy. M. Cabot's name has been brought prominently before the public within the past four or five years, in connection with his new socialistic enterprise, and he has been subjected to much criticism and animadversion.

A powder horn was discovered lately on one of the "Hunting Islands," near the mouth of the Morgan River, in South Carolina, marked "Randolph." It is the only trace ever discovered of the revenue cutter Hamilton, Captain Randolph, which was lost, with all hands, off Charleston Bar, in 1853, and never heard of.

A most singular suicide is mentioned by the Eastport (Me.) papers, as having occurred in that city. A Mr. Norton, butcher, had been missing for some hours, and after a diligent search was made, he was found in a hog-head of water, with his hands tied behind him. In this position he had terminated his existence.

A Pittsburg (Pa.) paper calculates the loss to the merchants, manufacturers, mechanics and mariners of that city, since last June, by the suspension of river navigation, is not less than $1,500,000, and pertinently inquires, "What might have been done with that much money, if applied to the improvement of the Ohio River?"

The Parisians have been amused of late by a man who walks on the water. He is supported by small air-tight boxes strapped to his feet, and has a pole in his hands, with a bladder at each end, with which he touches the water, and restores his equilibrium when about to tip over. He walks with the greatest apparent ease up and down the Seine.

In Camden, N. J., a Mr. and Mrs. Frost have been arrested on the horrible charge of causing the death of one of their own offspring. They had been interrogated, it is said, on several occasions, in reference to the disappearance of their child, and failing to give any satisfactory answer, search was instituted, and an infant answering the one in question was found dead in a basket on the Cooper's Creek Road.

A German in Patterson, N. J., named Frederick, committed suicide by drowning, on account of disappointment in love. He made money enough in this country to send for his girl from Germany; and after her arrival here postponed his marriage till he had money enough for a nice wedding. Meantime, his lady-love became acquainted with another German, and got married, whereupon Frederick drowned himself.

Some "man of the world" gives the following rule for the observance of young married ladies:—"Loll in bed until eleven, A. M., and have your toast and coffee à la Grecque. Rise at one, and adorn yourself to attend the most fashionable church. Be sure everything you wear is of the very latest style, otherwise there is no necessity for your going. A person who does not create surprise and numberless remarks in passing up the aisle, is not worthy of notice from any one."

A scuffle in Trenton, N. J., lately, resulted fatally. Joshua Rawnsley, the deceased, and George Rotherham, were romping good-naturedly, but roughly. Rawnsley ran into a tavern, where Rotherham followed him. In going out, Rotherham gave him a push backwards; he fell and struck his head on the curb-stone, causing concussion of the brain and death. Rotherham, as soon as he heard of Rawnsley's death, immediately left the city. If captured, he will probably be execrated from all criminality in the case, it being accidental.

Foreign Items.

Carlyle is about to write a life of Washington. He could not select a nobler subject.

Jules Gerard, the lion-killer, has been robbed of 70,000 francs confided to him by a friend to buy land in Algeria.

Suicide has been extremely prevalent the present season, in France. Six persons killed themselves in one day in Paris.

The accounts of the recent earthquake in Egypt were exaggerated. At Cairo, however, much alarm was felt. Among other incidents, Mlle. Rachel rushed from the house in her night dress.

The "Schiller Society," in Germany, has purchased the house in which the poet lived, in Gohlis, for a sum of $2000; the building is an old tumble-down tenement, and has long been offered for sale.

It is said that Maximilian, of Bavaria, has recently shown a great interest in geological matters, and under his auspices, in the various quarries of his kingdom, many curious and beautiful petrifactions have been brought to light.

New apples of extraordinary excellence have been discovered in the Crimea—one of which keeps until July, and an autumn apple, thought to be the best ever tasted in any country. They will doubtless find their way to America and England.

Some soldiers, who were firing a Minie rifle at a target at Magdeburg, at a distance of 1000 paces, hit and mortally wounded a laborer at work 700 paces beyond. A sheep was accidentally killed in England with the Enfield rifle, from a distance of 2500 yards.

The Journal de Constantinople announces that in a battle fought on the river Kuban, the Russians left 16 guns and 800 prisoners in the hands of the Circassians. It is also announced that the Russians have been driven back from the river Kuban, with the loss of many men and guns.

Sands of Gold.

.... No good writer was ever long neglected; no great man overlooked by men equally great. Impatience is a proof of inferior strength, and a destroyer of what little there may be.—Landor.

.... It is sometimes quite enough for a man to feign ignorance of that which he knows, to gain the reputation of knowing that of which he is ignorant.—Voltaire.

.... Of all studies, the most delightful and the most useful is biography. The seeds of great events lie near the surface; historians delve too deep for them. No history was ever true.—Landor.

.... The proverbial wisdom of the populace at gates, on roads, and in markets, instructs the attentive ear of him who studies man, more fully than a thousand rules ostentatiously arranged.—Lavater.

.... To me the progress of society consists in nothing more than in bringing out the individual, in giving him a consciousness of his own being, and in quickening him to elevate and strengthen his own mind.—Channing.

.... Aim at perfection in everything, though in most things it is unattainable. However, they who aim at it, and persevere, will come much nearer to it than those whose laziness and despondency make them give it up as unattainable.—Chesterville.

.... Now and then you meet with a person so exactly formed to please, that he will gain upon every one that hears or beholds him; this disposition is not merely the gift of nature, but frequently the effect of much knowledge of the world, and a command over the passions.—Addison.

Joker's Budget.

There is one evil that doctors in length of time do effectually cure us of—and that is, the faith we place in their nostrums.

The lady whose dress was too dirty to wear, and not dirty enough to be washed, had a matter of serious import to decide.

A newspaper was started not long ago, the first number of which contained a letter from a correspondent, who signed himself "a constant reader."

An Irishman, who lived in an attic, being asked what part of the house he occupied, answered:—"If the house were turned topsy-turvy, I'd be livin' on the first flure!"

We see advertised as for sale by a certain firm, "Candles for City Consumption." This, we presume, is a new method of preparing cod liver oil as a remedy for consumption.

Wise persons, when they take advice, go to a physician, but fools go to a quack—and the large disproportion between the two classes explains why so many quacks make their fortunes, whilst many a clever physician starves.

A friend of ours says that he has been without money so long, that his head aches "ready to split" when he tries to recollect how a silver dollar looks. He says the notion that "we live in a world of change," is a great fallacy.

A late celebrated judge, who stooped very much when walking, had a stone thrown at him one day, which fortunately passed over him without hitting him. Turning to his friend, he remarked:—"Had I been an upright judge, that might have caused my death!"

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of BalloU's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

THE BOQUET MAN.

GINGER NUTS

THE BOOT BLACK.

THE BOWERY BOY.

THE BROADWAY SWELL.

SKETCHES FROM THE HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS
of
NEW YORK

GLASS PUT IN !

LETTER PAPER.

THE BLIND BEGGAR

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. { Vol. XI., No. 26.—Whole No. 286.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

MERCHANTS' BANK BUILDING, STATE STREET.

We present below a very fine view of the exterior of the Merchants' Bank building, corner of State and Exchange Streets, drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Waud, and mathematically correct in all its details, besides having a fine artistic effect. The building which occupied the site of the new edifice was massive and enduring, but it was removed to give place to a more commodious and splendid structure. The old columns of Chelmsford granite, the most conspicuous feature of the old bank, have been recut and fluted, so that the whole front now present a uniformity of color. The first story and a portion of the basement above the sidewalk are combined to form a plain and solid substructure for the second or principal story, and the third story, which are formed into an arcaded order. On the State Street front, this is divided into five compartments, the two angle compartments projecting somewhat beyond the three central. These have two attached columns of the Ionic order, and the whole is surmounted by an attic with projecting pedestals over the columns below. On these pedestals are urn-shaped finials. The offices of the Merchants' Bank are on the second or principal floor. The new façade on Exchange Street consists of four compartments, treated similarly to those at the angles of the State Street façade. The whole of the work is executed in Concord granite, a material which, as regards color and durability, is not excelled by any building-material yet found. It is nearly white, having a very slight tinge of warmish gray, contrasting favorably with the bluer Quincy granite. The completed building reflects great credit on all concerned, and will be a conspicuous ornament to State Street. This street has changed astonishingly within half a century, the only landmark of the olden time, when it was King Street, being the Old State House. Long may it be before that veteran sentinel is removed—though we dare say there are innovators who would be glad to see it cashiered. As it is, it divides the stream of travel, and compresses it into two very narrow channels on the north and south. But though modern exigency is imperious, there are certain exceptional cases which ought to be conscientiously considered. The Old State House is identified with the history of the city and the nation; the silent and venerable witness of deeds recorded in imperishable annals,—deeds that will reverberate forever through the arches of time. It has looked down on many a patriotic meeting,—on many a scene of danger, glory and triumph. At its base was poured out the life-blood of the people, on that memorable moonlight winter night of 1770, when the British troops and the people of the city came into collision. It has survived many a trying political and financial crisis.

THE NEW MERCHANTS' BANK BUILDING, STATE STREET, BOSTON.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MABEL, THE RECTOR'S WARD:

—OR,—

TRUTH AND TREASON IN 1777.

BY MAJOR BEN: FENLEY POORE.

[CONCLUDED.]

CHAPTER XIX.

A CHAPTER OF INCIDENTS.

"Let's away,
And get our jewels and our wealth together.
Devise the fittest time and safest way
To hide us from pursuit that will be made
After our flight. Now go we in content,
To liberty and not to banishment."

"How is my prisoner?" said Colonel Dupre, that afternoon, as he entered Herbert Yancey's room. "Prisoners, I should have said though, gentlemen, for here are two of you."

Herbert frankly related the occurrences of the preceding night, at which the colonel laughed heartily.

"Who ever heard," said he, "of a prisoner's going forth to capture another, to keep him company? Jest aside, Mr. Ordway, I doubt if you are fairly taken, and shall not therefore report you."

"Is General Montgomery really dead?" asked Yancey.

"I regret to say that he is. The first discharge from our battery at the column which he commanded, killed him and his two aids-de-camp. Arnold was also wounded as he led on the other storming party, or we should have another story to tell. As it was, this Major Morgan and his Virginia Riflemen came very near capturing the place. But I have oversteaid my time. Au revoir!"

Before nightfall, Ordway grew ill, for, like Herbert Yancey, his wound acted upon his brain, and the next morning when Estelle came with her attendant, she found her patient totally unconscious. He lay thus for a long, long week, during which time Herbert and Estelle were much of the time at his bedside, striving to alleviate his anguish, though their hearts grew fainter and fainter at the daily visits of the surgeon, who would merely say, "No better—failing fast—all you can do is to make him comfortable."

Yet nature did triumph; and as the invalid gained strength, his tell-tale eyes would so follow the movements of his lovely nurse that Herbert could easily read the feelings which prompted the earnest gaze—gratitude, but above that, a higher, holier passion. The semi-civilized heart of the maiden was evidently equally filled with admiration for the daring, stalwart young mechanic, who, like herself, scorned the effeminate restraints of society, and worshipped at the shrine of freedom. Their position was such as to foster the growth of their passion, which could put forth leaf and flower, without an adverse wind to retard its growth. Day by day would they bask in the sunlight of each other's smiles, without even thinking whether the glad warmth would ever ripen it to perfect fruition, introduced alike by the chill of officious friendship, or the sneer of insidious envy. Neither vows nor declarations, promises nor plighting of troth was thought of, and they floated along on the full current of affection, unconscious of its depth, and regardless of rocks or whirlpools to be encountered.

One morning, the two young men heard the firing of minute guns, and soon the music of a full band, as it passed the castle, pealed forth a funeral march. Just then, Estelle came on her daily visit, but this time she was accompanied by Madame de Frontenac. After the usual salutations had been exchanged, Herbert inquired what was transpiring without.

"They are interring General Montgomery's remains with martial honors," said Madame de Frontenac. "Nor does it seem a year since Wolfe and Montcalm received the same honors."

"That was ten years ago, was it not?" inquired Yancey.

"Ten!" replied Ordway; "it is fifteen. I never shall forget the time, for it was while a sermon was being preached in honor of Wolfe's memory that a French vessel called the Saint Anne was wrecked on Plum Island. Crowds of the Newburyport people went down, and stood on the beach, but they could render no assistance."

"What!" eagerly exclaimed Madame de Frontenac. "Did you see the Saint Anne wrecked? And did all on board perish?"

"Not all," answered Frank Ordway. "I believe that some of her passengers and crew, who made a raft before the vessel drifted through the breakers, were able to get ashore at Ipswich. But only one living soul was saved at Newburyport."

"And that was—"

"It was a little girl, about whom my friend here can tell you more than I can, for I have often heard her say that a gold cross she always wore was the only distinguishing link between her life before and after the wreck. If I have not seen that very cross as Herbert has stooped over me in his night attire of late, my eyes deceive me."

Madame de Frontenac, with an hysterical laugh, sprang towards Herbert, and he, as if divining her desires, detached the cross from his neck. Seizing it with a convulsive movement, she gave it a twist, gazing on it the while as if her destiny was locked up within it. Ah! it moves—it opens, and the astonished spectators beheld the cross separated into two, opening on a pivot, with an inscription on the inner side of each. One half bore the name of Jules de Bourg Frontenac, the other that of Marguerita d'Artois.

"And she!" exclaimed the overjoyed mother. "Does my daughter live?"

A long explanation ensued, frequently interrupted by the overpowering happiness of Madame de Frontenac, who now began to yearn for the long treasured idol of her heart. While they were thus happily conversing, there was a knock at the door, and Colonel Dupre entered. He was evidently downcast and embarrassed from some cause, and seemed unwilling to speak. But at last he said:

"You well know, Mr. Yancey, that I considered you a victim to that villain Holbrook, and ever regretted having made a prisoner of you under such circumstances. Now—"

He paused, and all gazed at him as if his silence was ominous of bad news.

"Let me know the worst," said Herbert, in a tone which showed how difficult it was to control the terrible misgivings of his heart, "even if I am standing on the brink of a spy's grave."

"Nay—I hope that you will be rescued from such a position. But your misguided countrymen seem determined to keep up the siege, and the governor feels constrained to adopt harsh measures. You, unfortunately, were captured while on an expedition not recognized as entitling you to the humanity of war, and, I regret to say, a court martial has been ordered to try you to-morrow. The appearance of your friend here has not only given rise to unfavorable rumors about you, but he is also to be put on trial as your accomplice."

With a low bow and a look which expressed his sorrow at having been the bearer of such tidings, the colonel left the room. A dead silence reigned, and it seemed as though a funeral pall was already hung over the two young men, who sat buried in thought. But the effect of the news was most evident upon the Indian girl, who was untutored in those arts which refinement has adopted to conceal the wildest passion of the soul. Rising, she went up to Madame de Frontenac, and knelt before her.

"Mother," said she, "you have rescued the fawn from captivity, and she has grown up beneath your care. But another now shares her love. With him is one who has the affection of your own daughter—she of whom you have ever spoken. Shall we leave these young warriors here, perhaps to die like dogs? or shall we not go with them to their own land, that we may see them free, and thus you can gladden the daughter of your love and the unworthy child of your adoption?"

That night, Major Morgan, who was quartered at the Intendant's Palace, had invited the officers of his Rifle Battalion to sup with him, and the table was laid in the conservatory, now shorn of its vernal glories. The attendants had fled into the city on the approach of the continental forces, and the plants, deprived of artificial warmth, wore the gorgeous livery of the winter-king. Several balls from the city batteries had also made sad havoc with the glass roof, but it was nevertheless a capital place for a feast, and right merrily were the Virginians enjoying themselves.

All at once, and as if by magic, two men wearing the uniform of the Royal Canadians stepped from the large clump of palm trees in the centre, causing no small consternation. All sprang to their feet, and Morgan exclaimed:

"Turn out the guard! Have the long roll beat! If we are surprised, let us die like men!"

"For'd, boys,—for'd!" exclaimed one of the intruders.

And Morgan, gazing at him for a moment with a blank expression of astonishment, fairly shouted:

"Herbert Yancey, by the fates! and here is that Newburyport man, too, who was returned as killed! Are any more dead men with you?"

"No," replied Herbert, "but here are two ladies, and we ask for them, to whom we are indebted for life and for liberty, your respect."

It would be a difficult task to describe the scene that followed, after the ladies had been escorted to the room in the Intendant's Palace, which Madame de Frontenac had so long occupied. When they had been made as comfortable as circumstances would admit of, the two escaped prisoners returned, and inquiries and replies were interchanged like the volleys of musketry during the unsuccessful attempt to carry the city by storm. Major Morgan concocted a potent bowl of punch, and a scene of jovial revelry ensued that showed how those who had been considered dead—for such had been the official record against each name,—were esteemed by their comrades. True, the army was in a disabled condition, with nothing to encourage any hopes of success, and all respect for Colonel Arnold had vanished, since he refused to let Morgan take command when within the city on the night of the attack. Many, too, who had calivered the last social gathering, were now in their silent resting-places; but in war—as a gifted writer has truly said—the last shovelful of earth upon the grave buries both the dead and the mourning. Events so strikingly opposite in their character and influences succeed so rapidly one upon another, that the soldier's mind, kept in a whirl of excitement, accustoms itself to change with every phase of circumstances, regarding their succession as natural as that of the seasons.

The next morning, Yancey and Ordway reported themselves for duty, and reported a furlough, with leave to return to Massachusetts—a favor which Arnold could not refuse to grant them. It was evident to Herbert that he felt guilty, but no opportunity for apology was given, and they separated, never to meet again. A detachment of the wounded was returning to Albany, and the quartette accompanied the sleighs, passing through the forests without meeting with any remarkable adventure.

A month from the day on which they left Quebec, they entered Newburyport, and drove at once to the rectory, where Madame Ordway received her son with great joy; but alas! Mabel Gwynne was not there, neither did any one know where she was.

There was a wedding at the rectory, and the old house was crowded with spectators, eager to see their townsman, who had returned as it were from death, and brought a forest-flower to grace his home. The Sons of Liberty presented the bride with a heavy silver tea-pot (yet preserved as a heir-loom by her descendants), and Madame de Frontenac settled a handsome dowry on her protegee.

How all wished that good old Parson Gwynne could have performed the ceremony, but no one could even give a clue to his whereabouts. A few weeks after the expedition left for Quebec, he sailed with his ward for St. John's, to join Judge Upham and other loyalists, who had there formed a colony. Certain it was that the vessel had never arrived there, and many speculations were afloat as to the probable fate of those on board.

As Herbert Yancey and Madame de Frontenac stood side by side at the wedding, their calm, strong natures—so different in the love-tempests within, so alike in the forced quietness without—were thrilled by thoughts of another. Both secretly hoped that the day would come when one of them should lead Mabel Gwynne to the altar, taking her "for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, till death should them part."

CHAPTER XX.

UNION OF HEARTS AND HANDS.

"O absence! by thy stern decree,
How many a heart, once light and free,
Is filled with doubts and fears!
Thy days like tedious weeks do seem,
Thy weeks slow-moving months we deem,
Thy months, long-lingering years."

A MERE sketch of Herbert Yancey's brilliant career through the remaining years of the revolutionary war, would be a history of that glorious struggle, for his sword flamed like a meteor wherever Washington directed the fight, and in more than one official despatch was his name mentioned with such praise as made his mother's heart leap with joy, while she thanked the God of battles for his preserving care. Attached to the staff of the illustrious chief who was "first in war," he enjoyed rare opportunities for witnessing the lights and shades of that protracted contest, which never could have been sustained by the revolting colonies had not a sacred love of liberty inspired the continental troops.

But while the young soldier's ear often heard the distant boom of the hostile gun, the high thunder of field batteries, the rolling of musketry, the tread of columns, and the clash of engaging squadrons, there were other sounds for which his heart longed—sounds that would have been even more welcome than the shouts of victory. His mother was never forgotten, and pleasant memories of Mabel Gwynne, his plighted bride, cheered him on the march and in the fight, in the hard-fought battles contested beneath the sultry rays of summer suns, and in that icy cantonment at Valley Forge, where, if a sentry ceased his march, drowsiness would hurry him into the sleep of death. It was this double love which encouraged him to action, and which enabled him, with unwearied perseverance, to perform his arduous duties.

Yet he had his moments of depression. Whenever he saw any one who, by some similarity of form or voice, reminded him of Mabel, he felt an irresistible pang that, for the time, embittered even his very existence. Often did he endeavor to imagine where she was, for he had never obtained tidings of her, and a thousand wild speculations alternately chased each other through his brain.

Madame de Frontenac, by the kind intercession of Colonel Dupre, transferred her ample fortune to the States, and was welcomed at Evermay by Madame Yancey, who loved her as the deliverer of her son from death. She spared no pains in having inquiries made throughout the British provinces, for Parson Gwynne and his ward, her daughter. The result was ever the same, yet the fond mother hoped on.

At length came the decisive struggle at Yorktown, where the flower of the British army, under Lord Cornwallis, held a defensible position selected with consummate judgment, and strengthened by art. Washington, reinforced by the French allies under Lafayette, made an equal display of military knowledge in besieging the place, and his personal heroism was never more conspicuously displayed than in the coolness with which he approached so near the enemy's lines when reconnoitering, as to attract the fire of their sharpshooters on several occasions. Naturally humane, the great chieftain wished to spare all useless effusion of blood; but it was so evident that two redoubts must be carried by storm, that at last he issued his orders. One party selected for this daring duty was from the continental line, headed by Alexander Hamilton; the other was composed entirely of Frenchmen, under the command of Baron de Viomenil, to whom Herbert Yancey was assigned as special aid.

The two columns—"brothers in arms, yet rivals for renown"—were formed immediately after sunset, and without ammunition! Cold steel was to do the work, and every man felt that now was the time to display his gallantry. At last, a rocket shot up from before Washington's marque, and the columns started, diverging towards the redoubts, which poured forth a galling fire of grape shot.

Yancey, accustomed to the rapid, irregular movements of the Americans, could but admire the steady coolness with which the French grenadiers moved forward, as if passing in review. As they approached, the grape shot ploughed through their ranks, but the veteran Viomenil did not quicken his step. Going before the leading company, and facing them as if giving a drill, he moved forward, back to the enemy, exclaiming, coolly: "Left—left—left—dress up on the right—left—left!" And it was not until he was within ten paces of the redoubt, from which the red flames danced wildly and the balls whistled fast, that he gave the command:

DR. KANE'S ARCTIC EXPLORATIONS.

We are indebted to the kindness and liberality of Messrs. Childs & Peterson, of Philadelphia, for the pleasure of presenting our readers with the fine wood engravings on this and the following page. They are extracted from the splendid work in two 8vo. volumes, of which the full title is "Arctic Explorations; the second Grinnell Expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, 1853, '54 and '55. By Elisha Kent Kane, M. D., U. S. N. Illustrated by upwards of 300 engravings, from sketches by the author. The steel plates executed under the superintendence of J. M. Butler, the wood engravings by Van Ingen & Snyder." An effort was made to induce Congress to publish Dr. Kane's narrative; but that having failed, recourse was had to private enterprise, and the spirit with which Messrs. Childs & Peterson assumed the task, and the perfect style in which they have accomplished it, places them in the front rank of American publishers, and will forever connect their names with the memorable expedition they have thus heralded to the world. Their book will compare favorably with the finest works of the kind issued by the European press. We are happy to learn that their services are appreciated, and that, after obtaining thirty thousand subscribers in advance, they are meeting with more calls for the work than they can keep pace with. Our paper of to-day contains fair specimens of the wood cuts; the steel engravings are numerous, and in the highest style of art. The frontispiece of the first volume is a fine likeness of Dr. Kane; that of the second, a striking portrait of Henry Grinnell, the liberal New York merchant, whose name is associated with two of the most memorable Arctic expeditions on record. Dr. Kane, it will be remembered, held a subordinate position in the Grinnell expedition, which was commanded by Lieut. De Haven; but he was its historiographer, and the experience he obtained on that voyage, together with energy and honorable ambition, admirably fitted him to take command of this second expedition, the primary object of volunteers. The principal regulations adopted, as laws for this special service, were subordination, abstinence from intoxicating liquors, except when dispensed by special order, and the habitual disuse of profane language. The "Advance" sailed from New York, May 30, 1853. In eighteen days, she made the harbor of St. Johns, Newfoundland, where Dr. Kane was handsomely received by Governor Hamilton, who gave him a noble team of Newfoundland dogs. The brig reached Baffin's Bay without incident. On the 23d of August, they had reached north latitude 73 deg. 41 min. On the 10th of September, they reached a bay which they named Rensselaer Harbor, where they spent two winters. A sketch of Rensselaer Island will be found among our engravings. They were finally compelled to abandon the brig, and to make a journey of 1300 miles to the Danish settlements of Greenland, where they were relieved by Lieut. H. G. Hartstene, in command of an expedition fitted for their relief. Dr. Kane's narrative, embracing all that befell them, describing their various journeyings in search of Franklin, making an aggregate of 3000 miles, under every imaginable difficulty, the discovery of the "Iceless Sea" in the extreme north, the strange aspects of nature in the polar regions, the natural history, the geology, the people of the frozen north, has all the interest of the most thrilling romance. Nothing can be more modest than the manner in which the author speaks of himself; yet the simple record of his acts proves him to be a hero, such a one as Europe loads with titles, crosses and wealth—such a one as America delights to honor with heartfelt applause. Whatever may be his worldly fortune, Dr. Kane has succeeded in establishing an imperishable name. Let us now glance at the pictures before us. The first engraving is a head of Metek, an Esquimaux, who made the acquaintance of Dr. Kane at Rensselaer Harbor. "He was," says Dr. Kane, "nearly a head taller than myself, extremely powerful and well built, with swarthy complexion and piercing black eyes. His dress was a hooded capote or jumper, of mixed white and blue fox-pelts, arranged with something of fancy, and booted trousers of white bear-skin, which at the end of versed freely by a rig on a loop or bridle, that extended from runner to runner in front of the sledge. These track-ropes varied in length, so as to keep the members of the party from interfering with each other by walking abreast. The longest was three fathoms, eighteen feet, in length; the shortest, directly fastened to the sledge-runner, as a means of guiding or suddenly arresting and turning the vehicle. The cargo for this journey (the first), without including the provisions of the party, was almost exclusively pemmican. Some of this was put up in cylinders of tinned iron with conical terminations, so as to resist the assaults of the white bear; but the larger quantity was in strong wooden cases or kegs, well hooped with iron, holding about 70 pounds each." Another picture of the "Faith," with a group unloading her, and a polar bear lying dead beside her, appears on the next page. On this page is a picture of the boat called the "Faith" also, which did Dr. Kane "yeoman's service," and which is now at the Brooklyn navy-yard. The third picture on this page represents the sledge called the "Little Willie," with its team of four Newfoundland dogs, Dr. Kane, in his Arctic costume, driving. "My dogs," says he, "were both Esquimaux and Newfoundland. Of these last I had ten: they were to be carefully broken, to travel by voice without the whip, and were expected to be very useful for heavy draught, as their tractability would allow the driver to regulate their pace. I was already training them (this was at the commencement of his adventures) in a light sledge, to drive, unlike the Esquimaux, two abreast, with regular harness, a breast collar of flat leather, and a pair of traces. Six of them made a powerful travelling-team, and four could carry me and my instruments, for short journeys around the brig, with great ease. The sledge I used for them was built, with the care of cabinet-work, of American hickory, thoroughly seasoned. The curvature of the runners was determined experimentally: they were shod with annealed steel, and fastened by copper rivets which could be renewed at

METEK.

SLEDGE DRAWN BY MEN.

LITTLE WILLIE AND NEWFOUNDLANDERS.

CATCHING AWK.

which was the discovery of Sir John Franklin, while the attainment of important scientific results was also anticipated from the voyage. Dr. Kane's vessel was the "Advance," belonging to Mr. Grinnell, in which he had previously sailed, and which was generously placed at his disposal for the cruise. Mr. Peabody, the American banker, of London, contributed liberally to the outfit; and a number of American scientific associations afforded assistance to the adventurers in various ways. Dr. Kane and nine others of his party were under orders from the U. S. navy department, the remainder were shipped for the cruise on moderate salaries, and all were the foot were made to terminate with the claws of the animal." The entire costume is seen in another picture, on the next page—"Nessak in his travelling dress." An Esquimaux of fourteen is seen in the sketch of Paulik, Metek's nephew, described as "fine-looking," that is, for an Esquimaux, we suppose. That our readers may form some idea of an Esquimaux beauty, we present a portrait of Anak, the wife of Nessak, one of Dr. Kane's northern friends. It will be observed that the style of coiffure is not very unlike that adopted by our fair countrywomen a few years since. The second engraving represents an Arctic sledge, loaded and drawn by nine men in their bear-like costumes. "I named her the 'Faith,'" says Dr. Kane. "Her length was thirteen feet, and breadth four. She could readily carry fourteen hundred pounds of mixed stores. This noble old sledge, which is now endeared to us by every pleasant association, bore the brunt of the heaviest parties, and came back, after the descent of the coast, comparatively sound. The men were attached to her in such a way as to make the line of draught or traction as near as possible in the axis of the weight. Each man had his own shoulder-belt, or 'rue-raddy,' as we used to call it, and his own track line, which, for want of horse-hair, was made of Manila rope: it tra-pleasure. Except this, no metal entered into its construction. All its parts were held together by seal-skin lashings, so that it yielded to inequalities of surface and to sudden shock. The three paramount considerations of lightness, strength and diminished friction were well combined in it. This beautiful, and, as we afterwards found, efficient sledge, was named the "Little Willie." Following the picture of this sledge, is a representation of the manner of catching awks, birds which the Esquimaux relish highly. They breed in low cones of rubbish among the cliffs. The Esquimaux, perched in a convenient station, employs a purse-net, made of seal-skin, and fastened to the end of a tusk of the narwhal, sometimes spliced, to give it the requisite length, and so scoops up his feathered prey as they fly by him in startled numbers. We have next a picture of "Eider Island," with an eider duck and her brood of young ones. Near the Littleton Island of Captain Inglefield, "we saw," says Dr. Kane, "a number of ducks, both eiders and harlequins; and it occurred to me that by tracking their flight, we should reach their breeding-grounds. There was no trouble in doing so, for they flew in a bee-line to a group of rocky islets, above which the whole horizon was studded with birds. A rugged little ledge, which I named 'Eider Island,' was so thickly colonized that we could hardly walk without treading on a nest. We killed with guns and stones over two hundred birds in a few hours. It was near the close of the breeding season. The nests were still occupied with the mother-birds, but many of the young had burst the shell, and were nestling under the wing, or taking their first lessons in the water-pools. Some, more advanced, were already in the ice-sheltered channels, greedily waiting for the shell-fish and sea-urchins, which the old bird hoisted herself in procuring for them. Near by was a low and isolated rock-ledge, which we called 'Hans Island. The glaucous gulls, those cormorants of the Arctic seas, had made it their peculiar homestead. Their progeny, already full-fledged in a wild wolfish yell, the driver shrieking, 'Nannook! nannook!' and all straining every nerve in pursuit. The bear rises on his haunches, inspects his pursuers, and starts off at full speed. The hunter, as he runs, leaning over his sledge, seizes the traces of a couple of his dogs, and liberates them from their burthen. It is the work of a minute; for the motion is not checked, and the remaining dogs rush on with apparent ease. Now pressed more severely, the bear makes for an iceberg, and stands at bay, while his two foremost pursuers halt at a short distance, and quietly await the arrival of the hunter. At this moment, the whole pack are liberated; the hunter grasps his lance, and, tumbling through snow and ice, prepares for the encounter. If there be two hunters, the bear is killed easily; for one makes a feint of thrusting a spear at the right side, and, as the animal turns with his arms towards the threatened attack, and voracious, crowded the gunne whitened rocks; and the mothers, with long necks and gaping yellow bills, swooped above the peaceful shallows of the eiders, carrying off the young birds, seemingly just as their wants required. A more domineering and insatiable rapacity I have never witnessed. The gull would gobble up and swallow a young eider in less time than it takes me to

THE "FAITH," NOW AT BROOKLYN NAVY YARD.

EIDER ISLAND.

DECK BY LAMPLIGHT.

RENSSELLAER ISLAND.

ANAK, WIFE OF NESSAK.

THE BRIG CRADLED.

PAULIK, METEK'S NEPHEW.

NESSAK, IN TRAVELLING DRESS.

In this position she is frozen in, high and dry, to "pass an Arctic winter over an Arctic ice bed." The next engraving presents a sketch of a group of walruses sporting among the field-ice and icebergs. Until the thermometer sinks below zero, these bulky monsters find water enough to sport, and keep in between the fields of drift-ice as they open with the tide. Besides these, they work out holes for themselves. The walruses swallow gravel and even large stones, but for what purpose, it is not known. Another picture on this page is a curious group of Esquimaux huts, which Dr. Kane found in one of his excursions from the brig. "They are four in number, long deserted, but to an eye unpractised in Arctic antiquarian deductions, in as good preservation as a last year's tenement at home. The most astonishing feature is the presence of some little out-huts, or, as I first thought them, dog kennels. These are about four feet by three in ground plan, and some three feet high; no larger than the poles of the Tchuschi. In shape they resemble a rude dome; and the stones of which they are composed are of excessive size, and evidently selected for smoothness. They were, without exception, of water-washed limestone. They are heavily soiled with turf, and a narrow slab of clay-slate serves as a door. No doubt they are human habitations, retiring chambers, into which, away from the crowded families of the hut, one or even two Esquimaux have burrowed for sleep—chilly dormitories in the winter of this high latitude." Our last engraving but one represents a polar bear at bay, rearing to his full height, surrounded by hunters the left is unprotected, and receives the death-wound." "Many wounds are received by the Etah Bay Esquimaux in these encounters; the bear is looked upon as more fierce in that neighborhood, and about Anootok and Rensselaer Bay, than around the broken ice to the south. He uses his teeth more generally than is supposed by systematic writers. The hugging, pawing and boxing describer it. For a moment you would see the paddling feet of the poor little wretch protruding from the mouth; then came a distension of the neck, as it descended into the stomach; a few moments more and the young gulls were feeding on the ejected morsel." Our next picture represents the deck of the "Advance" by lamp-light. It is built over, to ward off the extreme cold, a stove-pipe passing through the roof. Near the hatchway stands one of the party, lantern in hand, while another is seated, caressing one of the Esquimaux dogs found such valuable auxiliaries in their journeyings. The next picture is a sketch of Rensselaer Island. On this page we have a picture of the brig cradled, the decks protected by canvass from the cutting wind. She was lifted with double chains passed under at low tide, both astern and amidships.

WALRUSES SPORTING.

ESQUIMAUX HUTS.

with their long spears. In speaking of one of his expeditions, Dr. Kane says:—"Our whole journey had been an almost unbroken and scarcely-varied series of bear hunts. They had lost for me the attractions of novelty; but, like the contests with the walrus, they were always interesting, because characteristic of this rude people (the Esquimaux). The dogs are carefully trained not to engage in contest with the bear, but to retard his flight. While one engrosses his attention ahead, a second attacks him in the rear; and, always alert and each protecting the other, it rarely happens that they are seriously injured, or that they fail to delay the animal until the hunters come up. Let us suppose a bear scented out at the base of an iceberg. The Esquimaux examines the track with sagacious care, to determine its age and direction, and the speed with which the animal was passing when he passed along. The dogs are set upon the trail, and the hunter courses over the ice at their side in silence. As he turns the angle of the berg, his game is in view before him, stalking probably along with quiet march, sometimes snuffing the air suspiciously, but making, nevertheless, for a nest of broken hummocks. The dogs spring forward, opening which characterize the black and grizzly bears, are resorted to by him, only under peculiar circumstances." The last engraving represents the "Forlorn Hope," the whale-boat in which Dr. Kane, with a small boat's crew, left the "Advance," to prosecute his researches. We trust that the extracts we have made will induce many of our readers to possess themselves of the splendid work from which we have taken our text and illustrations. The curiosity excited by this expedition abroad is scarcely less than that felt here with regard to it, and editions of the narrative are already going through the German and French presses. Dr. Kane himself has been received in Europe with distinguished consideration, and his gallantry in offering his services to Lady Franklin for another search after traces of her husband, is highly lauded.

THE "FAITH."

THE BEAR AT BAY.

THE FORLORN HOPE.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AN AUTUMN MURMUR.

BY WILLIE E. PADON.

The earth is heavy with the autumn airs;
Man's heart is like it with his many cares;
And oftentimes grief's strokes come unawares.

I watch the dry leaves borne before the wind,
And solemn shadows steal across my mind,
Leaving a withered souvenir behind.

The dead leaves tell of summer's swift decay!
They—like man's being—are but for a day,—
And then? Behold, the burial comes away.

The dead leaves whisper of the summer fled;
And as we look, our thoughts are backward led
To unse upon the many summers dead;

When we, with those whose faces met our own,
With looks familiar, walked without a moan,
The shore of time; which now we tread alone.

We hear the echoes of the loves that kept
Our hearts in ecstasy. Hope's hand then swept
The lyre of bliss. But now? It long hath slept.

O, silent all! alas, December's gale
But typifies the spirit's wail
In sadness following on sorrow's trail.

December on the earth and in the heart!
The links are loosening—the chain will part,
And then? How do we to the churchyard start?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TRUST IN GOD.
A CHRISTMAS STORY.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

THE fire burned dimly on the hearth of the Widow Romaine. It was a bitter cold day—the night before Christmas. Two children were hovering over the feeble blaze, and shivering with the fierce cold that was creeping on their limbs. Willie, the eldest, was trying to warm little Addie by putting his arm around her, while the mother took down the Bible, lighted an inch or two of candle that remained, and read to them the beautiful story of the shepherds keeping watch over their flocks by night, the angel coming to them and the glory of the Lord shining about them. The little ones listened, almost forgetting the cold; and then the mother passed over many pages, until she came to the touching words of the Saviour, when "he had not where to lay his head."

"Then he was worse off than we are, Willie," said little Addie, as she crept from her brother's arm to the poor and ill-covered bed, where the three huddled together for warmth.

The candle went out in the midst of her readings, and Mrs. Romaine and Willie lay down, one on each side of the little girl. The children slept, but the mother lay for hours, tossing in painful thought of how she was to live through the cheerless winter and keep these children alive.

She rose the next morning, and made a fire with the last wood which she possessed, spread her table with the last loaf; and then, waiting for her children to awake, she sat down and wept. They were the first tears she had shed for months, and she felt relieved by the flow; but she would not let the children see her, and she dried them up quickly before they awoke.

Catherine Romaine was the daughter of a once wealthy and enterprising merchant. She had married Mr. Romaine, who was much older than herself, when he was in business with her father. He was a widower with one son. She loved the little Herbert with all but a mother's love, and the child returned it fully. He was twelve years old when his father married, and it was six years after that when Willie was born. Herbert's unaffected interest in the little one repaid Catherine for all the love which she had given him. Two years afterwards little Addie came to bless the happy household, and the measure of their bliss seemed complete. Herbert was one of the head clerks in the firm, and although only twenty years old, was distinguished for his attention to business.

It was a sudden and terrible shock to the whole community when it was reported that the firm of Thatcher and Romaine had failed. There were people involved in their difficulties whose every dollar had been invested with them. Old men, who had lain by a small sum, perhaps to be called in when sickness should come upon them—widows who had saved a scanty pittance by needle-work—single women who had been at service until their laboring days were over—all these had trusted their small earnings with the great firm that was as "good as the bank."

The firm that was "good as the bank" failed, however, and then came poverty, distress and sickness. Mr. Thatcher was found in his room, with a bottle of laudanum in his clenched hand, perfectly dead; and not many months after this, Mr. Romaine, worn out by repeated shocks, sunk into the grave.

They had given up all to the creditors, keeping not even the bridal presents of Mrs. Romaine, nor those which had been made to the children. A small, mean house in the lower part of the city, held Mrs. Romaine and her children, and after her husband's death, and Herbert had gone away, she underlet all the rooms but one.

Sad indeed was her heart when the night of her husband's death brought the finishing stroke. She sat in mute anguish, gazing upon the beloved face, and then upon the helpless little ones by her side.

"Trust in God, Katy, dear," said the dying man. "He will not leave you utterly desolate."

Herbert staid until after his father's funeral, and then sailed for Africa.

"Sometime, I shall return, dear mother," said the affectionate son, "and then, believe me, you shall not want."

O, the grief of those partings! They were like the bitterness of death to Mrs. Romaine, for they seemed to contradict her husband's assurance that she should not be left desolate.

She succeeded at first, in obtaining a little sewing of the coarsest kind; but it would hardly pay for the candles by which she worked after her children had gone to bed. She would not apply for work from those who had known her in her prosperous days; and she dreaded going to the shop, where a hard and unfeeling man was grinding the faces of the poor for a few miserable pence. She would not send Willie, for her mind revolted at exposing him to the danger and contamination of the streets.

She wore the coarsest clothes herself, and dressed her children in similar ones, and yet, so neatly were they made and put on, that there was something almost elegant in their appearance.

Sometimes she recognized in the street those whom she had known in better days; and then she would start aside and turn away her head, forgetting, for a moment, that they could never discover the elegant Catherine Romaine in the poor, haggard woman that was bearing her bundle of cheap work from a shop.

One person only had known her when meeting her thus, and that one did not dare to approach her, because he saw that she avoided him. This was a Mr. Russell, who had known and loved her husband as a brother. He followed her at a distance until he saw her enter the poor dwelling in which she lived—took the number of the house and the name of the street, and then returned to tell his wife what he had seen. All Mrs. Russell's womanly tenderness rose up at his recital, and she begged to go and see her.

"No, Mary," said her husband, "that will not do; you may write her that you will visit her if she wishes it, but you must go no farther until you know how she would receive you."

The note was written and sent, but no answer obtained, and the generous couple were obliged to give up all thoughts of helping her.

Day after day, Mr. Russell met her, with her two children, each carrying a package. The sight melted him to pity; and yet her step was so proud that he could not stop her, as he wanted to do, and offer her assistance.

The house in which Catherine lived was inhabited partly by an Irish family, whose good feelings were all excited by the evident poverty of their neighbor.

Norah Dolan was a kind-hearted woman, neater than most of her class, and with great respect for what she called "real born gentry," among which she classed Mrs. Romaine and her children. Mrs. Romaine had allowed little Patrick and Maggy to come in and learn to read with her own little ones; and she had tended Mrs. Dolan herself when she was sick, and her gratitude was unbounded. It so happened that Mrs. Dolan's husband worked for Mr. Russell, and he, in the plenitude of his joy at his wife's recovery, related the kindness of their neighbor, "Miss Romaine," a real born lady, he said, and ought to be in a grand castle instead of the poor little place at home.

Through Dolan's means, Mr. Russell had partly gratified his benevolent heart, by sending Mrs. Romaine various articles of food and clothing, which he directed to her address and charged him to lay privately on her table, and, on no account, to say to her that he sent them.

In vain she questioned Dolan and his wife. They would know nothing of it, unless the fairies were at the bottom of it.

"Sure it's the fairies, ma'am," said Dolan, when she wanted him to take a bundle away, which she was sure that he must have placed there, because she saw him coming from the room, as she was entering it. "Sure it's the fairies, and wouldn't they be cross if yees did not take their presents? And didn't I see the bundle on yeess table when I went into yeess room? Faith, thin, I did, ma'am, and it's no use in the world for yeess to quistion me and Norah, for it's little we know, any way."

And Mrs. Romaine, grateful to her unknown friend, and yet with a great pain at her heart, would undo the package, and appropriate the sugar and tea, or bread and butter, as it might be, to the wants of herself and children.

Once, little Willie, in helping her empty the sugar into a wooden box—their only sugar bowl—had discovered a silver dollar; and the tea was often productive of dimes and even quarters. These were helps indeed—but small in comparison to the wants of a family of three. Her handful of meat and cruse of oil were often wholly exhausted. The work which she carried home was not always paid for at the time; and many nights she was obliged to go to bed with the children at dark, because her wood and candles were all consumed. Often she feared that she would be forced to ask aid, to keep them from starving; but until the actual hour came, she would struggle on.

There were times when logs of wood, which she missed at once from Mrs. Dolan's wood pile (never very large or high), would find their way mysteriously to the expiring embers on her hearth, and kindle up a cheerful blaze, by which she would assemble the four children, her own and the little Dolans, and teach them to read and spell.

Among the few things which she had saved from the wreck of her luxurious home, was a mutilated copy of Shakspeare—the only book except the Bible which her father had given her when she was married. The Shakspeare had lost its covers, and many leaves, but she would sometimes take it up and find in its pages, so strangely fitting to every phase of life or circumstance, something that was applicable to her own. These two books were her solace and comfort. The pictures contained in each, formed the initial letters to her children's love of art, and the beautiful manner in which she read impressed the contents of the books upon their minds, or at least, such parts of them as they could understand. It was hard to wake up from the absorbing perusal of her books, to the dreary reality of the poverty around her,—to come from the gorgeous descriptions of Shakspeare, into the dim light of the actual life that she was enduring,—but she was possessed of that rare courage and fortitude that cover up and conceal the inward pangs of the soul. To outward appearance, she was contented, if not cheerful.

Sometimes—but rarely—she would indulge herself in going backward into the past, and remember what she was in years long gone by. The retrospection which showed her to herself in the dimmed and broken mirror of memory,—first, as the gay and beautiful Catherine Thatcher, followed alike for her own beauty and her father's wealth—then, having turned from this crowd of selfish flatterers, she saw herself the happy wife of the good and honored Romaine, dispensing to his motherless boy all the kindest offices of maternal care, if not the perfect fulness of maternal love. Then came thronging in the memory of that blessed time when two children, fair and beautiful as angels, were in her luxurious home, caressed and waited on by friends and dependents, and the pride and joy of a father's loving heart.

These were not healthful remembrances for Catherine to indulge in. They made her harder and more moquent in her present situation; and there were times when her good angel seemed almost to forsake her. O, these depths of poverty and desolation! They are hard to bear. Truly we have need to remember that the sacred head of Him who loved us, was once destitute of shelter, to reconcile us to these hard experiences of life.

But not always did Catherine's heart sink into these states of unrest. There were times when her sorrow seemed uplifted into serene skies, and the anguish of her daily lot turned into divinest peace, when her poor apartment seemed like the habitation of angels, from the presence of those who had gone before.

And now, indeed, came a trial. Willie was taken ill. She exhausted her skill in trying to subdue the fever which had fastened upon the little patient boy. Now it was that Norah Dolan proved invaluable as a friend. Never, in the days of Catherine's brightest prosperity, did she value any service so much as this poor woman's heartfelt and willing sacrifices for her sake. She took little Addie away from the affected room—for her practised eye told her truly that it was the dreaded small pox—and leaving her and Maggie together, she devoted herself to the sick boy and his mother. Norah's whole family had experienced it, so that there was no danger to be apprehended except for Mrs. Romaine and Addie. Her neighbor's experience proved invaluable indeed to Catherine, and saved her the trial of asking the services for which she could not have paid. Those were anxious nights when the two women sat up with the little sufferer, whose reason gave way under his disease. It was touching enough to hear him call for his mother, not knowing that it was her hand that bathed his burning forehead. Then he would fancy that Addie was dead, and would weep because he too could not go to his father.

One night, he seemed near death. His mother had been watching Norah's face, and she saw nothing there from which she could draw a single ray of hope. Norah had seen others die, and she knew from her countenance that she thought Willie dying. Catherine groaned in spirit, and the words came up from the deepest recesses of her almost broken heart, "if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." She tried to add the rest, but she could not. Half an hour after, when she saw the poor child's struggles with the cruel disease, she could utter them more easily.

Just at midnight, Willie's eyes closed. Catherine thought he was gone, but Norah laid her hand upon her shoulder, and seated her by the bedside.

"Hush!" she whispered, "and watch for his waking."

They did watch all through that long night. Norah drew up the curtain a little just as the sun rose. Somehow, the bright gleam that came into the room, brought also a glimmer of hope into Catherine's heart. Norah dropped the curtain quickly, lest suddenly waking, the strong light might destroy Willie's eyes forever.

He lay still,—so still that they could hardly see that he breathed. The morning and forenoon passed, and still he slept. Catherine thought he would pass away without waking.

"O, that I could see those dear eyes once more!" she whispered, just as the clock was striking twelve; and, as if in answer to that whisper, the "dear eyes" opened, and the weak voice murmured: "Mother!"

Willie was saved! Those only, whose hopes are narrowed down to the life of one or two dear objects, can imagine the rapture of Catherine Romaine as she bent over her child, and saw by the dim, uncertain light that he saw and knew her. That long, long twelve hours' sleep had brought him back to life.

The kindly eyes of the Irishwoman overflowed with tears as Catherine wept upon her shoulder, and poured out her gratitude to her humble friend.

"I will love you always, dear Norah," she said, as soon as she could speak, and Norah wept the more.

It was long before they would see little Addie, lest she should contract the disease which, doubtless, still lingered in the walls of the room; but Norah's husband took good care of her, and she was contented with Maggie, though longing for mother and Willie.

After Norah had made a thorough fumigation, and Catherine, afraid to trust it, had made another, the doors were opened, and the children all admitted to see Willie, who, scared and feeble, was yet only permitted to sit up a little while.

But this sickness had made sad inroads upon Catherine's small resources. Her work was stopped, of course, and her health had suffered from anxiety and watching. From long staying in a dimly-lighted room, her eyes had become affected so much that she could not see to mend Addie's clothes, which had suffered for her care while Willie was ill, and she thought continually tormented her that she was going blind.

The bundles which used to be placed upon her table were no longer found. She did not know the reason, but Norah and her husband did. They knew that Mr. Russell and his family were gone abroad, and would not return until December.

She had parted with everything but the merest necessities of life. She had even taken away the andirons that supported her wood fire, in order to buy with them a few sticks of wood. The few pieces of crockery followed, and half the straw from the miserable bed. She took in a little washing, but her own irons were gone long ago, and the washboiler too, and she had to borrow both from Norah.

"Come and wash in my room, Mistress Rummie," said Norah. "There is plenty of fire here to hate your wather, and yees may look after little Maggie's spelling to pay for it."

There was delicacy in the Irishwoman's mode of giving favors. She would always make it appear that "Mistress Rummie" had obliged her in some way, and that her services went only to pay for something she was receiving.

But the cold weather was approaching. November, dark, dreary and gloomy, with its chilling winds, and the sad looking piles of dried leaves that lay, brown and sere, upon the pathways, and rustled under the footsteps with such a melancholy sound, was fast giving way before December, with its piled snow-drifts and howling storms. Sad and gloomy enough, they sometimes think, who sit in richly-curtained rooms, where the thick carpets give back no answer to the footfall; where light and warmth come stealing in from invisible sources; where the dainty viands crowd together on the table, and the wine sparkles red in the cup; where loved ones are sheltered from the biting storm, and little children are asleep in beds that seem covered by the work of fairy hands; where music and painting and sculpture address themselves to the ear and the eye, and all the senses receive the ministry of luxury and art. What must it be, then, to those who are shivering over the fitful blaze that only tantalizes the chilled and perishing limbs—those whose cupboards are empty and whose clothing is scanty—whose children creep into their pallet of straw to sleep away the feelings of hunger that gnaws at their vitals?

It was thus with poor Catherine on the evening and morning of that terrible Christmas in which we found her and her helpless little ones. The sears had faded from Willie's face, leaving it pale and haggard, and his eyes had that unnatural brightness so painful in a child. He suffered more from privation than Addie, who was strong and healthy.

We left her watching the awaking of her children. She bent over them, and saw Willie's pallid look with dismay.

"Must I lose him after all?" she exclaimed. "Was he saved from that cruel disease, only to waste away with hunger?"

At that moment, a loud knock was heard at the door, and she hastily dried her tears and answered the summons. No one was there, but as she opened the door, a large bag fell inward, marked with her own name in large letters. As she drew it in, and was about to close the door, she saw the shadow of Norah's husband flitting around the corner of the house. She knew it by the ragged hat, of which one half the brim was gone. She called after him, to know if he saw any one leave the bag.

"Faith, and how could I, whin I've jist come out of the house? But I'll be afther asking Norah—perhaps she saw the thafe himself!"

Catherine opened the bag, and found everything for a Christmas revel, as she said to Norah, when she wanted to share with her. But Norah had had a bag, too, inscribed, in the same writing as Catherine's, "To Mrs. Norah Dolan;" and her husband told her that Mr. Russell had arrived in the steamer, but did not tell her that he and Mr. Russell's man had brought up the bags.

"Sure," he told her, "it must be St. Nicholas himself, who could not get the great bags down the chimney."

Great was the astonishment and joy of Catherine's children when they opened their eyes upon the table loaded with chickens, boiled and roasted, great loaves of bread, and piles of small brown paper parcels, marked, each with the name of some useful article. In the parcel of sugar was a piece of gold as large as a half dollar.

There were joy and deep thankfulness in the heart of Mrs. Romaine as she saw the children devour the abundant Christmas breakfast. Poor Willie had to stop from weakness, and his mother warned him to be moderate, and he might have a little, and eat oftener. As for Addie, she was deep in the mysteries of a vast plum pudding, and threatened to eat herself into a fever, but for the careful checking of her mother.

Catherine horrified the wood unhesitatingly of Norah, to-day, for she knew she could repay it to-morrow, and redeemed her andirons also. Her poor room shone by two o'clock in the afternoon, from the effects of her rubbing and blacking and polishing; and then the three sat round the nice Christmas fire, and the mother told them stories which they had never heard before, nor indeed had she. The afternoon sun shone in, too, lighting up the poor, mean furniture with the same glow it was bestowing in rich apartments; and the snow, which was blackened and dirty around the other doors in the small court, lay spotless and unsullied round Mrs. Romaine's.

"I hear sleigh-bells," said Willie, starting up, "and they are coming right up the court. And see, mother, see, Addie, what a fine horse! And a gentleman all wrapped up in fur!"

And true enough, there was the gentleman holding the long reins and knocking at their own door. Willie opens the door and presents his poor, little, pale and scarred face to the stranger's anxious and earnest gaze. He does not recognize the boy, and yet it is the very child he is seeking; for Herbert Romaine has come home, and is trying to find his lost mother and her children.

"And is it here, in this poor place that I find you, dear mother?" said Herbert, after Mrs. Romaine had cried and laughed a dozen times, in the alternations of her nervous excitement. "Not another day nor hour shall you stay here! Come to the hotel where I am stopping. I will find you beautiful rooms, and you and the children shall spend a happy Christmas."

"I want none other than your return gives me, Herbert; and I must not forget that our coarse and shabby clothing would not correspond with any other room than this."

"You shall have better clothing. I will go myself to procure it for you."

"But you can't," said Willie, who had sat quietly on his brother's knee, without speaking, "the shops are all shut up Christmas days, and you can't buy any cloth to make them of." And Willie renewed his study of his brother's face.

Herbert was obliged to be content until to-morrow, then—but he sat and related the story of his wanderings since he left her.

"One object which I had in view, dear mother," he said, "was the restoration of some property which I knew had belonged to the firm, and which lay in the West India Islands. I heard fabulous accounts of its value, although I knew that my father had always considered it of no account. I will not trouble you, to relate all the tedious processes by which I circumvented the agent, one of the greatest swindlers I ever knew, and brother to that rascally lawyer whom my father trusted so much. You will be satisfied that I wrested the whole from his grasp, and that it far exceeds all that I had heard of it. There is enough to pay off every creditor, restore every one to his own, and leave a handsome property, one third of which is yours, of course, and the rest belongs to me and these little ones. Why don't you speak, dear mother?" he asked, playfully, as she turned pale and red by turns.

She recovered herself by a strong effort, and whispered: "O, if your dear father could have lived to know this!"

"He does know it," said Herbert, reverentially. "It cannot be that justice or injustice can walk the earth, and the spirits above the earth ignore their existence. I believe in this, dear mother, and so do you. Now I will leave you, and come again to-morrow."

Dolan brought home a paper that night which contained an advertisement of a sale which would take place the day after Christmas, of a house and furniture next to Mr. Russell's.

"No. 240! Why, that was our own house," said Mrs. Romaine, to herself.

Herbert did not come the next day, and Catherine wondered and expected. Towards evening, he came, with his fine face glowing with excitement.

"I have got it, dear mother," he said; "I have bought our own house, and most of our furniture still remains there—well kept and almost as good as over. I thought you would prefer it to having all new. You know Mr. Eaton bought it, and now he is going to Europe. It was by mere accident that I rode by, and saw the bills at the window. The people were assembling for the sale. I stopped my horse, and went in with the air of a man determined to purchase, and there was not a bid made against me. I have come now to take you all home once more."

He now produced from the sleigh a basket of nice clothing for them all; for, he remarked, that as he had already procured servants, and appointed them to come that evening, he would like them to appear as became their position.

Before they were all dressed, a close carriage stood at the door. Herbert would not let them enter until his mother had introduced him to the Dolans, to whom he left all that had belonged to his mother, and a handsome sum of money.

"And wont yees forget Norah and me, whin yees are a great lady?" asked Dolan, as she put out her hand to bid him good by.

"Never—never, my good friend," she weepingly uttered; and she kept her word.

"I have come home to live with you, mother," said Herbert, as he showed her the rooms he had selected for himself. "I shall never marry, and your new wealth will have this drawback and encumbrance—a bachelor son."

"Thank God!" said Catherine, "then I shall have you always—always, at least, until you break your resolution."

Who can describe the delight of the little children? They were so happy that the pale, anxious look had left their mother's face, and that she need no longer worry about their wants. And then Willie was so pleased to have good clothes and a nice cap; and Addie smoothed down her clean muslin dress and black silk apron, and they were so happy! They went to school now, and their mother's teachings were the cause of a good many praises from their teachers.

Norah came often to see Mrs. Romaine in her new home; and when Herbert bought some land behind the house, and turned it into an extensive garden, his mother said:

"Why not have Dolan for a gardener, and give him the little gothic lodge at the other side of the garden, to live in?"

"Just the thing!" said Herbert, and engaged him that very day.

The gothic lodge was repaired, neatly fitted up with plain new cottage furniture, and in four weeks Norah stood at the door, admiring her husband in his new gardening suit, and the children in their clean frocks, playing with Willie and Addie among the flowers.

"Trust in God! He will not leave thee desolate," were the words which Catherine caused to be inscribed over the entrance to her beautiful summer-house. They were already engraved on her heart and her life.

NO ENTERTAINMENT IS SO CHEAP AS READING, NOR IS ANY PLEASURE SO LASTING.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION

IS AN ELEGANT MISCELLANEOUS FAMILY JOURNAL.

On the first of January, we shall commence VOLUME XII of our favorite journal. It is now the most popular weekly paper in America, a reputation which it has enjoyed for nearly eleven years!—circulating at the present time more than any other miscellaneous weekly journal in the country, with the exception of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL. It is devoted to polite literature, and it embraces written expressly for the paper by the most popular writers of the country. It is also spiced with a record of the notable events of the time, of peace and war, of discoveries, and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, with a record of all that is new and noteworthy, forming an intelligent and instructive companion. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral, discussing, neither directly nor indirectly, the tenets of any sect or clique; therefore making it emphatically

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, STORIES OF THE SEA, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR, AND NOVELETTES,

A PAPER FOR THE MILLION,

and a welcome visitor to the home circle, north or south, east or west. It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to possess the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the MAMMOTH size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming, in all its departments,

AN ORIGINAL PAPER,

embracing among its regular contributors over forty well-known and popular names.

The FLAG is printed on fine white paper, with new, clear and beautiful type, and contains 1240 square inches, being a large weekly paper of eight super-royal quarto pages, and is filled to the brim each week with choice, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Few papers can compete with "The Flag of our Union" as it regards its originality, numbering, as it does, among its contributors a large list of the best names, while its matter is always choice and entertaining.—Daily Bee, Boston.

Carefully printed upon fine white paper, and filled with original matter from beginning to end, "The Flag of our Union" merits the extraordinary popularity which it has enjoyed for ten consecutive years.—Lodges' Repository.

The best of the Boston weeklies.—Arkansas Herald.

Go where you will, from Maine to California, you are sure to see "The Flag of our Union" in nearly every family circle. Mr. Ballou evinces great taste and liberality in the publication of this charming weekly.—Burlington (Vt.) Sentinel.

Parents need not fear to place this charming weekly journal in the hands of their children. It contains all vulgarity, and its tone is moral and refined. As long as bright eyes love to read delightful stories, it will continue to enjoy the extraordinary circulation which it has attained to.—Tribune.

Justly unrivalled in circulation, "The Flag of our Union" presents its immense list of subscribers with choice original matter, which they can obtain nowhere else. The best writers are engaged upon the paper.—Daily (Pitts.) Ledger.

A Boston weekly journal, long and well established, beautifully printed on very fine paper, and filled with choice reading for the fireside. Without seeming in the severe garb of a teacher, it inculcates a large amount of information, and cultivates in the young a love for reading.—National Intelligencer.

"The Flag of our Union" is a choice paper, and merits all the many good things said about it. It is entirely original, and numbers among its contributors many of our best writers, both male and female. It is a treat to see so handsomely printed a paper—clear, bright, and fresh in every line.—New Orleans Delta.

There are few miscellaneous papers so widely known, or so deserving of the popularity they enjoy, as "The Flag of our Union." Refined, entertaining, beautifully printed, and choice in all respects, it is a companion for the home circle.—Richmond White.

Mr. Ballou furnishes his elegant illustrated weekly, "Ballou's Pictorial," and "The Flag of our Union," together, for $4 a year. Those two papers will render any domestic fireside cheerful all winter long.—Ohio Sentinel.

No paper upon our exchange list is so eagerly sought for by our family as "The Flag of our Union." It should be a weekly visitor to every American fireside, for it is eminently a delightful family paper, combining an unusual amount of pleasant original miscellany, with all that is noteworthy in the current events of the day.—Long Star, Texas.

"The Flag of our Union," in its wide-spread circulation, penetrates the log cabin of the far West, and the stately mansions of our Atlantic cities. It is the pioneer of the miscellaneous weeklies, and ten years of successful enterprise has only served to improve and perfect it, until there is nothing left to desire.—Lyons City State.

The pioneer among the miscellaneous weekly press, "The Flag of our Union," has proved the most popular and successful. After ten years of profitable existence, it is now more pleasing and attractive than ever.—Quincy (Mass.) Patriot.

A charming weekly visitor to the home circle is "The Flag of our Union"—choice, moral, and very instructive in each issue, and edited, not by a pair of scissors, but by an experienced and careful hand.—Charlotte (S. C.) Mercury.

Catering for no clique or sect, it is a universal favorite.—Alabama Painter. Mr. Ballou, the editor, has many years of editorial experience, and understands just how to make a paper that will please everybody. Hence the vast circulation and popularity of "The Flag of our Union."—Barnstable Patriot.

TERMS: INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                        |        |
|------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year | $2 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " "     | 7 00   |
| 10 " " "               | 15 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together, $4 per annum.

Sample copies sent by mail when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

OLD FISH HOUSE, END OF CHELSEA BEACH, MASS.

SEASIDE SKETCHES NEAR BOSTON.

Our artist, Mr. Kilbarn, on this and the next page, has given us some of the fruits of his professional midsummer rambles. The good people of Boston are not entirely exempt from obedience to that impulse which leads mankind to see the greatest attractions in the remotest scenes. Many hie away to the White Mountains and the Kaatskills, who have never climbed Blue Hill or Powder-horn Hill. Persons see beauties in the Bay of Naples, who never detected the charms of our own Boston harbor, or, very like, go into extacies on little strips of British sand, utterly forgetful of such glorious places for rides or rambles as Chelsea and Nahant Beaches. Still, there are enough to appreciate home beauties; and now and then, when the tide of fashionable immigration sets forth to Newport, Coney Island and the Rip-Raps, there may be found some editor bold enough to insinuate that Boston is itself a watering-place, and there are localities within easy walking or riding distance, well worthy of being patronized. Well—with these pictures before us, we again go back, in imagination, to the shore of that sounding sea, which has been falsely charged with monotony, but which, even in a calm, has its dimples, its smiles and frowns—its thousand modes of expression. We listen to the plaintive murmurs of the waves as they die in music on the beach, to the wild battle-music of the billows when the ire of old Neptune is raised, and he sends his crested warriors to storm the barriers against which he wages an undying warfare. Or we loiter in some shady nook, the shallow pretence of reading abandoned, and gazing out on the face of the waters, follow the course of the white sails, and giving a loose rein to the fancy, con-

of to-day, we think, cannot fail to prove acceptable. The first in the series is a sketch of the old fish-house at the end of Chelsea Beach, which, by the way, is five miles long, and one of the longest, if not the longest, sea beach in the Atlantic States. The jore up a thousand pleasing visions. We attach ourselves to some white-winged bark, and try to imagine who are on board—what little society thus segregated from the mass of humanity, and seeking a far fortune by a pathway ever perilous. We call up the images of the daring navigators who have gilded the page of history with their great deeds. We think of those fierce Northmen, the Vikings, who swept the broad Atlantic with their adventurous galleys, and cast their anchors in the farthest bays. Or we think of the gallant Genoese steering towards immortal fame in a frail caravel, such as the boldest pilot of to-day would hardly venture in. The romance of the sea and of the sea-shore is inexhaustible. They have their superstitions, their legendary tales, their history, and, above all, their poetry. But if there are those whom neither poetry nor association nor heathy move, still against the dear delights of bathing, fishing and fish chowders few are proof. Hence our illustrations

EUTAW HOUSE, LONG ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

ATLANTIC HOUSE, CHELSEA BEACH.

building in our sketch has certainly an "ancient and fish-like" odor about it, but it, nevertheless, is a spot around which many pleasant associations cluster. In front of it are a group of men cooping casks, while the shore is lively with pleasure seekers. Our second view is of the Eutaw House, Long Island, a commodious building and a pleasant resort. The view is sketched from the headland on which the lighthouse stands. On the right is a schooner, and a party of men are engaged in wheeling ballast on board. The next view is a very pretty scene, in which the most prominent feature is the Atlantic House, kept by J. Moran. It is the first house on the beach, and the stopping-place of the omnibuses from Boston through Chelsea and North Chelsea—a very pretty village, by the way. The next engraving represents Long Island Head Light, sketched from the steamboat wharf, a part of which is seen in front, covered with figures. The fifth view delineates the Neptune House, kept by E. Hayes. It is the next house beyond the Atlantic. In front of the house is a swing in full blast. Our last picture is the Robinson Crusoe House, Chelsea Beach, kept by Amos Talton. It is the last hotel on the beach. The boat-house, summer-house, and all the surroundings are accurately sketched.

CHRISTMAS CUSTOMS.

A contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine for February, 1795, thus describes an amusement practised on Christmas Eve, at the mansion of a worthy baronet, at Ashton, near Birmingham, down to the end of the last century. He writes: "As soon as supper is over, a table is set in the hall. On it is placed a brown loaf, with twenty silver three-pences stuck on the top of it, a tankard of ale, with pipes and tobacco; and the two oldest servants have chair behind it, to sit as judges if they please. The steward brings servants, both men and women, by one at a time, covered with a winnow-sheet, and lays their right hand on the loaf, exposing no other part of the body. The eldest of the two judges guesses at the person, by naming a name, then the younger judge, and lastly the oldest again. If they hit upon the right name, the steward leads the person back again; but if they do not, he takes off the winnow-sheet, and the person receives a three-pence, makes a low obeisance to the judges, but speaks not a word. When the second servant was brought, the younger judge guessed first and third and thus they did, alternately, till all the money was given away. Whatever servant had not slept in the house the preceding night forfeited his right to the money. No account is given of the origin of this strange custom, but it

LONG ISLAND HEAD LIGHT, BOSTON HARBOR.

"The moral of it is, that the devil died when Christ was born." This custom was discontinued for many years, but was subsequently revived by the vicar of the church in 1828.—Sharp's London Magazine for December.

CANINE SAGACITY.

William Dredge lives about five miles from the town of Trinity, Cal., at the base of the mountain which towers north of that place. A short time after midnight on one of the days of the last winter, he was aroused from his slumbers by the howl of a dog. No menace on his part could rid him of the presence of the strange intruder. The dog continued to walk around the cabin, still repeating his dismal, moaning howling, occasionally making efforts to effect an entrance through the closed doorway. Surprised and somewhat alarmed at this singular demonstration, Mr. Dredge at last hastily dressed himself and unbolted the door, when a large mastiff rushed in. The dog at once caught hold of his trousers and employed every gentle means to induce the man to accompany him outside. Dredge's first impression was that he was mad; and yet so peculiar and earnest were his dumb entreaties that he finally yielded and proceeded without the cabin. A joyful yell was the result, and the delighted brute, now capering and wagging his tail before him, and now returning and gently seizing him by the band and trousers, induced Dredge to follow him. Their course was up the precipitous side of the mountain, and soon they were forcing their way through a snow-drift that had settled in one of its numerous fissures. Here comes the wonder. Upon the snow lay the body of a woman, who had evidently perished from cold and exhaustion. Her limbs were already stiffened in death; but what was the surprise of Mr. Dredge to see that faithful dog ferret out, from a handle of clothing that lay by the side of the woman, a young child, about two years old, still warm and living. A little inspection, aided by the starlight and the brightness of the snow, enabled him to discover that the person of the woman was nearly naked. With a mother's affection, she had stripped her own person in order to furnish warmth to her exposed infant. The trusty dog had completed her work of self-sacrifice. Mr. Dredge immediately conveyed the child to his cabin, and, arousing some of his neighbors, proceeded again to the mountain to secure from the attacks of the wild beasts the person of the unfortunate woman.—California Times.

NEPTUNE HOUSE, CHELSEA BEACH.

has been practised ever since the family lived there. When the money is gone, the servants have full liberty to drink, dance, sing, and go to bed when they please." "At York," says Stukely, only a century ago, "on the eve of Christmas-day they carried mistletoe to the high altar of the cathedral, and proclaimed a public and universal liberty, pardon, and freedom to all sorts of inferior, and even wicked people, at the gates of the city, towards the four quarters of heaven." "In the Isle of Man," relates Waldron, "on the twenty-fourth of December, towards evening, all the servants have a holiday; they go not to bed all night, but ramble about till the bells ring in all the churches, which is at twelve o'clock, when prayers being over, they go to hunt the wren; and after having found one of these poor birds, they kill her, and lay her on a bier; bring her to the parish church, and bury her 'with a whimsical kind of solemnity,' singing dirges over her in the Manx language, which they call her knell; after which Christmas begins." At Dewshury, Yorkshure, one of the church bells is tolled as at a funeral, on Christmas eve; and any one asking whose bell it was, would be told it was the devil's knell.

ROBINSON CRUSOE HOUSE, CHELSEA BEACH.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SERENADE.

BY JAMES F. FITTS.

O lady, wake! The stars of night
Their silent vigils now are keeping;
And, guided by their twinkling light,
I find the place where thou art sleeping.

O lady, rise! The day is gone;
The risen moon is sweetly glowing;
And forest, garden, hill and lawn
Are lighted by the beams she's throwing.

O lady, list! I'll wake the strings
Of my guitar, with song or story;
While Philomel in answer sings,
I'll sing to thee of love or glory.

O lady, sleep! The midnight hour
Doth fast approach, and stars are paling;
Rest sweetly now! For every flower
Doth sleep while night is still prevailing.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GOLDEN DEATH.

BY ESTHER DENNE.

VERY many of the older inhabitants of our "Modern Athens" will remember a broker's sign, displayed in one of the by-streets of the city. The building itself was demolished long ago, and in its place stands an elegant store.

The particulars of the fearful story connected with that building, are, I think, known to very few. But if it is a fearful story, it has, at least, its moral, which deserves to be recorded.

There never was a better man for business than Hanson the broker, as he was familiarly called. Early and late he was at his post; and there was a floating rumor in the neighborhood that he had already acquired a considerable property. It was certainly true, that the sight of gold cheered his heart more than anything else in the world would have done. Little and old and greedy was Hanson the broker.

Mrs. Hanson was a careless, simple woman, who never took any sort of pains to make things go right. If household affairs went wrong, there was no alternative but to sit down and cry till they righted themselves. She hated all trouble, and cared nothing about hoarding money, thereby being the very opposite of her husband.

The only children of the household were two boys, George and William, George being two years the elder. These two boys differed as much in their dispositions as did the father and mother. As a child, George displayed the miserly habits which years only had developed in the father. With a rare cunning for one so young, he always gained the advantage over all with whom he came in contact. Not a toy or a piece of money did William delight in, but what it soon graced the pocket of his greedy brother. The rare talents of George for trading were early seen in his successful barter of marbles, tops and other toys. He always made the best bargain, either by threats or persuasions, and bore off his winnings triumphantly, in the face of a dozen opponents, who were entirely unable to cope with him in the weapons which he used.

William, the younger son, while he had neither the health nor the strength of his brother, differed from him in all other things. He liberally gave whatever he possessed, and was accounted to be the most generous boy in the neighborhood. His genius, such as it was, displayed itself in the rude drawings which were scattered in every part of the dwelling. But though rude they were, they bore the marks of powers of no humble order.

Time went on. The broker's sign still caught the eye of the passer-by; and within a little, old man plied his business from morning till night. Oursins grow with our years, it is said, and Hanson the broker's avarice grew with his years. His avaricious, greedy, grasping spirit developed itself more and more. Gold, gold, gold, was his constant cry, and many a face turned itself in despair from the little shop, and the stony-hearted, inexorable miser within. There was a rumor that the pitiless broker had driven more than one to that last resort of despairing humanity—a suicide's grave.

George, as he grew up, became his father's delight. He was the son after his own heart. The boy's insatiable love for gold rivalled his father's; and already George looked with pride upon the treasure he had collected, if not dishonorably, at least in a questionable way.

About this time, a change occurred in the household. Mrs. Hanson had one sister, who lived in the country, having married an architect. They had no children, and at length determined to adopt one. Accordingly, Mrs. Fletcher proposed to the broker and his wife to take one of their sons to educate as her own. The broker had no objections, as long as they did not take George, the pride of his heart. But William was only a useless incumbrance to him, and he would gladly get rid of the expense of maintaining him. Mrs. Hanson liked the idea, because there was a prospect of less trouble to her; and even her blinded eyes could not but see that William would be benefited by the change. So William became the adopted son of Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher.

His quiet, country home suited better the boy's disposition than the noisy streets in the city. And here, too, he had an opportunity of acquiring the education which the avaricious spirit of his father would have denied him.

Mr. Fletcher had a fine education bestowed upon his adopted son, and felt himself repaid a hundred fold by the rapid progress which the boy made, and his generous, affectionate disposition. His singular taste for drawing was discovered, and cultivated, and promised to develop itself into a rare talent.

No longer uncared-for and neglected, but loved and appreciated, William exerted himself to please those with whom he had found such a pleasant home. As he grew up, it was decided that he should become an architect like his father, for which business his wonderful taste for drawing peculiarly adapted him.

In the meantime, George, from being his father's delight, had become absolutely indispensable to him, by his sagacity and cunning. He showed himself even more greedy than his greedy parent. It was at length decided that these two worthies should enter into partnership together, and that the enormous profits of the business should be shared equally. Things went on very well, only, if anything, more despairing faces than ever turned from the place, where even a more pitiless spirit than Hanson the broker's reigned.

William, by his steady industry and his prudence, had acquired a little property of five hundred dollars. He had already settled in his mind that when this was increased to a certain sum, he should be able to marry. At present, both himself and his promised bride were too poor to think of it. But if the sum which he had earned, were increased so as to afford him a capital to start with, and his adopted father was able to give him the assistance he had promised, he would be enabled to carry out the plans which he had formed, and would have the pleasure of knowing that his fair prospects in life had resulted from his own energy and perseverance. At present, his thought was how to dispose of his money to the best advantage, and in some place where it could be easily forthcoming when wanted. After mature deliberation, and by the advice of Mr. Fletcher, William decided to place the sum with his father, the broker, feeling confident that it would be perfectly safe in such hands. The broker received it willingly, and assured his son that it would be much increased when he should want to use it.

Time went on; and gradually the business of the broker's shop fell off. People began to dislike to go there, as the character of both father and son became widely known. Many rumors were afloat concerning their practices, and suspicion of dishonest dealings having once been circulated, the place began to be avoided.

George proposed a plan to his father, one day, as they sat in the shop. Having had only one or two customers during the forenoon to attend to, they found the time to hang heavily upon their hands. It was this suggested the plan which George unfolded.

He proposed to gather in all the money which they had trusted out, change it into gold, and conceal it in some secure place in the house. In order to make the place of concealment as secure as possible, he proposed that his father and himself should dig a place in the cellar, construct a sort of brick wall, as a division between the cellar and the vault, and in this vault to place their money. The banker readily agreed to this plan, delighting in the idea of having his cherished gold close at hand, where he could look upon it daily. And accordingly they went to work, conducting themselves with as much secrecy as possible, and so well did they manage, that not even Mrs. Hanson knew that anything unusual was transpiring. The place in the cellar was dug, and with some difficulty the brick wall was completed; but so natural did it look that no one could have told but what it was the legitimate cellar wall. Just over the vault was a small room, used as a deposit for rubbish. In the floor of this room a trap door was constructed, and thus the initiated could make a very easy descent into the money vault. But a stranger could not easily have discovered the door, so effectually was it concealed by the accumulated rubbish.

The money was collected together, placed in bags and boxes, and secured in the vault. The mania which possessed both father and son led them daily to descend to this place of concealment to hoard and count the gold. It was all the happiness of their lives; and a strange fascination it was that the yellow metal possessed for them.

William, who from time to time had added to his little property, which still remained in the hands of his father, found the time drawing near when he should be able to realize the plans which he had marked out for himself. Accordingly, he asked from his father the money which he had entrusted to him a year before. The temptation was too strong for the old broker to resist. With many expressions of deep sorrow, he told of the falling off of the business, of heavy and severe losses which he had sustained, and the consequent loss of nearly all his property. It would not be in his power to return more than half of the sum entrusted by William, and even that would impoverish him. Though intensely disappointed, William begged his father not to think of returning any portion of the money, but to keep it for his own support. He was young and strong and could work. Old Mr. Hanson, the broker, felt a few twinges of conscience, but they were quickly smothered by the thought of his beloved gold, the yellow metal for which he sacrificed everything.

William, in the meantime, had commenced to tread cheerfully the same path, hardly regretting what he felt had been a comfort to his father. Many a one would have lent him the requisite amount, but he refused it, deeming it best to rely on his own exertions. It is needless to say that the marriage was again postponed.

"I tell you, George, you have not given me my full share—two hundred dollars of that is mine."

"You are mistaken, father; the whole amount is mine," said George Hanson, coolly.

"That such a cheating villain should be a son of mine," muttered the old man, angrily.

"Like father, like son," was the only answer.

"I tell you, George Hanson, this very day your money shall be separated from mine. You shall take it and begone from my sight. I will make a new will and leave everything to William. Not a cent shall you have from me." And the old man paced across the room angrily.

George Hanson was enraged at this threat of making a new will, and in his anger he struck his father a blow. The old man fell, striking the stove in his descent. As George, conscious stricken, stooped to raise him up, he discovered that he was dead. Either the blow, the fall, or his rage, had killed him.

For a long time the guilty son sat, his face covered with his hands, indifferent for once to his own fate, as his father's murderer. But gradually a thought of himself came back. His own life or freedom must not be parted with easily—they were too precious; and perhaps the blow had not been the cause of death. If it had, there were no witnesses to the fact. So George Hanson, smothering the only natural feelings of penitence he had ever had for anything in his life, raised his father's body, and then went forth to startle the neighbors with the information that Mr. Hanson, the broker, had died in a fit. And startling indeed was the announcement; but then, everybody said they always knew he would die in a fit.

George, in the meantime, calm and self-possessed, answered all the questions and conducted all the business. Mrs. Hanson cried, because that was her invariable remedy for what could not be helped. The only really sincere mourner was William, whom the dead man had so cruelly wronged.

"Out of sight, out of mind," and Hanson, the little old broker, once buried was soon forgotten.

George, of course, succeeded to his father's property, the amount of which no one but himself dreamed of. Hours and hours he spent in the place of concealment, counting the gold—now all his own. He was rather glad than otherwise, that his father was not alive to dispute the treasure with him.

William, who had never had any expectations of money from his father, and who, besides, believed that he had died poor, troubled himself not in the least about the will, except to see that his mother was comfortably provided for.

In the course of time, George began to think that his mother was too great an expense to him. He wanted to get rid of her in some way, and finally proposed that she should seek a home elsewhere, as the house was sold.

"I thought your father owned this house," said Mrs. Hanson, thunderstruck at the proposal.

"He sold it before his death. I am really sorry, mother, that you cannot remain here, but I think William will be glad to have you come and live near him."

"I shall not leave the house until I am certain it is 'sold,'" said Mrs. Hanson, for once aroused to indignation.

"Very well, mother, I will prove it to you."

The next day he showed her a deed by which the house was transferred to a stranger. The whole, of course, was a forgery, but Mrs. Hanson was apparently satisfied.

When William learned the particulars of the interview, he insisted that his mother should immediately leave a place where she was exposed to such treatment. A place in the country was found where she could be boarded, and William paid all the expenses, rather than call upon his brother to bear any share of them. Although this would delay still longer his marriage, William felt it was his duty, as well as a pleasure to him, to make his mother comfortable in her old age. In the meantime, all intercourse ceased between the two brothers.

George still revelled unmolested amid his gold. He grew more and more absorbed in the contemplation of his riches, and it was noticed that he very seldom left the house. At length there came a time when he was not seen for two whole days. On the third day a neighbor ventured to try the door of the shop and found it unlocked. Everything inside appeared as if he had left the room with the intention of soon coming back again. His absence was so very singular that on the afternoon of that same day a messenger was despatched to William with the information. On his arrival, a search was instituted with but little result. Everything in the house remained as usual. A chair in the shop was pushed back as if the occupant had but just arisen. Some half opened papers were lying upon the counter. Nothing showed that any preparation for a journey had been made, though that seemed at first to be the only solution of the mystery. But no one had seen the missing man start on this journey. No one had ever known him to go on one before; and the idea seemed improbable when they remembered his habits. As the fourth day wore on and no traces of his brother were discovered, William, assisted by Mr. Fletcher, commenced another and more thorough search. In passing through the rubbish room, William stooped to pick up something he had dropped, and in so doing discovered the trap door. Surprised at discovering something the existence of which he had never known before, he lifted the door cautiously up. As the rays of light penetrated below, a horrible sight presented itself.

There lay the missing man, crushed by the weight of a number of iron-bound boxes, which had fallen upon him whilst in the act of stooping. He had gone to count his gold as usual, leaving the trap door partially opened by means of a stick; the stick had given away, and the trap door coming down suddenly, had disturbed the pile of heavy boxes. Life seemed to have been crushed out instantaneously, and one of the boxes having burst, a complete shower of the yellow metal for which he had lived and died, had covered the miserable man from head to foot. His hands clutched his treasure even in death, as if he wished to carry it with him wherever he went. It was literally a golden death.

[Written for Baillo's Pictorial.]

GIVE ME BACK MY LYRE!

BY IRVING MONTAIGNE.

Tell me not the laurel's dying,
Though the lyre be long unstrung;
Tell me not the Muse is flying,
Till her dying song is sung;
Tell me not the day is wasted,
Till the night fall darkly down;
Tell me not life's hopes are blasted,
Till we're lost the golden crown.

Tell me not the laurel's dying,
Though the lyre be long unstrung—
When the pent-up soul is sighing
Thus to breathe away in song,
Think ye I can wait for glory?
Tune my trembling lip for fame,
When a human heart's my story,
And my breath its funeral flame?

Tell me not the laurel's dying,
Though the lyre be long unstrung!
Seize the Muse while they're flying—
Breathe the soul away in song.
Golden Riches—I defy ye:
I defy thee—sounding Fame!
But my lyre—O hang beside me;
Leave me that—though blot my name.

[Written for Baillo's Pictorial.]

THE CHASE.

BY FRED. W. SAUNDERS.

"It is white as milk, sir!" exclaimed one of the men, rushing into the cabin in a high state of excitement.

"What is white as milk?" asked the captain, who, together with the chief mate, stood, compasses in hand, poring over a chart that lay spread out upon the table.

"The water alongside, sir. I think we must be shoaling very rapidly."

"Just as I feared," muttered the captain, gloomily; "the bank is right before us."

"And we must go over it?" said the mate, inquiringly.

"Yes, or lay our bones upon it," responded the captain. "But come, let us get on deck. It is useless looking at the chart any longer; we know our position only too well."

Ascending the companion-ladder, the sailor's statement was fully verified, the water all around presenting that peculiar appearance which indicates a sandy bottom at no great depth; while the ship, under a cloud of canvass, was flying through the foam with the speed of a racer. The crew were grouped about the deck with anxious faces as they looked ahead, where the waves curled and combed over the bank, or glanced astern, where, at a distance of less than three miles, a heavy frigate, with the blood-red cross of St. George at her peak, was steadily and relentlessly pursuing, like a bloodhound on the trail.

"I think she has gained upon us slightly since we went below, Mr. Midships," said the captain, addressing his first mate.

"I think she has somewhat; but not so much but that we might keep out of her way until night, when we could easily lodge her in the dark, if it were not for this confounded bank," returned the mate, with an anxious look ahead. "I never crossed this shoal but once; and then, although we were in a light schooner, drawing less than half the water we do now, it was a narrow escape for us. In my opinion, we must strike before we are half way over."

"Well," replied the captain, with an air of fixed determination, "if we must strike, there will be an end of it. The only alternative is to surrender to the Englishman; and then come the prison ship, starvation, disease and death. If she strikes, let her strike. By running, there is at least a chance; and I shall trust to that chance sooner than surrender."

"They are going to try the range of their how-chasers, I reckon," said the mate, directing the captain's attention astern.

A slight commotion was observable upon the frigate's forecabin; the muzzle of a gun protruded from her bridle port; a cloud of thick white smoke shot in a circling ring from beneath the knight-heads, and rolled up against the belly of the foresail. The next instant the report was borne down upon the wind, and a round shot came skipping over the crests of the waves, and passed the ship within half a dozen fathoms to leeward.

"With a little better aim, their irons might trouble us," remarked the mate.

"Yes, it might, but we have very little to fear on that score; they will scarcely deaden their headway by firing at this distance. The only anxiety I feel, is in regard to this bank. Just step below, if you please, Mr. Midships, and ascertain at what time we have high water here."

The mate descended the companion ladder, and soon returned with the information, that the Nautical Almanac reported the flood tide to make upon that bank at six o'clock.

"Six o'clock," repeated the captain, thoughtfully, "six o'clock. It is now five, and the middle and shallowest part of this shoal is at least fifteen miles distant. If we could pass that point before the tide begins to ebb, our chance would not be so very desperate; but if not, we are no better than dead men. We must make more sail, Mr. Midships, and at once."

The ship, with something more than half a gale of wind on the starboard quarter, was under whole topsails, courses and topgallant sails, a spread of canvass which would have been considered too great for prudence in such a breeze under ordinary circumstances, for the spars and rigging evidently felt the strain severely; but now that life or death depended upon the vessel's speed, it was no time to think of favoring the top hamper.

"Set the foretopmast studdingsail," said the captain.

"Ay, ay, sir," responded the mate, and walking forward to the waist, he issued the order.

"Reeve the foretopmast studdingsail gear; rig out the boom, and get the sail along," repeated the boatswain from the forecabin.

The men sprang aloft with the end of the tack and halyards, and having rove them through the blocks, the boom upon the foreyard was rigged out through the boom and quarter iron far beyond the yard-arm, and the sail bent on.

"Hoist away," shouted the captain, who had been waiting for a favorable lull; for with the breeze then blowing, it would have been fitter to shorten than to make sail, and there was great danger of the sails blowing to ribbons before it could be set.

At the word, the men swayed down upon the halyards, and the sail rose from the deck. But no sooner did it reach the top of the rail, than rattling the wind, it swung far out ahead, and passing in forward of the foresail and foretopmast, it thrashed and beat upon the yard and sails with a force that threatened to demolish everything with which it came in contact, and almost rendered ineffectual the efforts of the men to hoist it to its place. But the hardy crew, urged on by the evident necessity of the case, bent strongly to the work, and the fluttering sail was at length hoisted to the block on the topmast yard arm, where it hung slating and flapping, threatening every moment to go to pieces. The tack was now taken to the capstan and hove steadily in, the long, slender boom twisting and bending with the strain until its continued existence seemed little less than a miracle. Contrary to the reasonable expectations, but much to the joy of all hands, the straining clew was at length drawn slowly out to the boom end, the sheet trimmed down to the rail, and the huge sail, now fairly steeled in its place, drew strongly in the rising gale.

The good ship, feeling the increase of canvass forward, lifted her bow in the water, and with every sheet and brace ringing like the strings of a mammoth wind harp, dashed through the angry, leaping waves, driving the spray far before and on either side in her headlong course, and burying her forecabin in a smother of foam.

"Try how fast she's going, Mr. Midships," said the captain, who with uneasy steps was pacing fore and aft on the quarter-deck.

"Lay aft here, a couple of ye, and hold the reel," said the mate.

Two men sprang upon the poop, and got the apparatus in readiness—one man holding the reel, and the other the glass, while the mate tended the line.

"Watch," said the mate, casting the log over the lee quarter rail.

"Watch, sir," responded the man, promptly.

"Turn," said the mate, sharply, as the log passed astern out of the influence of the dead water, and the line began to pass rapidly through his fingers, while the reel spun swiftly round.

"Turn, sir," echoed the man, quickly reversing the half minute glass, and carefully watching the running sand as it poured through the opening; while the reel, with a constantly accelerated motion, continued to spin on its axis, and the line to pass over the rail.

"Hold," said the man, as the last grain of sand disappeared from the upper part of the glass.

The mate suddenly checked the line, and examining the knot that last went over the rail, he left the line to be hauled in and coiled up by the men, while he walked over to the weather side of the deck to report.

"Well!" said the captain, inquiringly, as he approached him.

"She marks eleven knots and a half by the log line," replied the mate; and taking into account the set of the sea, which sends the log home, I should say she was going through it something more than twelve."

"Not fast enough," said the captain. "We must knock fourteen or fifteen out of her, or we shall never wove over the bank. We must crowd more sail on to her, Mr. Midships."

"Impossible!" exclaimed the mate, with astonishment. "She can hardly bear what she has now. As it is, I expect to see something part every minute. Do you see?—the weather fore brace and studdingsail tack is fairly smoking with the strain."

"Can't help that. You must reeve preventer braces, and get the lower studdingsail on her."

"Very well, sir," replied the mate. "But we shall have the boom coming inboard by the run before we can boom-end the jackyard."

The captain made a gesture of impatience, and he went forward to issue the necessary orders.

The lower studdingsail is an immense square sail, half as large as the fore course, and is hoisted to the end of the foretopmast studdingsail boom—the tack coming down through a block on the end of a long swinging boom, which juts out some twenty-five or thirty-five feet from the vessel's side. The strain upon this sail is enormous; and though increasing the vessel's speed materially, it tries the strength of the booms and rigging to the utmost, when it is set in a heavy breeze.

With almost incredible effort the sail was hoisted to its place without any accident, though the boom whipped and bent like a rattan, instead of the stout, heavy spar it was. With this additional spread of sail, the ship darted onward to her work—almost seeming to leap clear of the water as she sprang from wave to wave; now lifting her bows high in the air, and again plunging heavily into the yielding billows, churning the waters into foam, and deluging the deck with spray.

While this was being done on board the ship, the frigate was by no means idle. With a larger crew, the same sail had been made upon her in much less time, and the distance between them had very perceptibly diminished. With a torrent of foam and spray dashing far before her and flying clear to her foretopmast yard, she held on her course as steadily and resistlessly as a cannon-shot.

It was now near the turn of the tide, and the highest portion of the bank was yet three miles distant. The gale, which had been steadily on the increase for the past hour, had now reached such a pitch, as to cause serious fears for the safety of the masts. They would gladly have relieved the spars, by taking in the studdingsails, but it was now too late—any attempt to start them would have ensured their destruction, and perhaps the loss of one or more yards; and still the gale piped fresher and stronger, singing through the strained rigging with a sharp, ringing sound. The stretched and swollen sails gaped ominously at many a starting seam, and semi-transparent patches began to make their appearance at the clews and about the reefband. The jib-stays belled over in wonderful bights to leeward, and the poor ship, quivering in every plank and ropeyarn, fairly howled through the seething foam that shot like lightning by, beneath her lee.

With the most intense anxiety, each man on board the ship awaited the critical moment. The dreaded point was almost reached; the water evidently grew more and more shallow every instant; the waves combed and broke as on a lee shore.

"We are almost on the spot," said the captain, in a hoarse whisper.

The flying ship rose upon a billow and plunged heavily forward; there was a slight grating beneath her keel. Again she rose and fell with the surging wave; the shock was harder, and a quiver ran through her entire frame. A third time she settled in the trough, striking her stern-post heavily upon the bank, driving the lower rudder pintle from the gudgeon, and sending the wheel spinning round with the velocity of light, throwing the helmsman high into the air. Once more she rose upon the swell; each man grasped some object for support, and with set teeth and suspended breath, awaited the catastrophe. An instant she hung upon the crest of a wave, as if in dread; then plunging forward, settled in the water. There was no shock. Again she rose and fell, and still the expected crash was delayed—the water was perceptibly deepening.

"She is over!" shouted the captain.

"She is over!" cried the men, exultingly, "She is over!"

"Stand by to shorten sail there for'ard!" vociferated the mate. The order was obeyed with remarkable promptitude. A strong puff of the still rising gale swept through the rigging. There was a rending crash, and the foretopmast and lower studdingsails, bursting from their boltropes, flew far away to leeward like white gulls; the lower, swinging boom came in against the rail with a loud bang, and the ship, relieved from the unusual strain, held on her course with easier motion, though with diminished speed.

All eyes were now turned upon the frigate, which, less than two miles astern, was dashing onward through the foam, with her snowy canvass and towering spars—a gallant sight, indeed. A short fifteen minutes brought her to the spot where the ship had struck; but that fifteen minutes was of the utmost importance. The tide was falling, and the frigate drew more water than the ship. As she neared the bar, it was evident they were becoming aware of the danger; the studdingsail gear and the topgallant sheets and halyards were let go by the run, and with everything flying, the yards were braced sharp up, and the vessel hauled on the wind.

But their precautions were taken too late. Rising on the heaving swell, she rolled to leeward, and sinking in the trough, struck heavily broadside on to the bank, pitching her three masts over the side, and fairly dragging her bowsprit out by the roots. The next wave swept her over the bank, and she lay wallowing in the trough of the sea, with her hull undamaged, but with never a spar upon which to stretch an inch of canvass.

The frigate was now fair to beg assistance from the vessel she so lately hoped to make a prize, and gun after gun flashed through the twilight, and boomed over the waters; but it is treason to render aid and comfort to the enemy in time of war, and the ship, hailing on the wind, stood full and by for Yankee town on a taut bowline.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE BIBLE, ASK AND ANSWER, AND OTHER LECTURES. By WM. HENRY MILLBURN. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1857. 12mo. pp. 809.

This volume embraces a number of lectures on various topics, but chiefly devoted to western history and phases of social life and adventure in the West. The author has labored us fully to society, in spite of the impediment which a partial blindness placed in his path. His lectures exhibit energy, truthfulness, originality, and great descriptive powers, and are quite a valuable contribution to our literature. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

WRITING AND FISHING. By CHARLES NORDHOFF, author of "Man-of-War Life" and the "Merchant Vessel." Cincinnati: Moore, Wilstach & Keyes. 1856. 18mo. pp. 383.

As entertaining as a novel. The life of a whaler, with his trials, adventures and "hair breadth escapes," is herein vividly depicted. All who have a relish for maritime adventure will find ample enjoyment in these pages. For sale by Whittemore, Niles & Hall.

VIOLETS, OR, THE CROSS AND THE CROWN. By M. J. McINTOSH. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 415.

This story, by a lady writer not unknown to fame, is well-written and deeply interesting, while its moral and religious tone is unexceptionable. It is full of incident, and ends happily. We shall not disappoint our readers by giving an analysis of the plot.

STORIES OF THE FIELD AND FOREST. By WILSON FLAGG. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1857. 12mo.

The object of this work is to foster a taste for the observation of nature, and to aid in the culture of a love of it. Mr. Flagg is himself a keen observer, and a warm lover of nature, and withal a fine writer. In his charming work, he captures the panorama of the months to come before us, painting out the various objects of interest that present themselves in animate and inanimate nature. The vicissitudes of the seasons, the habits of birds, the changes of trees, the variety of insect life, a thousand rural topics, are discussed gracefully and well. We cordially welcome the appearance of this work, and wish it the greatest success its merit should command.

NEW MUSIC—FROM OLIVER DUTTON, 115 Washington Street, we have received No. 1 of Dr. Watts's Songs for Children. "Verech' it too," from Rossi's "Diello," the "Jubilee Polka," the "Yungfrau Polka," and the "Early Flower," a song.

FAMILIAR SCIENCE. By DAVID A. WELLS, A. M. Philadelphia: Childs & Peterson. 1856. 8vo. pp. 595.

One of the most useful works we have for a long time met with. It is arranged in the form of question and answer, and explains the principles of natural and physical science, and their practical and familiar applications to the employment and necessities of common life. No work of this kind is complete without illustrations, and this line over a hundred and sixty well executed engravings.

MR. GEORGE VANDENHOFF.

The accompanying portrait of one of the most distinguished ornaments of the modern stage was drawn expressly for us by Barry, from a photograph by Masury, Silsbee & Case. George Vandenhoff is the son of the celebrated tragedian, John Vandenhoff, and was born in the city of Salisbury, Wiltshire, England. He was destined by his father for the legal profession, and received a finished education at the college of Stonyhurst, the alma mater of the elder Vandenhoff, and a favorite institution with the higher classes of English society. As a proof of his scholarship, we may mention that during his collegiate career, he received no fewer than six prize medals for English, Latin and Greek composition. He also distinguished himself greatly as a debater and declaimer. He commenced his legal studies at Liverpool, and, after being admitted to practice in the high courts of Westminster, returned to the former city to begin his professional career. He was soon recognized as a young man of the highest ability, employed as solicitor and secretary of the Liverpool Reform Association—a powerful political body, selected to deliver Lord Brougham's lectures before the Mechanics' Association, and subsequently elected solicitor to the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks, an office requiring great legal acumen and industry, and strict integrity of character, as the income of the estate committed to his management amounted to two millions of dollars. In the employments thus conferred on him, he acquitted himself with high honor; and a brilliant future, rich with the promise of fame and wealth, opened before him. But he chose to renounce it for the stage. He made his first appearance in London, at Covent Garden Theatre, under the management of Charles Matthews and Madame Vestris, in the character of Leon, in "Rule a Wife and have a Wife," with complete success. The public and the press emphatically ratified his choice of a profession. His fine face and figure, his cultivated mind, his melodious voice and finished elocution, completed the conquest of the audience. From London he went to Liverpool, where he was hailed with enthusiasm. After a professional tour of some extent, making daily advances in power and popularity, he returned to Covent Garden in 1842, and, at the close of a successful season, took passage for this country. He made his first appearance before an American audience at the Park Theatre, New York, in September, 1842, as Hamlet—a character in which he had prepared himself by long and conscientious study. His performance was a complete triumph, to which the name he bore contributed no part; for we Americans are no believers in hereditary fame. With us the bearer of an historic name is subjected, for that very reason, to a severe ordeal. Mr. Vandenhoff was equally well appreciated in Boston, Philadelphia, and the other large cities of the Union. In 1848, he sustained the severe test of supporting Mr. Macready in a series of characters. Every year that Mr. Vandenhoff has remained among us has added to his professional reputation, and to the esteem in which private society holds him as a gentleman. Among his most popular characters, we may mention Hamlet, Othello, Falconbridge, Romeo, Reuben Glenroy, Creon (in the Antigone of Sophocles), Charles Surface, in the "School for Scandal," and Rover, in "Wild Oats." The diversity of these characters shows sufficiently the versatility of Mr. Vandenhoff, which is adequate to all the exigencies of the higher drama. Mr. Vandenhoff, during his many engagements in our principal cities, has been greeted, not only by full houses, but by floral tributes, valuable presents, and other unmistakable tokens of popular enthusiasm, while the press has been unanimous in his favor. In 1852, after an absence of ten years, Mr. Vandenhoff re-appeared on the English stage, and was most warmly welcomed back. He played Henry V. in Liverpool thirty-five nights; and his London engagement at the Haymarket was brilliantly successful. Both the London Times and the London Morning Post were unqualified in the approbation they bestowed on his performances. The Post said:—"We have no hesitation in declaring Mr. Vandenhoff's Hamlet to be, not only by many degrees the best at present on the stage, but also better than any that has been seen since the days of John Kemble." During this London engagement, he played Benedick, Evelyn, Claude Melnotte, Cardinal Wolsey, and Bob Handy, thus running through the scale from the highest tragedy to the most eccentric light comedy. Returning to America for a brief period, in 1855, he married Miss Makeah, a lady of New York, and after a short and successful engagement at the Boston Theatre, took his bride with him to England, and played with her successful engagements in the principal theatres of the United Kingdom. Mrs. Vandenhoff, we may remark, was highly spoken of by the English press, as a lady of promising histrionic ability, and a fine specimen of American beauty. After having gathered a harvest of gold and laurels on the other side of the Atlantic, they have returned to America to become, we believe, permanently located in this country. Mr. Vandenhoff has just concluded a brilliant engagement at the Boston Museum, and is at present engaged in delivering lectures and readings before the principal literary institutions of New England. He has recently published a work on Elocution, in London, of which we have seen highly laudatory notices in the leading English journals. In this brief outline of Mr. Vandenhoff's career, we have not left ourselves space to speak, as we should like, of his characteristic merits as an actor. We have briefly adverted to his physical and mental qualifications. Let us add, that he is still an arduous student of his art; that applause, however grateful, only stimulates to higher effort; that the truth of nature is his pole-star, and that he never sacrifices his pure and cultivated taste to secure the noisy plaudits of the hour. Had we the space, we might easily crowd our columns with commentaries corroborating what we have advanced respecting the histrionic genius of Mr. Vandenhoff. A very well-written article in the New York American—a high authority—after speaking of the apparent spontaneity of his performances, thus compares his style of Shakspearian reading with that of Mrs. Kemble:—"There is an essential difference in the manner and method of these two great vocal interpreters of Shakspeare. Mrs. Kemble's manner at the table is severe and solemn, almost stern, as if she deemed herself engaged in a high and sacred office—the priestess of the temple in the exercise of her holy functions at the altar. Vandenhoff, on the other hand, enters on his work as if it were a pleasure and a delight to him to pour out the treasure of Shakspeare's verse; he warms, he glows, as if he felt the presence of the god whose oracles he so vividly expounds. Mrs. Kemble excites our respect for the woman, our admiration of her talent, our wonder at her power. Vandenhoff carries us away by the vividness of his own imagination and the intensity of his execution. We forget him, we see only Hamlet, the Ghost, the guilty King, the erring Mother, the hapless Ophelia, the garrulous Polonius; and it is not till the book is closed, that we think of the man who has carried us away. They are both great artists at the head of their distinct schools, and worthy to be named together as the fit interpreters of the immortal poet's mind to the ear and heart of a people." Few judicious critics will dissent from this conclusion.

MR. GEORGE VANDENHOFF.

THE VILLAGE SMITHY.

The beautiful engraving below is thoroughly English in its character. There is not a building in view that is not venerable and time-honored. The "smithy," on the left, is old, and will stand for ages yet under the shadow of the luxuriant trees. Its cheerful ruddy fire is seen blazing through the window. The bridge that crosses the river, the church, spire, the cottages backed by wood and hill, are all old, crumbled and moss-grown. The figures are highly characteristic. On the left, in front of an old cottage with porch and latticed casement, two children are sharing their breakfast with a favorite dog. By the window of the blacksmith's shop, two boys, who have brought a little cob to be shod, have permitted a barefooted gentleman in petticoats to take a seat on the animal; and he sits there as proud as Napoleon crossing the Alps, and far more happy. Further on, the smith is shoeing a sturdy farm horse. On the stoop, to the right, an aged man is sitting, and with a market-woman, who has rested her basket for a moment, is listening to a stalwart farmer, who is discoursing vehemently on some exciting topic of the day.

THE BLACKSMITH'S SHOP.—AN ENGLISH RURAL SCENE.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- H. C.—One stove is a Boston invention, quite new. They are very clean and neat, requiring no fuel. They are as cheap as any other means of heating.
- B. H. W.—In sending us money, where it is of any considerable amount, a draft payable to our order, either on New York or Boston, is the best mode. You may deduct the exchange.
- C. H.—If the horse had given no evidence of illness up to the hour you sold him, though he died the next day, as you admit, still no share of the loss should fall upon you. We are sorry that you named us as umpire; it is never a desirable office.
- KOPZACK II.—The enormous depth of six statute miles has been lately found in the ocean, north of Bermuda. This is exactly double the depth you name.
- L. L.—We can only say that your verses evince a very sad condition—both of mind and body. A severe dose of Dr. Lardley Murray would do you good.
- T. H. S.—You are very wide of the mark. Aesop's fables were written more than five hundred years before Christ.
- LYDIA M.—The daisy and cowslip are English plants, that is, though profusely growing in the fields of Great Britain, they are not to be found with us. We have read so much about them, that they seem like old friends of our childhood.
- TRACER.—Late calculations make the average number of inhabitants to the square mile in the United States to be seven.
- PARACRUC.—The word "Punjab" is a compound Indian word, and signifies five waters, relating to the rivers Indus, Jhelum, Chenab, Ravi, and Satlej.
- QUASAR.—Nehruka covers 400,000 square miles.
- W. R.—It would not be a bad idea to furnish beds on the night trains over our railroads. This is done in France.
- C. M. V.—The population of the United States is doubtless thirty millions; that of Russia is sixty-three millions.
- F. R.—Postage stamps have been in use over thirty years. They were invented by a Swede, named Tranker, in 1823.
- A. C. T.—The Azores, or Western Isles, were settled by the Portuguese in 1448—Patal is named on account of its production of beech trees.
- HONORABLE.—Blackgum is the oldest game known to our times. It was common 1224 years B. C. in Greece.
- M. D. C.—There are eight hundred and sixty distinct languages spoken in the world, from which there are about five thousand branches or dialects derived. America has four hundred and twenty-three.
- W. H. S.—Bolling to death was a legal punishment in England. It was especially invented as the punishment for poisoners. In 1641 Margaret Davis, a young woman, suffered this death for poisoning.
- LYDIA D.—Bread can be and is made out of a great variety of compounds, besides grain. In Iceland, codfish beaten into powder is made into a bread. Potato bread is very common in Ireland.
- L. D. F.—North Carolina has more than double the number of inhabitants than New Hampshire numbers.

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR, AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCHINE.

This is the title of a highly dramatic and absorbing story, with which we shall commence the new year in BALLOU'S PICTORIAL. It is entirely different from any novelette we have ever published, and must prove vastly popular, from the wonderful intricacy of its plot, the vivid character of its tableaux, the startling spirit of the story, and altogether, the excellence and finish of its narration. An experienced critic, to whom we submitted its pages in manuscript, remarked:—"You have never printed so interesting a novelette as this in your paper—indeed, I have never read one more so."

BINDING AT THIS OFFICE.—Besides our own publications, we bind other magazines, pamphlets, old books, etc., in the very best manner, and at the lowest rates, with promptness. Those who have this class of work which they desire to see done, in a manner much better executed than usual, will please call, or send their orders to this office.

SPLINTERS.

- .... A Philadelphia writer complains of the extreme homage paid to ladies in this country—a bachelor, of course.
- .... It is estimated that there are more than 9,000,000 gallons of whiskey sold in Cincinnati, yearly.
- .... A man turned his son out of doors, lately, because he wouldn't pay his rent. What a pay-ment!
- .... The death of Elisha Smith, Jr., chief engineer of our Fire Department, was a severe loss to the public.
- .... Mr. Delane, of the London Times, says that "Boston is thoroughly and solidly English." It is rather so, we think.
- .... Young man in New York married rich man's daughter—received $5000 to release her, and kept the girl.
- .... Little Cordelia Howard, the child-actress, has gone to Europe to play, with P. T. Barnum as director.
- .... The Baltimoreans mean to keep their harbor open this winter by means of an ice-breaker and tow-boat.
- .... They had quite a smart specimen of earthquake in Memphis, Tennessee, lately—shook the folks up some.
- .... An advertiser in a provincial paper says he has a cottage to lot, containing eight rooms and an acre of land.
- .... They had a male race on Long Island, lately—four entered. Three wouldn't run—the fourth one took the purse.
- .... A Miss Mitchell, at Ossian, New York, was cruelly torn by a fierce dog while milking its master's cows.
- .... The new wife of Senator Douglas, Miss Ada Cutts that was, is described as a beautiful and accomplished lady.
- .... Apples this year are apples of gold. The few farmers that have any are coining money by them.
- .... A young lady attired in the breadth of the present fashion, is entirely isolated from society.
- .... A little girl in Woburn fell asleep in church, lately, and slept there all night into Monday morning.
- .... Carlyle says each man carries under his hat a "private theatre," where a great drama is acted.
- .... Solomon Juneau, the first white settler of Milwaukee, died, lately, at the Indian settlement, Shawano county.
- .... The Boston Theatre has done a great business, lately. The Ravel troupe was the last great card there.

AMERICAN SOCIETY.

There seems to be a prevalent notion that modern society in America has become so smoothed and levelled by the polishing process of civilization, that all its picturesque salient angles have been worn away, leaving no strong points for genius to grasp in making up pictures of the present time. The men and women of to-day, we are told, are all alike; there is no peculiarity, no originality about them; and this has been alleged as the reason why we have no American comedies, holding up the mirror to nature, and giving us the actual life of our countrymen and countrywomen. We have always disented from this view, and insisted that the world around us is full of materials—is, in fact, a perfect mine of wealth to the artist who has learned the first rudiments of all art—how to see and to observe.

We are not alone in this opinion. Our shrewd and lively contemporary, the French "Courrier," of New York, says:—"The hourly movement of Broadway brings before us one continual succession of striking characters, and the panorama of a world whose manners and whose morals give to its external appearance an idiosyncrasy as peculiar and prominent as ever individualized a race or a nation." "Hamilton," the piquant dramatic critic of the New York Albion, says:—"The types of American life are as sharply cut, as instantly cognizable, as eloquent of meaning, as the world ever saw. You look abroad in vain for their analogues, and you have to content yourself with saying that the Hollander and the Belgian, the Marcellian and the Parisian, the Scotchman and the Londoner, are not more sharply accentuated with impressive differences, than are the model Bostonian and the unimpeachable Philadelphia, the elaborately elegant Southerner and the dashingly courteous New Yorker."

In surveying the wide field of American society, we are startled at the richness of its characters and contrasts, at the manifold varieties of life and circumstance that it presents. We may boldly assert that the harvest has never been reaped. Now and then some adventurer has gone into it, and brought back a sheaf as a trophy, but thousands might fill their garner from the exhaustless stores. Look over a file of newspapers for a year, and reckon the strange social incidents, the singular vicissitudes of fortune, the marvellous impostures, the prodigious isms therein recorded, and you will acknowledge that a Dickens or a Scribe would find materials for volumes of novels and plays in a source which we almost utterly neglect.

That there is undeveloped talent enough among us to profit by this unmined wealth, it were both unpatriotic and irrational to deny. What we have done is ample assurance of what we can do. The mischief has been that hitherto novels and plays have not "paid," and the lively genius of America is so commercial that it will not exert itself for mere fame alone. But now that it has been demonstrated that the public are willing to regard literary men as something better than drones,—as real "laborers worthy of their hire," it is time to be up and doing. To naturalize our literature, to naturalize our drama—this is the mission of our writers. What we have done for our historic past, let us do for our social present. Let us not import characters three thousand miles, while living originals crowd about us waiting to have their portraits taken. As our scenery is matchless in grandeur and beauty and originality, so our people are sufficiently striking for all the purposes of art.

OUR NEXT NUMBER.

Next week we shall issue number one of the new volume, being the twelfth volume of "Ballou's Pictorial." It will be a superb number—new type, new head, but same style, fresh and bright in every line. This number will contain one of our elegant mammoth pictures—the finest and most effective we have yet published, covering two entire pages of the paper. Among many other illustrations, it will also contain a most unique and original allegorical design for the new year—a gem of a picture, curious and significant. The new novelette, which we also commence in number one of the forthcoming volume, is a little in advance of anything yet presented in these pages, as it regards vivid interest and intricacy of plot. Renew your subscriptions at once, in order to secure complete sets of the "Pictorial."

THE PRIZES.—Those persons engaged in getting up clubs for the prize offer, in another column of this paper, should lose no time in commencing to send in the names and money as fast as they obtain a dozen or more names. We are thus enabled to register their names, and credit them regularly with the number they send. Each addition to the clubs thus sent will be credited to the one sending in the subscribers. By sending as fast as the names are obtained, we are sure to print enough papers for all.

MODERN IMPROVEMENTS.—The New York Dutchman was right in calling this the age of science. The editor saw some burned peas put into the hopper of a mill, the other day, and in two minutes afterwards they were in a store window, labelled "Best Old Government Java."

HEART-CHANGES.—The heart of a man weighs about nine ounces; that of a woman, eight. As age creeps on, a man's heart grows heavier, and a woman's lighter, after thirty.

SIMILE.—Strong passions under a cold exterior are like the working of water under a crust of ice.

TO EVERYBODY.—Read our prize offer on another page of this paper, and act accordingly.

THE CLOSING YEAR.

1856 is on his last legs; his existence cannot possibly be prolonged much longer; the winds of December already wail his requiem, striking the bare branches of the trees, those harp-strings of the woodlands, as if he were already dead and buried. Poor old fellow! It is strange how fast these years run through their career. The child of an hour grows superannuated in a twelve-month. How they sweep along, these years, in wild and weird procession, driving past like the flying scud in the tempest, or falling leaves before the gale, or foam on the waters, or witches on their broomsticks careering through the midnight sky to meet their evil master. This apparent speed in the flight of time increases as we grow older. A year is a vast period to the child. Duration of time is measured by events, and in our tender age, the simplest incidents are events. Further on upon life's journey, only wonderful incidents make their record on memory's tablet, and there are so few that we seem to be hurried onward at a frantic pace. The bark of youth glides almost imperceptibly between flowery shores, lingering long at grassy points and by attractive curves, while the whole landscape is bathed in a golden fairy light. Aton, the current grows stronger and deeper—sterner scenes arise on either hand—the clouds mutter ominous thunder, and flashes illuminate the distant horizon. Sometimes, through the battle-storms of manhood, we emerge into a clearer atmosphere and more tranquil waters; but as the voyager grows gray, whether he ride upon turbulent waves, or is borne along by smoother waters, his course is swift as an arrow or a shooting star, to that great ocean from which no traveller returns. The pauses in the voyage in which we foot up our reckoning, are at the close of each year. They are the "waits" between the heats on the great race-track of existence; the "waits" between the acts in the great drama of life. The drop curtain of 1856 is nearly down—it will soon rise again on other scenes.

"Life's a brief candle—then play out the play!"

REMEMBER!

The present number completes Volume XI. of the PICTORIAL; and all whose subscriptions end at this time, will confer a particular favor upon us, by renewing at the earliest moment, in order that we may print an edition equal to the demand. We discontinue all subscriptions at the date to which payment has been made; therefore, to ensure an unbroken receipt of the paper, immediate renewal is necessary.

The forthcoming volume of our illustrated journal shall be the best that has ever yet appeared from this establishment. We have engaged some new and finished artists, who are added to our already large corps of designers, and several new and popular contributors to the literary department. Fresh spirit and new life will be imparted to our pages—"Ballou's Pictorial" and the "Flag of our Union," sent together to one address, for $4 per annum.

BINDING.

We are now prepared to bind up the past volume of "Ballou's Pictorial" in an elegant and uniform style of full gilt, adding an illuminated title-page and index, the whole at a charge of one dollar. The value of the work thus preserved will be very great as a book of reference in years to come. We can supply any lost or torn numbers from the commencement of the work. We have also complete sets of the bound volumes in uniform style. The ten volumes, containing a vast fund of delightful reading and valuable information, with nearly ten thousand illustrations, are sold for $20.

BALLOONING.—Where hasn't "Commanpaw"—Plooy Miles—been? He once wrote a note to the Boston Post in the car of a balloon, in which he ascended from Cheltenham, dated "Sky high—two miles up."

AGRICULTURE.—Mr. Angur, of Woodbridge, Ct., raised four bushels of California potatoes from a single tuber. He made 72 bills out of as many eyes. The yield augurs well for his plan.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. David E. Bently to Miss Alice Parker; by Rev. Mr. Skinner, Mr. Seth W. Lewis to Miss Pamela W. Cate; by Rev. Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Ingersoll Bowditch Radclott, of Salem, to Miss Ann Caroline Bennett; by Rev. Dr. Stow, Mr. John G. Spear to Miss Sarah F. Chase; by Rev. Dr. Cushman, Dr. Addison Davis, of Lynn, to Miss Emily L. Alden; by Rev. Mr. Bodley, Mr. Samuel R. Hodgkin to Miss Mary A. Haskell; by Rev. Mr. Sampson, Mr. Ephraim Randall to Miss Emily Fletcher, both of Charlestown.—At Cambridgeport, by Rev. Mr. Howe, Mr. Rufus S. Doane to Miss Abby S. Stevens.—At Melrose, by Rev. Mr. Sessions, Sewell F. Parcher, M. D., of East Boston, to Miss Mary E. Libby.—At Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Brooks, Mr. William E. Alley to Miss Lydia A. Henderson.—At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Briggs, Mr. Edward Felme to Miss M. Elizabeth Arrington.—At Danversport, by Rev. Mr. Chaffin, Mr. Charles McIntire to Miss Sarah E. Jacobs.—At Essex, by Rev. Mr. Prince, Mr. Eliza B. Annable to Miss Lironia H. Tiney.—At Gloucester, by Rev. Mr. Parmenter, Mr. Daniel L. Merrill to Miss Elizabeth L. Blatchford, of Rockport.—At Newburyport, by Rev. Dr. Dimmick, Mr. George Niles to Miss Lydia M. Pulsifer, both of Georgetown.—At Plymouth, by Rev. Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. George W. Kingman, of Boston, to Miss Lizette Bartlett.—At Groton, Conn., by Rev. Mr. Gilbert, Mr. Nelson O. Dibble to Miss Emily L. Wilcox.

DEATHS.

In this city, Miss Mary E. Hodges, 20; Widow Lucy Cole, formerly of Wintthrop, Me.; Mr. James Barry, 61; Mr. Robert A. Hayden, of Stoughton, 49; Lieut. James O. Edgerton, 40; Dr. J. W. Chapman, 53.—At Charlestown, Mrs. Jane B., wife of Dr. Daniel Jones, 49; Widow Ellen Fenerty.—At Dorchester, Mr. Joseph Foster, 84.—At Milton, Mrs. Sarah W., wife of Mr. Wm. Crehore, of Boston, 69.—At Newton, Mr. George Wiswell, 24.—At Salem, Mr. Daniel E. Abbott, 26.—At Beverly, Edith, wife of Mr. Joseph Woodbury.—At Hamilton, Mr. Isaac Francis Dodge, 22.—At Gloucester, Mr. James A. Bray, 54.—At Lowell, Mr. Samuel Allen, late of New York, 29.—At North Andover, Mrs. Rebecca, wife of Col. Moody Bridges.—At Truanton, Mrs. Charles H., wife of Hodges Reed, Esq., 68.—At Clinton, Miss Mary F. Eaton, 15; Mr. Jonas B. White, 62; Mr. James G. Rich, 24.—At North Fairhaven, Widow Elizabeth Wilcox, 50.—At Scituate, Mrs. Deborah C. Marsh, 43.—At Plymouth, Mr. Oliver Vaughn, 47.—At New Bedford, Mr. Joseph F. Hammond, of Mattapoisett, 35.—At West Townsend, Mr. Nathan Whitney, 62.—At Leominster, Mrs. Sally, widow of Col. Luke Joslin, 78.—At Great Barrington, John O'Brien, Esq., 72.—At Nantucket, Mr. Samuel Carey, 83.—At Vershire, Vt., Mr. Phoebe T. Fuller, formerly of Pepperell, Mass., 92.—At Castile, Me., Mrs. Dorothy P. Little, 77.—At Philadelphia, Mr. Charles H. Averill, formerly of Medford, Mass., 26.—At Chicago, Rev. G. W. Perkins, formerly of Meriden, Conn.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AUTUMN.

BY CLAUDE D'ARTOISE.

My soul is rife with poetry!
I cannot breathe it forth on this rude lyre,
Nor yet can I endure its scorching fire.
Earth seems so fair to me!
Autumn's elixir floating on the air
In thrilling effervescence, makes my wild!
O, when I gaze on scenes so bright and fair,
Methinks I am at heart again a child.
Yet would I fly the load—
Th' oppressive beauty that now bows me down.
Ye dazzling rays of Autumn's glittering crown,
Lift up my soul to God!
Autumn—grand Autumn! thrilling all my brain,
My heart, my whole existence—O remain!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ALMOST A MISTAKE.

BY WALTER DANFORTH.

"Well, young gentleman!" was the salutation which Harry Morley received, as he entered the drawing-room at Ridgewood, "pray what brings you here?"

Harry was struck dumb, and it was very natural he should be.

"I believe your father has died a beggar! Under such circumstances do you hope to wed my niece?"

If Morley had before respired with difficulty, his breath at this remark was utterly taken away.

"Young gentleman, I wish to be explicit with you; young women should mate with their equals; you are not equal for my niece; so a good morning to you!"

The straightforward churl after the last remark, walked out of the room, leaving the door open, that Morley might have sufficient room for egress.

Harry was a young man of spirit, and he kept up his heart, though his ship seemed all at once going down. The moment he recovered a little from his astonishment, he rang the bell.

"Tell your master I wish to see him in the parlor!" said he to the servant who answered it.

The man went up stairs and instantly returned.

"My master's orders are that you quit the house immediately, and he has given me instructions never to admit you again!"

Harry, as I before said, had a stout heart, but this was almost too much. It needed but the straw now to break the camel's back. He had known Rose Clavering from the time when she had to mount a chair to make her little face come opposite to his. When he was fourteen and she twelve he used to dandle her on his knee, call her his little wife, and exchange juvenile vows of unutterable affection and constancy. Whenever he returned from college at vacation, he always visited the Claverings before he thought of going to his own father's house, and Rose was always the first to welcome him, and offer the dimpled cheek for the inevitable salute.

Little Rose was proud of being called Harry's wife because everybody spoke in praise of him, and as the frankness of girlhood vanished, and the diffidence of young womanhood began its blushing reign, though less familiar and explicit in expressing her feelings, she still continued to be proud of him. Morley's addresses were sanctioned by the parents of Rose, and the wedding day had been fixed, when a blighting disease appeared in the town, and Miss Clavering was left an orphan at eighteen. Her uncle had been appointed guardian in her father's will, and in a week after her dreadful bereavement she had taken up her residence with him at Ridgewood.

Her sole consolation now was such as she received from the letters of Harry. But Harry soon needed consolation himself. His father was attacked by the same terrible fever that had taken off the Claverings; he died, leaving his estate in the most inextricable embarrassment, owing to imprudent acceptances made for the accommodation of speculating friends. This was a tremendous blow to Morley; but he was not fully aware of its weight until the moment at which we have placed him before the reader. It was his first visit to Ridgewood since his father's death, and his reception was such as would have borne down a haughtier spirit even than his.

"I must see Miss Clavering!" he replied to the brutal message borne by the servant.

"It is impossible, sir!" said the man respectfully; "for though there is not a servant in the house, Mr. Morley, but is sorry for you, and would do anything for you, my lady is locked up at present in her room. However you can send a message to her!" he added, in a whisper.

He did send a message, and in ten minutes was seated by her side in the summer-house in the garden, where long ago he had used to support on his knee his little wife of old. But how different did Rose appear from then. The summer of her eighteenth year now beheld her bursting into womanhood. Her expanding thoughts, from a bounding, fitful current, began to run a deep, broad and steady stream. A spirit of unutterable tenderness, as she reflected upon the welcome she well knew Harry had received, diffused itself through her heart, and she would willingly have submitted to any sacrifice to have restored his peace of mind.

"I am sure we shall disappoint this surly old gentleman!" she observed, confidently.

"Don't say disappoint, say thwart him!" said Harry, haughtily.

"Well, no matter about the expression, so long as we prevent him from causing our separation!"

"Rose, I shall not offer you a beggar's hand! I shall ask you to remain true to me for a year! Meanwhile I shall go to London. People have given me credit for some ability; there I shall avail myself of it!"

Harry had founded his hopes of fortune and fame in London upon the energies of his pen. His education was finished; and if his father had not left him a fortune, he had at least provided him with the means of making one for himself. So he meditated. At an early period he had discovered a talent for dramatic composition, and having devoted himself more sedulously to that branch of literature than to any other, he now resolved that one bold and strenuous effort should place him at once on the pinnacle of fame, or induce him to abandon this road to honor forever.

The play was written, accepted by the manager, cast as satisfactorily as Harry could have wished, and advertised. The momentous evening of its representation came, and Morley, seated in the pit by the side of a friend, with a throbbing heart saw the curtain rise. The first and second acts went off smoothly, without any marked demonstration favorable or otherwise. Two men with sagacious eyes, evidently of the corps critique, sat in front of Morley.

"What d'ye think?" asked one of the sagacious eyes.

"Rather slow!" replied sagacious number two.

"Will it do?"

"Doubtful!"

But it did do, though. The third act decided the fate of the play. The interest became intense; people in the second and third rows of boxes rose up and vied with each other in demonstrations of applause; "bravos" resounded from every part of the theatre; the curtain fell amid roars of approbation, though the author had not a dozen friends in the house, and the skepticism of sagacious eyes one and two very suddenly vanished.

Morley slept little that night, though contentment answered all the purpose of rest. The fiat of a London audience had dubbed him dramatist, the road to honor and wealth was clear, and Rose Clavering was to all intents and purposes his wife. After a night of reflections like these he rose in the morning, and seizing a paper, proposed to himself rather complacently to see what the critics said. Theatre Royal met his eyes; he thought what would be Rose's feelings when it met her eyes; and what indeed would have been her feelings, to have read Harry stamped as a plagiarist (though without a word of proof of it), and torn limb from limb, in an article three quarters of a column long; and all done in so general a way that it could only be answered by direct refutation, and not by convincing proof.

"A very singular criticism!" said Morley.

"Very!" rejoined a friend, dryly; "I thought you said the play was your own, Morley. I see here that there are half a dozen other plays and novels founded on the same story!"

"I never read a line upon the same subject. Why does he assert so broadly without a word of proof?"

"So as not to commit himself! He does not believe you are a plagiarist, more than I do!"

"Then he is certainly a liar!" said Harry, emphatically.

"Undoubtedly!"

"And I shall flatly contradict it to-morrow morning!"

"Certainly not!"

"Why?"

"Because the stamp of malignancy is so strong upon it that it is utterly harmless among those whom you would least desire to be affected by it. Have you an acquaintance among the press?"

"No."

"Then this contemptible tissue of falsification is complete proof that you have succeeded!"

Harry found solace for his lacerated feelings in looking over some of the rest of the morning papers. He was, however, in no danger of being spoiled by their praises. One paper was somewhat enthusiastic, two were very calm and respectable in their criticisms, and the remaining two were of the class which "damned with faint praise."

The play on the whole had a good run. It was not a brilliant success, but it was an unusual one. The audience continued to be respectable, but they did not increase. The management paid its expenses, with a creditable stipend to Morley—and that was all.

Harry had now been in London eight months. He had written a successful play and acquired many valuable acquaintances, but his purse was quite as light as when he first entered the great metropolis. He had bills, however, drawn on his manager to a considerable amount, which became payable in a day or two, when he proposed to run down to Ridgewood, and if possible, by the assistance of the servant who was in his confidence, have an interview with Miss Clavering. On the day when the bills matured, they were both returned to him dishonored. The manager had become bankrupt.

"Fortune is in her moods," said Harry, with considerable resignation. "Let her have her humor out."

He was engaged upon a melodrama, and notwithstanding this reverse, determined to pursue his original intention and ride down to Ridgewood, to obtain the encouragement of a smile from Rose, in the prosecution of his dramatic efforts. The first paragraph that met his eyes as he took up the paper to ascertain the hour for the coach, was, Splendid Fite at Ridgewood—the country seat of Sir Thomas Atherton. The account stated how the young lord of the manor opened the ball with the lovely and accomplished Miss Rose Clavering—that the fite had been given by Sir Thomas to commemorate the birthday of his fair niece, and the editor took occasion to observe that a pair so eminently adapted by nature for each other as Miss Clavering and the young lord, would unquestionably join in a longer and more momentous dance, eventually.

All this to young Harry was very much like gall and wormwood. For a half hour he saw nothing but ball rooms, and glittering lights, and young lords of manors leading lovely and accomplished Roses down contra dances. Then, when the set was over, he saw them promenading in the garden, arm-in-arm, and at supper he saw them seated side by side. His fancy then changed the scene to the country church. Rose was standing at the altar with the delighted young lord of the manor at her side. The questions and responses rang upon his excited tympanum, and he was on the point of forbidding the banns in a loud tone, when a servant brought him a letter. It was from Rose. A thousand times before he opened it he blamed his stupidity in doubting her for a moment, and then broke the seal and read:

"HARRY,—I am too well informed of the futility of your efforts to carve out your fortune by the end of the year, during which I consented to reserve my hand. Why should I continue to keep it for you? You will interpret what I must utter briefly. To you I look as the guardian of my happiness. Friday, with your consent, shall be my wedding-day. Rose."

Harry in his answer did not condescend to complain, nor elucitate, nor expostulate. He simply wrote:

"Rose,—You are free!"

H. M."

When he had done so he folded and sealed the laconic missive, and, under the impression that he added it to a pile of letters which he had prepared for the post, threw it under a heap of manuscript, and resumed the pleasant reflections which the arrival of Miss Clavering's letter had disturbed.

His feelings on the second day after the receipt of the letter were insupportable. He was here, there, everywhere. No spot furnished him rest. Finally he determined to sail for America. In a day he had made every preparation. The packet sailed on Friday, the day of Rose's wedding. Meanwhile he continued to experience the dreadful restlessness of the mind upon the first shock of thwarted affection. He turned every way for the solace which he felt he could no more meet with, except in the entire extinction of consciousness. Nothing gave his soul the least consolation but the thought that he might once more look upon Rose. At last he resolved to do so.

"It can but drive me mad, or break my heart," was his consolatory reflection.

He sprang into the coach, and in a few hours was at Ridgewood. It was Friday morning. He approached the house of Sir Thomas. He wore a gala appearance, as if arrayed for some festivity. His resolution faltered as he approached the door, and he turned into the garden. By a natural impulse he entered the summer-house, where he had last parted with his betrothed. There sat Rose in the very spot where he had last seen her. The moment she recognized him, with a slight scream she threw herself into his arms.

"Why did you wait so long, Harry? At least, why did you not write? I have been so miserable!"

"Why did I come at all?" inquired Morley.

"Did I not write that we were to be married to-day?"

"No; you wrote that you were to be married to-day."

"And whom should I marry but you?"

"I interpreted your letter as a request for a release from any obligations I might hold of you."

"Harry!" said Rose, with such a look of affectionate reproach, that he was compelled to pacify her—in what manner, the reader will conceive.

"I was intending to sail for America, to-day," said Harry. "I surely mistook the import of your letter; it nearly drove me mad!"

"A week ago I discovered a codicil to my father's will—which my uncle had suppressed—in which he sanctions my marriage with you in explicit and undeniable terms. As soon as I had made the discovery, I despatched a letter to you, in which I declined postponing my happiness any longer, merely to allow you the opportunity of gratifying your penchant for pantomimes. Since then, I have neither heard from nor seen you, and my wretchedness has been complete."

"I entirely misinterpreted your letter, my dear Rose, and in a paroxysm of misery, I determined to sail for America. I could not leave the country without first seeing you again, however. With that object I came down here this morning."

"You came very near making a sad mistake," said Rose, naively. "How we should look—one in America and the other in England!"

It is needless to assure the reader that the projected pilgrimage was abandoned. They were married on that day, as Miss Clavering had arranged; and it was Rose's invariable caution in future to all marriageable young ladies, to be explicit in their communications, to avoid mistakes.

ONE DOLLAR! WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR
BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over one hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us right subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

In Bangor, the other day, an intensified broker offered to accommodate a friend with $100 for fifteen minutes for $12. — At Paris, lately, the Comtesse Charles Fitz James, in passing through a room when in full dress, stepped upon a heater match lying upon the floor, by which her clothes were set on fire. She was so badly burned, that after several weeks of sickness she died. — A most remarkable case has just been brought before the courts of New York, in which an individual charges that his brother endeavored to induce him to commit murder. — Col. R. L. Baker, a gentleman of great experience in the manufacture of arms of all descriptions, having had the superintendence of government arsenals for nearly forty years, and until recently been president of the Ordnance Bureau, at Washington, has been elected president of the Sharps's Rifle Company, Hartford. — Cato, the elder, was wont to say that the Romans were like sheep—a man were better to drive a flock of them than one of them. — Gerald Massey, the peasant poet of England, has lately published a second volume of poems. They are much less revolutionary and radical than their predecessors, a change which is ascribed by the critics to his recent aristocratic intimacies. — A vein of coal, six feet in thickness, has been discovered at Edwardsville, Madison county, Illinois, at a depth of thirty feet from the surface. — J. Payne Collier, the Shakespearean commentator, has written a volume purporting to give seven lectures on Shakespeare and Milton, delivered by Coleridge, in 1812, and of which Mr. Collier took short-hand notes that were misplaced and not discovered until 1854. — The senior editor of the Pittsburg Dispatch lost his beard, a crop of five years' growth, on the recent election! — Thomas Ellwood, an intelligent and learned Quaker, who was honored by the intimate friendship of Milton, used to read to him various authors in the learned languages, and thus contributed as well to his own improvement as to solve the dark hours of the poet when he had lost his sight. — A few years ago, old flour barrels could be purchased from 12 1-2 to 25 cents; now, rough old barrels readily bring 48 cents, and dressed, 64 cents. — De Quincy says "If once a man indulges himself in murder, very soon he comes to think little of robbing; and from robbing he comes next to drinking, and from that to incivility and prostration." — The British whale fishery has been unusually profitable this year—so much so, that in Dundee dividends of £100 per share are to be paid by the Union Company on shares which might have been bought lately under £40. This success has led to the proposal that steam power should be employed as a means of giving Arctic fishermen increased command over the fishing ground. — There is little doubt that William A. White, formerly of Watertown, Mass., who disappeared mysteriously, in Milwaukee, has been murdered for his money. — Prince Albert, they say, is getting unpopular. On several public occasions lately, he has been received with marked coldness, almost amounting to disrespect. The queen has by degrees become a mere cipher, and relies, it is said, implicitly upon her husband. The consequence is, that a complaint is raised about his royal highness' interference. — Le Miroir Face et Nuque is a new patent toilet glass, which reflects the back of the head, enabling a lady to arrange her back hair with the greatest ease and precision.

GAS STOVES.—The gas stoves invented, patented and sold by Wm. F. Shaw, No. 174 Washington Street, are truly admirable contrivances. They are of various patterns, adapted either for simply warming rooms, or for cooking purposes. The economy of gas for fuel, by means of this invention, has been satisfactorily demonstrated; but the convenience, cleanliness and neatness of these stoves can hardly be too highly commended. We are using one of Mr. Shaw's "Library Stoves" in our editorial office, and are delighted with its performance. The temperature of the room can be raised to any desirable degree almost instantaneously, and there is no deleterious gas, or even unpleasant odor, arising from it. It is certainly one of the most ingenious inventions of the day.

THE IRISH LANGUAGE.—The Irish language is expressive and beautiful. Every word accurately describes the thing signified, as in the English words, buzz of bees; crash of falling timbers, etc. It is highly poetical. The Irish scholar translates "serpent"—the "father of poisons;" and "reconciliation" by "second friendship."

ZOOLOGICAL.—A panther escaped from the cars on the Stonington Railroad, three years since, and was lately "dropped" by a rifle shot in West Greenwich, R. I. He measured 7 feet from his nose to his tail, and 7 feet from his tail to nose—making fourteen in all; as the showman says.

VANDALISM.—Some miscreant lately stole six valuable landscapes by old masters from the Earl of Suffolk's gallery, in London. We hope they were not such valuable "old masters" as we see in our auction rooms.

THE CLOCK BUSINESS.—Only 140,000 clocks will be made in Connecticut this year. As time is money, we suppose the clock-makers do a fine business. It is one that goes on tick, however.

TRAGICAL.—The favorite sultana of Abdul Medjid lately fell in love with a young Armenian, was detected, bowstrung, put in a sack and thrown to the fishes in the Bosphorus.

MADAME AUGUSTA.—This splendid dancer is teaching her art in New York, where, some twenty years ago, she made such a sensation in the Bayadere.

THE ADRIATIC.—We regret this steamer did not visit us before sailing for Europe; she will have the gloss off when she gets back.

Wayside Gatherings.

Sugar cane has been successfully raised in Minnesota. Valuable coal mines have been discovered on the Pacific coast. A large business is being done in Sacramento, Cal., in the curing and smoking of salmon. Quite a number of deer have recently been killed in the lower counties of West Jersey. During the past year, the precious metal coined at the eight mints of Mexico, amounted to $16,337,255 in silver, and $256,222 in gold. The City Bank of Quebec, was robbed lately, but fortunately, it contained but $1000. The entrance was effected by undermining the vault. At Middlebury, Vt., a man by the name of Arnold was killed by a large vat which he had been building, being seized by the wind and thrown upon him. Hon. William Sturgis has presented to the Mercantile Library Association of Boston, a copy of "Audubon's Birds of America" in five volumes, four volumes plates, folio edition. A gentleman in the American Agriculturist states that he thoroughly cured a fine young mare afflicted with the heaves, by feeding her on cornstalks, and that the disease never returned. A lad about thirteen years of age, son of Benjamin M. Stanley, was accidentally shot in Troy, N. H., by a younger lad, who was playing with a loaded gun. The contents passed directly through his brain. John Kelley of Shelburne, N. Y., killed his brother with an axe, in a dispute between the deceased and the prisoner's wife. On entering the jail, Kelley found one of his sons, twelve years of age, confined there on a charge of burglary and theft.

Two curious cases of intermarriage have occurred in Newton county, in Va. Mr. Stephen Daniel, aged 56, married a daughter of N. Rogers, who was 15, and N. Rogers, aged 62, married a daughter of Stephen Daniel, who was 14 years of age.

Jay Bassett of New Haven, caught two eels a few days since, one of which was nearly four feet long, and measured eleven inches round the middle; the other was three feet three inches, and measured nine inches, and the two weighed thirteen pounds.

The town of Mupimi, Durango, Mexico, has lately been the theatre of a dreadful scene. About one hundred and fifty savages attacked the place, killed ten men, and carried away five children and two women as prisoners, besides a quantity of mules and four horses.

A plan is on foot to purchase the entire salt property in the Kanawha, Virginia, Salines, and to place all the furnaces under the management of one company. They yield three hundred thousand bushels of salt per annum. The purchasers are Eastern Virginians, and will raise one million of dollars.

Madame Ida Pfeiffer, the celebrated Prussian traveller, who visited Boston in 1855, is about visiting Madagascar. A committee of the British Association made her a grant of twenty pounds to assist in making researches in the natural history of the island, and Prince Albert sent her ten more.

A singular and fatal accident happened in Wells Street, Hartford, a few days since. A boy fifteen years old, son of Mr. Rowell, was starting for school, and stopped a minute in the doorway, to play with his sister, when he tripped, as is thought, and fell down the steps, breaking his neck.

They do not trifle with defamers in England. Robson, the secretary of the Crystal Palace Company, has been tried, found guilty, and sentenced to twenty years imprisonment. Within half an hour of sentence having been pronounced, he was stripped of his ordinary habiliments, and clothed in a convict's dress, and became the associate of half a dozen other transports.

A party of four Americans, consisting of David Nichols, Dr. P. B. Cabell and Messrs. Collier and Kennedy, were recently surrounded and attacked by a party of sixteen Comanche Indians, about one hundred and fifty miles north of Zacatecas, Mexico. Dr. Cabell was killed. The remainder of the party escaped without injury.

Mr. S. N. Botsford of Whitesville, has laid all the little boys in Christendom under lasting obligations, by his invention of a toy locomotive, which winds up like a clock, and will run across a room, or perform sundry circuits around the carpet, with great speed, to the everlasting delight of "Little Breeches," who is conductor, fireman and engineer.

The Stanton (Virginia) Spectator, says that a man named Church, aged eighty-two years, arrived in Augusta county a few days ago, from Pendleton, with a team for a load of corn, and stated that his father and mother were both living—the one being one hundred and twelve and the other one hundred and seven years of age.

As a general rule, short pieces are liked best. A gentleman in a bank once said, when asked to subscribe for a certain Quarterly Review:—"Read a review! why, I never read anything longer than a telegraph dispatch! But I will take it and send it to my brother, who is a minister in the country." The public like a short article, when it is a condensation.

It is generally admitted that coal is the product of a buried vegetation—mostly trees. How thick they must have grown in the coal period! It is calculated that an acre of coal three feet thick is equal to the produce of 1940 acres of forest. There is now raised five times as much coal in Great Britain as in any other country; and it is estimated that there is in these isles more than 4000 square miles of coal fields yet to be cut out.

An improvement has been made in propelling boats, consisting in an arrangement and combination of the ordinary endless chain horse power, with paddle wheels, whereby the raising and lowering of the paddle wheels to suit the various depths at which the boat sinks in the water, also produce a variable inclination of the endless chain horse power, so as to enable the horse to exert a power in proportion to the weight of the load.

The condensers of the ship Adriatic, invented by Mr. Allen of the Novelty Works, New York, cool the steam by means of twenty-one miles of brass tubing, through which cold sea water is made to pass constantly by two pumps. The condensed steam is thus fed back into the boiler fresh. The brass tubing is cut up into sections twelve feet long, so that the cooling power of the water passed through them must be nearly the same as if it were mixed with steam jets.

A letter from Constantinople says: "The European taste for music has of late made immense progress here. The sultan has at present, for his harem, an excellent orchestra, composed of women alone. One, in particular, is remarkable for her performance on the violin, her style of execution resembling that of Theresa Milanolo. Very few harems are now without a piano forte, and many of the Turkish ladies are excellent performers. The sultan has signified his intention of building a theatre."

Foreign Items.

In London, one thousand per week is the average number of deaths.

The whole literary production of Russia, in 1855, consisted twelve hundred works.

A large number of iron paddle-wheel steamers are now building at Walker-on-the-Tyne, England, to run on the River Nile in Egypt.

More than one hundred public fairs are held annually in different sections of Russia, at each of which, business to the amount of $40,000 is transacted.

Lieutenant Saunders, an English officer of one of the cavalry regiments of the German Legion, was lately publicly dismissed from the service at Colchester, England.

It appears from the marshal's report that, during the Crimean war, 309,260 men were sent to the East from France. The losses by casualties in battle and sickness amounted to 69,229.

The stocks were lately put in requisition at Bromsgrove, Worcestershire. A man named Stanton was placed in them for six hours, for refusing to pay a fine in a case of assault.

The journals of Lombardy, conducted under Austrian inspiration, show themselves increasingly hostile to England. The Bilancia, of Milan, every day attacks Lord Palmerston as "the firebrand of Italy."

The Queen of Spain lately gave a grand ball on the occasion of her birthday, at which all the distinguished personages at Madrid were present. She was particularly gracious to Marshal O'Donnell, with whom she opened the ball.

The supply of fish has doubled in Paris since 1817, but it is not equal to the demand; and the price, except of very inferior kinds of fish, is enormous. Fish in that capital, and indeed throughout almost all France, is still a luxury.

Italy has just lost two enlightened men. Dr. Uraon, secretary of the Archaeological Society, founded by the king of Prussia at Rome, died in that city, recently. The death of Luigi Canna, president of the Museum and Gallery of the Capitol, is also announced.

Sands of Gold.

.... There is no virtue like necessity.—Shakespeare.

.... He who makes religion his first object, makes it his whole object.—Ruskin.

.... The best poets are the most impressive, because their steps are regular; for without regularity, there is neither strength nor state.—Landon.

.... To contradict and argue with a total stranger, is like knocking at a gate to ascertain if there is any one within.—Talleyrand.

.... Those who have finished by making all others think with them, have usually been those who began by daring to think with themselves.—Colton.

.... The beloved of the Almighty are the rich who have the humility of the poor, and the poor who have the magnanimity of the rich.—Saadi.

.... Music is the only sensual gratification which mankind may indulge in without injury to their moral or religious feelings.—Addison.

.... The stream of vice will flow as naturally into palaces, as the common sewer flows into the river, and the river flows onward to the sea.—Talleyrand.

.... Give me the poetical heart, the mind poetical in all things; give me the poetical heart, the heart of hope and confidence, that beats the more strongly and resolutely under the good thrown down, and raises up fabric after fabric on the same foundation.—Landon.

.... The ancients pretended that nations were civilized by music, and this allegory has a deep meaning; for we must always suppose that the bond of society was formed either by sympathy or interest, and certainly the first origin is more noble than the second.—Madame de Staël.

.... He that has energy enough in his constitution to root out a vice, should go a little further, and try to plant in a virtue in its place, otherwise he will have his labor to renew; a strong soil that has produced weeds, may be made to produce wheat, with far less difficulty than it would cost to produce nothing.—Colton.

Joker's Budget.

Why are violinists twice as prudent as any other men? Because they have four strings to their bow.—Pasquin.

"What time is it, Tom?" "Just time to pay that little account you owe me." "O, indeed! Well, I didn't think it was half so late."

A lady in Calcutta asked a colonel for a mango; as he rolled it along, it fell into a plate of kiss-mists—a species of grape. "How naturally," exclaimed the colonel, "man-joes to kiss naise!"

A singer in the opera chorus, who formerly had a very good chest voice, sings now altogether in falsetto. He ascribes it entirely to the dentist, who, he says, gave him false set o' teeth.

The Tribune, speaking of the custom prevalent among the German fishermen, who attach small bells to their shad-fishing nets, says, that our own fishermen, in the spring, will try the cast-and-net system, as the one most likely to be successful.

Dr. Johnson, being once in company with some scandal mongers, one of them having accused an absent friend of resorting to rouge, he observed:—"It is, perhaps, after all, much better for a lady to reddish her own cheeks, than to blacken other people's characters."

An elderly Portuguese lady, having pledged herself to make a pilgrimage to a distant shrine barefoot, her friends persuaded her that the fatigue would prove fatal. She persisted, however, in going to the shrine, and in going barefoot—but she went in a sedan-chair.

"Pat, you have dated your letter a week ahead; it is not so late in the month by one week, you spalpeen!" "Troth, boy, indade an' it's jist miself what is wanting swate Kathleen to get it in advance of the mail. Sure I'll not cure if she gets it three days afore it is written, me darlint."

A shoemaker received a note from a lady to whom he was particularly attached, requesting him to make her a pair of shoes; and not knowing exactly the style she required, he despatched a written missive to her, asking her whether she would like them "Wronn'd or Esq. Yoad." The fair one, indignant at this rich specimen of orthography, replied, "Kueether."

THE EX-QUEEN OF OUDE.

The gorgeously got up lady on this page is the mother of the ex-king of Oude, a lady who recently undertook a Quixotic expedition to England to ask a restitution of her son's kingdom, which Great Britain has recently absorbed—we were about to say annexed, but we remembered in time that the British are opposed to annexation as a species of spoliation, while they regard absorption as a legitimate mode of appropriation. This lady, the ex-queen, is quite good-looking, and her splendid gold and pearl ornaments and rich dagger give her, in an engraving, quite a theatrical air. She looks like the queen of a stage ballet. When, in former days, the dynasty of the six Tartar Moguls was supreme in India, Oude formed only a province of their far-extending empire, and was governed by a viceroy. Gradually, the Mogul dominion, shattered by contact with the English arms, and enfeebled by vice and luxury, dissolved, and was split up into a crowd of inferior states. The Viceroy of Oude took advantage of the general confusion to constitute himself a king; but so early as the reign of his son, in the middle of the eighteenth century, the kingdom was powerless, and began to lapse under the political influence of England. But the sort of protection thus afforded was of a very equivocal character. The prince was protected against the people, but not the people against the prince. Accordingly, an odious tyranny was established, under the sanction of the East India Company. Villages were burned, to punish the inhabitants for delays in the payment of taxes; bands of riotous soldiers swarmed in the towns and robbed the bazaars; men were flayed alive for attempting to escape plunder by concealing their possessions; the country was desolated by the avarice of the king, and the villany of his agents; and Lucknow the capital, became a centre of dissipation and luxury. This beautiful city, the residence of the queen who has visited England, contains many noble buildings, and is situated on an imposing elevation overlooking the Goomty River, which pours into the mighty Ganges. Notwithstanding, Oude has gradually declined in importance. Though situated in the healthy north of India, with an uniformly level surface, a rich soil, and an area of more than twenty-four thousand miles, or nearly half the area of England, its population is considerably less than three millions. The climate is generally healthy, though hot and dry. The soil produces rice and other cereals, cotton, hemp, tobacco, opium, an abundance of luscious fruits, and many of the rarest products of the East. In former days there were large manufactures of cotton, gunpowder, soda, saltpetre, salt, glass and fire-arms; but an army of fifty thousand men robbing the people instead of protecting them, brought to their lowest ebb all these sources of national prosperity. Though five noble rivers, including the Ganges, flow through Oude, destined by nature to be a garden of fertility—though, throughout its length of 270 miles, and its width of 160, scarcely a barren tract is to be found—it exhibits a deplorable contrast with some British provinces not possessed of half so many natural advantages. At one period it is known to have been renowned for riches. Its former capital, Oude—the oldest city in Hindostan—which gives the kingdom a name, is said to have been founded two thousand three hundred years ago, and to have had a population of one hundred thousand, is reduced at present to less than a tenth of that number. Finally the East India Company is at present located in Brunswick House, New Road, London. The men are frequently seen abroad in the neighborhood; the women rarely venture out. It is not known how long they may continue their stay. In addition to a box of jewelry, worth £10,000, which was lost during the voyage, the expenses of this royal visit to England will, no doubt, amount to an enormous sum, while the ex-queen has no chance of fulfilling her son's desires. The lion never lets go his prey.

THE EX-QUEEN OF OUDE.

INDEX TO MISCELLANY.

| Page.                                                                                                                                           | Page.                                                      | Page.                                      | Page.                                                                              |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Autumn Rhyme..... 10                                                                                                                            | Friendship..... 30                                         | Lines..... 294                             | Scottish Tale of the Border..... 219                                               |
| A Leaf from Capt. Bobstay's Log. 27                                                                                                             | Forgive Her, now she's Dead..... 38                        | Love as a Physician..... 346               | Storm Spirit..... 235                                                              |
| A Delicate Financial Operation... 59                                                                                                            | Frost Painting..... 155                                    |                                            | Shadows o'er me Roll..... 250                                                      |
| Aunt Alice's First Offer..... 70                                                                                                                | Floating Away..... 171                                     |                                            | Silent City..... 263                                                               |
| A Thread of Queen City Life..... 87                                                                                                             | Found at Last..... 203                                     | My Friend's Valet..... 6                   | Scar on the Forehead..... 299                                                      |
| Ambition and Pleasure..... 90                                                                                                                   | Frontier Reminiscence..... 215                             | My Patient..... 74                         | Snowed up in the Cars..... 326                                                     |
| Avulanche..... 186                                                                                                                              |                                                            | Mr. Jones..... 90                          | Spring..... 358                                                                    |
| Alone..... 214                                                                                                                                  | Garrison Adventure..... 267                                | Mrs. Watts's Dream..... 202                | Sophie's Confession..... 394                                                       |
| Autobiography of a Lawyer..... 214                                                                                                              | Grave of Fernando de Soto..... 314                         | Mabel Vernon..... 262                      |                                                                                    |
| Artist's Prize..... 246                                                                                                                         | Grecian Bride..... 315                                     | Murmur of the Sea..... 251                 | The Spanish Moor..... 2, 18, 34, 50, 66, 82, 98, 114, 130, 146, 162, 178, 194, 210 |
| Apostrophe to the Subterranean River..... 331                                                                                                   | Guillotine in France..... 330                              | Marion's Appeal to his Countrymen..... 326 | Thy Will be Done..... 10                                                           |
| A Glance at the Ruins of Paestum..... 359                                                                                                       | Glen Aubra..... 343                                        | Mendicant Child..... 342                   | The Blind Girl..... 11                                                             |
| An Answer..... 378                                                                                                                              |                                                            | Madame de Solange..... 386, 406            | Twilight..... 14                                                                   |
| A Thought..... 382                                                                                                                              | Happiness..... 30                                          | Mary's Dream..... 402                      | The Shadow on the Pillow..... 22                                                   |
| Autumn Musings..... 395                                                                                                                         | Holiday of Poverty..... 187                                | Mrs. Bird's Baby..... 497                  | The Human Heart..... 30                                                            |
| A Year Ago..... 398                                                                                                                             | Heir's Tragedy..... 230                                    |                                            | The Moon..... 30                                                                   |
| A Requiem..... 410                                                                                                                              | Henry the First..... 234                                   | No more among the Woodlands... 22          | The Fourth Point..... 38                                                           |
| A Trick of the Trade..... 411                                                                                                                   | Holbeck's Daughter..... 250                                | Nay, proffer not thy Hand to me.. 155      | To the Unknown..... 42                                                             |
|                                                                                                                                                 | Hopeful Bradshaw : or, Writing a Story for Ballou..... 378 |                                            | The Bathelot of Gottingen..... 42                                                  |
| Ballou's Publishing House... 263                                                                                                                |                                                            | Orange and Green..... 26                   | The Pastor's Crime..... 54                                                         |
| Battle of Oriskany..... 282                                                                                                                     | Improve Life's Hours..... 54                               | O, I will hide the Tear Drop..... 107      | The Nameless Grave..... 58                                                         |
| Battle of King's Mountain..... 283                                                                                                              | I am Lonely..... 74                                        |                                            | The Price of Life..... 58                                                          |
| Burns and his Highland Mary... 299                                                                                                              | Impromptu..... 234                                         | Poet's Corner..... 46, 62, 78, 94          | The Wounded Dove..... 59                                                           |
|                                                                                                                                                 | Impromptu..... 295                                         | 110, 126, 142, 158, 174, 190, 206, 222     | The Lake..... 70                                                                   |
| Childish Fancies..... 182                                                                                                                       | I might have been..... 331                                 | 238, 254, 270, 286, 302, 318, 334, 350     | The Animated Pictures..... 75                                                      |
| Clant of Worship..... 183                                                                                                                       | I Sigh for the Absent..... 346                             | Poets' Dreams..... 186                     | The Pawnbroker's Christmas... 102                                                  |
| Cousin Sara's First Ball..... 183                                                                                                               | I'll think of thee..... 402                                | Prophecy and its Fulfilment..... 295       | The Election Race..... 107                                                         |
| Carrier's Serenade..... 262                                                                                                                     |                                                            |                                            | The Poet's Grave..... 122                                                          |
| Consolation..... 278                                                                                                                            | Joy hath its Burdens..... 218                              | Rosa Mystica..... 102                      | The Fortunes of the Great..... 122                                                 |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            | Rival of the Empress..... 278              | The Painter's Apprentice..... 123                                                  |
| Departed Years..... 6                                                                                                                           | Kaled, the Page..... 14                                    | Rembrandt Van Ryn..... 298                 | The young Carpenter's first Crime 134                                              |
| Dark Hours..... 118                                                                                                                             | Kate Thornton..... 118                                     | Running down a Man of War..... 210         | The Spectre..... 238                                                               |
| Daughter of the House of Sussex. 151                                                                                                            | Keep the Heart young..... 134                              | Radlimar, the Priest of Moscow... 347      | The Pickpocket..... 154                                                            |
| Death..... 187                                                                                                                                  | Kitty and L..... 406                                       | Romance in Low Life..... 363               | To C. G..... 166                                                                   |
| Demon of the Steeple..... 218                                                                                                                   |                                                            | Remembered Melodies..... 366               | The Gold Locket..... 167                                                           |
|                                                                                                                                                 | Last Days of Haydn..... 171                                |                                            | To my Husband..... 170                                                             |
| Editor's Easy Chair..... 30, 46, 62, 78, 94, 110, 126, 142, 158, 174, 190, 206, 222, 238, 254, 270, 286, 302, 318, 334, 350, 366, 382, 398, 414 | Lotos Land..... 198                                        | Sonnet..... 26                             | The Trapper's Daughter..... 198                                                    |
| Emperor's Dream..... 235                                                                                                                        | Legends of the Lone Tree..... 241                          | Song..... 86                               | To G. M. Bunn..... 203                                                             |
|                                                                                                                                                 | Lines for an Album..... 257                                | Snow Wreaths..... 138                      | The Jewelled Talisman..... 226, 242, 258, 276, 290, 306, 322, 338, 354, 370        |
|                                                                                                                                                 | Lewie..... 267                                             | Sonnet..... 202                            | Thy Portrait..... 246                                                              |
|                                                                                                                                                 | Lu..... 268                                                | Sailor Boy's Home..... 215                 | The Foundling..... 266                                                             |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | To Thee..... 299                                                                   |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The World in which we live..... 310                                                |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Bridal..... 311                                                                |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Future..... 315                                                                |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Eve before the Bridal..... 362                                                 |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The First and Last Quarrel; or, The Flitch of Dunmow..... 362                      |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Summer Stream..... 374                                                         |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Suspicious Character; or, The Affray at the Inn..... 374                       |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Old Clock in the Corner..... 379                                               |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Two Captains; or, The Sailors' Protege..... 390                                |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Alligator and the Tiger..... 395                                               |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Strawberries..... 410                                                          |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Deserted Mansion..... 411                                                      |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | The Weary Spell..... 414                                                           |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Unrest..... 363                                                                    |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Verses suggested by a Likeness... 342                                              |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | We meet no more..... 11                                                            |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Why I am an old Maid..... 43                                                       |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | William The Red..... 86                                                            |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | War..... 91                                                                        |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Wenona..... 123                                                                    |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | What is it..... 139                                                                |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | William The Conqueror..... 170                                                     |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Widow's Light..... 230                                                             |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | What's in a Name..... 330                                                          |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Weematao, the Indian Princess. A Tale of Mt. Wachusett..... 358                    |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Wherefore..... 390                                                                 |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | With thee..... 394                                                                 |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Yes or No..... 91                                                                  |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Young Nora..... 106                                                                |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Youth..... 150                                                                     |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Yankee Cruiser..... 295                                                            |
|                                                                                                                                                 |                                                            |                                            | Zilara..... 182                                                                    |

INDEX TO ILLUSTRATIONS.

2
4 9

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1857.

$2.00 PER ANNUM 6 CENTS SINGLE } VOL. XII., No. I.—WHOLE No. 287.

THE INCOMING OF THE NEW YEAR.

The original and spirited allegorical picture below is from the pencil of Champney, and executed expressly for the Pictorial as the initial engraving of the year 1857. The New Year is represented under the figure of a charming young equestrian, who, as she bounds from the back of her flying charger through the balloon which represents a dial plate, lifts the wrinkled mask of 1856, and displays the figures of the New Year. Old Father Time is clown to the ring, and wears the "motley" as if he were used to it. By his side hangs the hour-glass. The ring-master is an airy young sprite, with a star on his forehead, and may be looked upon as Hope. Around the principal design are other emblematic sketches—a sexton ringing out the old year and ringing in the new, a joyous procession welcoming the infant year, a spectral row of figures illustrating the departed years, etc. This joyous picture typifies the gladness with which we enter on a new twelvemonth. We part from our old friend with scarcely a regret, or, if the tribute of a tear to his memory is shed, it is soon chased by a smile. So when a military comrade is carried to his grave, a few beats of the muffled drum, a few footfalls to melancholy dirge music, a rattling volley—and then off with the crape, and hey for the lively quick-step of the returning escort! We do not mourn for the individual years as they pass away; it is only when we glance backward at the congregated graves of many years that sadness and remorse steal over us. The death of the old year and the birth of the new coming on us simultaneously, we have no time for sorrow. It is with us as with the courtiers of a European monarchy, of which the theory is that the king never dies—that the throne is never vacant. "The king is dead—long live the king!" is the accustomed formula of acclamation. As the courtiers rush with indecent haste from the bedside of the dying monarch to the chamber of his successor, so do we turn from the expiring year to greet the new-born heir. Toll, toll mournfully, solemn bell, for the departed! Ring out cheerily, festal bell, for the new born! The sands of time for once shall be golden as those of Pactolus, and shall glimmer in the festival lamps we kindle on the hospitable board. In all the bravery of our holiday attire, we will fancy that we are embarked in a gay gondola, floating along the tranquil canals of a fairy city, with gallant cavaliers and dames flaunting beside us, with mask and merriment, while the air reels with the melodious thunder of the lofty campanile. For we are children of the age of steam—not given to looking backward, but onward, and, we trust, upward. In the season for joy, we can be as glad as any; and in the spirit of true joyousness, we wish our readers, one and all, a happy New Year!

THE INCOMING OF THE NEW YEAR.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—ON—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCHIE.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROCLAMATION.

It was the market day in Pampeluna; the crowd, which was rushing towards the grand square, stopped before a placard affixed to the gate of the Gefatura, the residence of the lord mayor. The peasants, removing the baskets of vegetables and fruits, or the barrels of oil and butter which they carried upon their shoulders, contemplated the bill with deep attention. The number of people became so great that they spread across the square to the very door of a shop belonging to Gongarello the barber, and pressing against his very window, so darkened his room that he was obliged to desist from shaving his customers till the crowd should move.

Aben-Abou, known in that quarter under the name of Gongarello, was a small, dark man, of a joyous and bantering disposition, like nearly all his brothers in trade, but more industrious and intelligent, like his countrymen, the Moors. His activity contrasted singularly with the gravity of his neighbors of pure Spanish blood, old Christians and descendants of Pella. Scarcely a barber in Pampeluna but had more practice than he, for nearly every month he was regularly denounced to the Inquisition by some of his neighbors for the crime of sedition, impiety or sorcery.

Gongarello, his way with difficulty through the crowd which obstructed his doorway, approached the placard, and in a loud voice, began to read what was printed in large, black letters:

"Faithful citizens of Pampeluna! our well-beloved lord, Philip III., king of Spain and the Indies, wishes, on his accession to the throne, to visit the lower provinces and good cities of Saragossa and of Pampeluna; he will make, by torchlight, this evening, his entry within its walls. We charge the lord mayor, magistrates, alguazils and familiars of the Inquisition to prepare in each quarter a passage for the royal cortege. Signed, the governor, "
"COUNT DE LEMOS."

And lower down was printed:

"The coach of her majesty and that of his excellence, the Count de Lerma, preceded by a regiment of infantry and followed by a regiment of guards, will enter the gate of Charles V., and will pass along Tacconera Street to the palace of the viceroy, where her majesty will alight. On the route of the procession, all windows must be illuminated, ornamented with flowers, or bear the arms of Spain and those of the Count de Lerma, first minister. It is not necessary to enjoin fidelity upon the loyal population of Pampeluna to cause them to show these marks of the enthusiasm and submission which they bear in their hearts for their well-beloved sovereign. All offenders will be reported to the Inquisition by us."
"JOSUE CALZADO, Corregidor."

Hardly had Gongarello finished the reading, when the corregidor appeared upon the balcony of his palace, and raising his plumed hat, exclaimed: "Viva Philip III.! viva el Count de Lerma, his glorious minister!"

Like a faithful echo, the multitude repeated the same cry; some murmurs proceeded from a group under the balcony. A large, lean man with a gray moustache, which gave him the air of an old Spanish soldier, and who was Gines Peres, host of the "Golden Sun," coughed discontentedly, and said, aloud:

"Let us receive at Pampeluna our new king, the court, and above all, the Count de Lerma, whose suite, I have heard, is more numerous than that of her majesty; I wish him well. The count does not mind expense; his men hold to being well kept; they should dine at the Golden Sun."

"And have some holiday dresses made," added Truxillo, the rich tailor.

"But," continued Gines Peres, raising his voice, "for what good are these two regiments which they announce—that of guards and of infantry?"

"That of infantry!" exclaimed Truxillo, turning pale.

"Yes," replied the innkeeper; "also a crowd of unnecessary people who always appear in a city with the troops, without thinking that these soldiers will all be lodged and fed by the citizens."

"It is true—it is true!" exclaimed many merchants.

"And those who have the misfortune to have fine houses," continued the host, "large shops or spacious hotels, will be overwhelmed with billets of lodgment."

"It is very necessary," said the barber, "that our lord and master, the new king, have around him soldiers to guard him."

"No—it is not necessary!" cried a man with large shoulders, thick red beard and ferocious eye,—"no—it is not necessary! The law and our rights oppose it."

"He is right!" cried the innkeeper.

"Very right!" louder cried the tailor.

The voices in the crowd were hushed, and all listened with deep attention to the orator, who pursued with vehemence:

"When the deceased king, Philip II., under the pretext of pursuing Antonio Peres, came armed, and destroyed the charters of Arragon, he only regretted that he could not destroy the charters of Navarre also, and that which Philip II. did not dare to do, his son and successor will attempt; but you will not suffer it if you are true citizens, true people of Navarre."

"We are all true!" cried the tavern-keeper.

"All!" shouted the tailor.

"All!" repeated the crowd, which, without fully comprehending what was going on, began to be agitated and sway about.

"What say our charters? That the city shall be governed and guarded by its citizens, and no stranger shall enter there. That is the text."

"That is true!" cried the host, who had never read it.

"That is true!" confidentially repeated the tailor.

"But," hazarded the barber, in a low voice, "the soldiers of the king are not strangers."

"They are Castilians," replied the orator, with scorn; "and what is there common between the kingdom of Castile and Navarre? We are not like the rest of Spain; we have never been conquered; we gave ourselves on condition that Navarre should preserve the old charters which she possessed."

"That is true—that is true!" was the cry on all sides.

"And stronger, more brave than our neighbors, the citizens of Arragon, we will take the motto which they did not know how to defend, and we will say: 'The king will enter our gates without any other guard than the citizens of Pampeluna.'"

It was not unintentionally that the speaker made this allusion to the ancient formula of Arragon; there had always been a rivalry for privileges between Arragon and Navarre, and the enthusiastic shout of "Long life to Captain Josef Baptista!" showed that his words went home.

Hearing the noise in the street, the Corregidor Josue Calzador again appeared on his balcony, more satisfied and startled by the silence which followed his appearance and permitted him to show his zeal, and above all, to harangue the people. The honorable lord mayor loved to speak, but he was cruelly disappointed, for he had hardly collected the whole strength of his lungs to cry, "Faithful people of Navarre!" than his voice was drowned in cries of, "Down with the corregidor!"

"Long life to the king! long life to his glorious minister!" cried the corregidor, raising his voice to the highest pitch.

"Down with the Count de Lerma! down with the minister!"

"That is what I mean to say, my dear citizens. Hear me; my sole motto is—live our glorious monarch!"

"Down with the king, if he curtails our liberties!"

"That is what I say, my countrymen. Deign to hear me—Hurrah for our liberties!"

The multitude interrupted him tumultuously; many reproached him, and the people, excited by Gines Peres and Truxillo, had already torn the great proclamation from the gate and trampled it under foot. The rage of the population did not stop here, for the people, stooping to their baskets of vegetables and fruits, provided themselves with projectiles which, directed by a steady eye and strong arm, proved anything but harmless. The poor corregidor stood exposed to the full fury of the assault, and he was about retreating from the field of battle, when Captain Josef Baptista, with the agility of a sailor, seizing one of the iron supports of the balcony, swung himself up beside the frightened magistrate, and clasping him in his powerful arms, was about to throw him into the street, when Josue Calzador made one more attempt for his life, and exclaimed, as the powerful captain raised him in his arms:

"You will not listen to me—I am for you! Inhabitants of Pampeluna, I think like you. Live our charters!"

"Long live the corregidor!" cried the people, with one voice.

"Yes, yes—he shall die to defend our charters," added the captain, and he squeezed his victim so tightly that Josue ran eminent danger of being suffocated, and could only extend his hands as if taking an oath.

The people, always changeable, repeated with admiration, "Long live our worthy magistrate, Josue Calzador!"

"He will conduct us himself to the governor," continued the captain, "and will be spokesman for us himself. It is himself who proposes it to you."

At these words, the popular enthusiasm knew no bounds. The corregidor, led into the street by Josef Baptista, was overwhelmed by the redoubled vivats of the delirious multitude. Before he could open his lips, he was pressed, surrounded, and raised upon a thousand arms and carried off in triumph, his forehead still soiled by the traces of the last projectiles, crowned by a wreath of oak. The popular cortege, conducted by Gines Peres, the master of the Golden Sun, and Truxillo the tailor, marched to the palace of the governor, traversing Tacconera Street, already begun to be decorated with flowers, ribbons, or banners ornamented with the arms of Spain, waving at each crossing, to salute the royal entrance of Philip III.

CHAPTER II.

THE TWO CHILDREN.

WHILE these events were taking place in the centre of the city, a little child of ten or twelve years perhaps—I say perhaps, for no one, not even himself, could tell his age,—was wandering in the street Saint Pacome, a little, dirty, crooked path. His face was very much emaciated, and bore marks of fever, and his ragged clothes attested to his great poverty and misery. The expression of his face was sweet and gentle, and his large black eye denoted intelligence. He walked, or rather dragged himself along, and his greatest illness now, of which he was dying, was hunger. He passed slowly and wearily through several streets, which, to his great astonishment, he found entirely deserted, for at the first news of the revolt, the people had run to the public square. The poor child put out his hand to a counsellor who came along, not daring to speak; but the man did not look at him, but passed on his way. An instant after, a nobleman appeared, walking slowly and enveloped in his mantle. The poor child ventured timidly to raise his ragged hat and salute him; but he received for alms only a return of the salute. The young beggar sank with weakness, supporting himself against a gate, and he heard the voice of a woman, which raised his hopes.

"Pablo—Pablo," cried the mother, "come here; your soup awaits you."

At these words, the orphan knocked loudly at the gate, as if it had been himself who was called. But the mother was too busily occupied with her child to heed the stranger at her gate.

"Alas!" exclaimed he, "I have no mother to call me; I have no repast awaiting me." And wearily he continued to follow the beautiful street which conducted him to the borders of the Argu, hoping nothing more from men, without doubt, for his eyes were turned towards heaven. Just then, the sun broke through the clouds, and the child leaned against the wall, while a melancholy smile lit up his face as if he recognized in the sun his only friend. Then his eyes, more accustomed to the dim light of narrow, crooked streets, drooped, and as they did so, fell upon some pieces of melon lying in the street. Almost famished, he stooped and picked up the pieces, and was carrying them quickly to his month, when he saw a child, nearly his own age, a kind of Bohemian, equally ragged with himself, who came towards him singing.

"You must be very happy and gay to sing," said he, to the child.

"I sing because I am hungry and have nothing to eat."

In an instant, without uttering a word, he generously handed his companion the pieces of melon he had picked up. The Bohemian regarded him with astonishment, and exclaimed:

"What! have you no other dinner but that?"

"Very happy am I to have found it; let us eat."

And the two friends seated themselves on the curb-stone and commenced their repast. The dining saloon was vast and grand. It was a deserted street, resembling nearly all the other streets in Pampeluna; it was straight, graced by a fountain of running water, which offered a cool drink. In front of them was an elegant mansion, upon the door of which they read, "Truxillo, master-tailor." Behind them was the fine hotel called the "Golden Sun," whose windows opened nearly above them. Their repast was soon finished, and the Bohemian asked his friend's name.

"Juan—that is what I was called by the monks, with whom I was. And you—what are you called?"

"Pedralvi. Your parents?"

"I have none."

"Nor I. Have you ever known your father or mother?"

"I never knew my father. My mother," said Juan, trying to recall his remembrances, "was a great lady. There came with her great lords and ladies in rich dresses, and plumes in their hats; she had splendid rooms with tapestry. I see still a splendid mirror with which I played; it was beautifully ornamented, and had a drawer always filled with sugar-plums and candies. That is all I remember of the care and tenderness of my mother, and then, one morning, I went to the gate of a great building they call a convent, where they kept me—I cannot tell how long; then they sent me away, saying: 'Seek thy own living, idle one! I was hungry, I was poor, and then I was ill. Every one said to me: 'Go; you have the fever; we shall catch it.'"

Pedralvi held his hand tightly while Juan spoke.

"And, finally," continued he, "I have nothing; I know not where to go. What is your history?"

"Mine?" said Pedralvi. "I remember my mother only; I see her still; she was large and stoozy, and carried me on her back. One day we came to Grenada; we descended the mountains, which they call the Alpujarras. I forget how it was done, but some men in black cassocks surrounded us, and separated my mother from me in spite of her cries and mine. They threw cold water on my face, and said some barbarous words which I did not understand, and my mother cried out: 'He is not a Christian; he never shall be, nor myself, either; and she tried to wipe what she called a stain off my forehead, and they killed her.'"

"Killed her?" cried Juan, in affright.

"Yes—while they called her a heretic accursed."

"A heretic!" repeated the child; "what is that, I wonder?"

"I don't know. My blood grew cold; I saw her, and she said to me: 'Pedralvi, my son, remember me always.' Then she suddenly became pale; her limbs grew stiff, and she ceased to speak. What followed I do not know. I only know that in a wood I met some Bohemians, who took me with them. Then one day they were attacked by the men in black whom they called alguazils. Each mother fled with her child; I, who had no mother, was left on the great road. Since then I walked ahead, I sang and I begged. That is my story."

The two orphans seized hold of each other's hands, exclaiming: "My brother!"

"Our dinner is finished," said Pedralvi, "but I am still very hungry."

"So am I," sadly replied Juan; "but I will hope to get another course," he added, cheerfully, while his eager, hungry eyes roamed round in search of another stray bit of food.

"Stop, children," said a sweet voice; and at one of the windows of the Golden Sun, appeared a young girl in Moorish dress. It was Juniata, a young servant of the hotel. She threw out to them a large piece of white bread, and the remains of a breakfast left by two students of Saragossa. Never had royal banquet, never minister's dinner been partaken of with greater joy. The children sat joyously, forgetting their former want and poverty and all ills, but not the calls of gratitude, for, from time to time, they turned with grateful eyes to the window where the little servant still stood. This laughing picture was interrupted by a cry from Juniata. The cry was caused by the sudden appearance of Gines Peres, who sprang forward and caught Juan by the ear, while Pedralvi, throwing the remains of the food into a basket he carried on his back, managed to escape, after whispering to Juan: "This evening, behind the church of Saint Pacome."

Juan would willingly have followed his more fortunate companion.

lon, but one of his ears was held tightly by the innkeeper, who was denouncing Juniata as a little thief and witch, and he also thought, generously, that even if he could escape, he ought to stay to defend his young benefactress. Juan pleaded earnestly for the young girl. Suddenly Gines said he would pardon Juniata and Juan, and even give him twenty maravedis, equal to about five cents, upon one condition.

"And what is that?" asked Juan, his large eyes wide open with astonishment.

"I will give it to you this evening, if you will promise to cry all the time from now till then, in the streets of Pampeluna, Trent nos fueros! Live our charters!"

"That is not difficult," said the child, "if I shall really have the money."

"Yes—I will pay you here, this evening; I swear it, little fellow," he added, almost kindly, as he saw the doubt springing up in the large, earnest eyes—"I swear it by the Nuestra Dama del Pilar," and he released the child's ear, who, after thanking him, set off gaily, crying at the top of his young strong lungs: "Trent nos fueros!"

CHAPTER III.

THE TRIUMPH.

In an old rich mansion of Pampeluna, whose windows opened upon the street Tacconera, in a Gothic chair was seated an old man, a warrior, and by his side stood a young man waiting respectfully for the old man to speak. The old man was Don Juan d'Aguilar, an old soldier and courtier of the reign of Philip II., father of the new king. The young man waited sometime for him to speak, but as he continued silent, he hazarded a remark:

"May I go to Ireland with you, my uncle?"

"No," replied the old soldier.

"And why not?" asked the young man.

"You have not yet won your first arms, Fernand; I would wish to see you begin by a victory, and we shall be henten."

"What do you say, you Don Juan d'Aguilar? when the king has given you six thousand men from his best troops to embark for Ireland,—when he wishes to signalize the first year of his reign by a glorious enterprise?"

"I will go—I will go; but we shall never succeed. It is useless. In the place of attacking free Elizabeth, exciting troubles and stirring up revolts, I will not say what ought to be done. But they scorn our counsels; will not listen to us, the old soldiers who know how to make war, and who have served under Don Juan of Austria. Spain was great and glorious then."

"And now, uncle," said the young man, proudly, "she has not degenerated."

"Yes," cried the old man, regarding him with satisfaction, "she has still arms and swords to defend her; but the empire of Charles V. is finished; our power is gone; her decline has commenced, and it will not stop."

"A new reign will bring back its splendors."

"A new reign!" murmured the old man. He heaved a deep sigh, and continued, in a low voice: "I stood by the death-bed of Philip II., and that king, who heard the news of a victory without his face expressing the least joy, that prince saw one of his fleets destroyed without a regret. I saw him weep—yes, weep, before me, his old servitor, for the future government of Spain. 'God,' said he, 'who has given me so many states, has not given me a son capable of governing it.'"

"What does that matter, if he has a good minister?"

The old man made an impatient gesture.

"The Count de Lerma a good minister! Where has he learned how to be a good minister? Is it in the chamber of the infant king, under the orders of the Marquise de Vaglio? During Philip's infancy, he made himself such a favorite that he has been appointed prime minister; no—the Count de Lerma has not become his minister, but absolute sovereign of Spain. Yes—it is true that the signature of the Count de Lerma is of as much value as that of the king himself—he, the descendant of Philip II. and Charles V. A king of Spain ascends the throne and abdicates the empire! I know this favorite detests me."

"How is that, my uncle? Does he not give you the command of the glorious expedition to Ireland?"

"Yes—he loves me better in Ireland than in Pampeluna. Pampeluna seems to him too near Madrid and the court. He wishes to send me as far away as possible. Martin Padilla, who commands the fleet, is my enemy; Ocampo, who is given to me for lieutenant, is my enemy—"

"More reason, dear uncle, why I should go with you. You will let me go?" asked the young man, eagerly.

"No. If you go, who will defend my memory? Who will protect Carmina, my daughter, when I leave her an orphan? She has no rightful protector but her aunt, my sister, the Countess d'Altamira, and I have little confidence in her. You know, Fernand, the plans I have in relation to both of you. You will not desert her—you promise me?"

"Yes, uncle,—I promise you," exclaimed the young man, taking the old man's hand.

"And then," added the old man, wiping a tear away, "when you are old enough, you will enter the council, for you have a right to be there, for you are Fernand, Baron d'Albayda, first baron of the kingdom of Valencia; forget then all I have said to-day. Defend then our feeble monarch against his favorite and himself; always respect his authority; whatever he may do, he is your lord and father."

While he was speaking, a distant but prolonged murmur was heard. The noise increased slowly, and finally the cries of "Justice! justice! Death to the Count de Lerma!" were heard.

"Already!" exclaimed Don d'Aguilar; and turning to Fernand, he desired him to seek his daughter Carmina.

Fernand turned to obey, but at that moment the door opened, and a man entered quickly, whose rich clothes were disordered and soiled. His haughty face showed at the same time fear and rage, and he sought to hide his emotion by smiling.

"The Count de Lemos! the governor of Pampeluna!" exclaimed Don d'Aguilar and his nephew.

The Count de Lemos was brother-in-law to the Count de Lerma, and viceroy of Navarre.

"Yes—it is I, my dear friend," he exclaimed, laughingly. "They surrounded my carriage in the middle of the street, and assailed it with stones. I was obliged to alight, and they followed me even to your very gates."

"Of whom do you speak?" coldly asked d'Aguilar.

"Have you not heard what has passed?"

"I have heard nothing."

"Nothing"—well, that is laughable—a folly—a delirium! They have lost their heads, and Josue Calzado, the alealde, as well as the rest. I saw him carried in triumph on the shoulders of the people; he came in that way to my palace. They wish to close the gates against the entrance of the king into Pampeluna—"

"Close the gates against the king of Spain?"

"Certainly. I have sent instantly a disguised messenger to my brother-in-law, the Count de Lerma, the first minister; he will know what to do."

"But you, monsieur count,—what did you do?"

"Do! what should I do?"

"Is there not a citadel in Pampeluna?" scornfully asked the old soldier, his eyes flashing.

"It is not wholly finished; not a cannon—not a soldier."

"In a frontier city!" cried d'Aguilar, looking at Fernand.

"What do you say to that? Behold the foresight of those to whom Spain is confided! No garrison—no soldiers!"

"Very happily," impatiently remarked Lemos, "since that is the cause of all the trouble—of the revolt. They wish the king to enter without a military guard, escorted only by the citizens."

"Did you yield to them?" fiercely asked d'Aguilar.

"No. Seeing that it was impossible to make them hear me, I had my coach and horses made ready, and was leaving the back gate of the palace. I hoped to be able to join the Duke de Lerma and the two regiments which accompany him, and then we would have seen!" and the governor raised his head proudly and defiantly.

"You, the governor," exclaimed Don Juan d'Aguilar, with scornful surprise, "abandon the city?"

"Yes—but to re-enter it; but I was unable to do so. They saw me, and followed me. Fortunately, I was able to take refuge with you, and I ask ten thousand pardons, my dear d'Aguilar, for entering without ceremony and without being intro—"

At this moment the tumult redoubled outside, and a valet tremblingly entered, saying that the people outside demanded with horrible cries and menaces the governor. The Count de Lemos paled. Young Fernand approached him as if to protect him, and Don d'Aguilar, without quitting his chair, said, laughing:

"Tell them that I am too much honored by this visit from the count to wish to abridge it. He shall remain in the hotel as long as he wishes." Then, with Castilian dignity, he added: "To the men at the gates, tell them to withdraw."

The unhappy corregidor, chief of the populace, without wishing it, tried in vain to make himself heard, and tossed his arms wildly; and the people thought he was encouraging them to proceed, and they cried aloud: "The alealde is right! To the assault—to the assault! Long live the corregidor!"

Stones began to be thrown, and each moment the fury of the populace seemed to increase.

"What is to be done?" cried Count de Lemos, in despair, as he heard the crashing of the windows and rattling of stones.

"Arrest the alealde and two or three others, and the rest will depart," said Don d'Aguilar.

"Death to the governor!" cried the crowd.

The Count de Lemos tried in vain to hide his feelings, and in spite of the smile on his lips, his cheeks were pale, and a cold sweat stood on his brows. Don d'Aguilar tried to reassure him, and bade him fear nothing, for in a few hours, perhaps minutes, the Count de Lerma, with two regiments, would arrive and disperse the mob.

A renewal of cries more menacing than before reached their ears, and also the noise made by beams and pikes beating at the door. These noises seemed to give back youth to the old Don d'Aguilar. He crossed the apartment with a firm, majestic tread, and in a clear voice gave orders for his servants to tear out the casements and beams. The governor demanded what he intended to do, and the reply came clear and calm:

"Throw the first stone of the house upon their heads."

Fernand's young, fiery blood glowed with the thoughts of a battle. The Count de Lemos was surprised at the generosity of the old man, for their families were hostile and himself an enemy of d'Aguilar. All preparations were made, for the old general wished not only to repulse the crowd, but to make with his servants a sortie upon the assailants, and had given orders to have the doors unbarred, when he was astonished at the sudden silence which fell upon the crowd. Turning to the window, to discover the cause, he saw galloping into the square a soldier, waving in his hand a white flag. He stopped before the Hotel d'Aguilar, and cried:

"Open in the name of the king!"

At the name so respected, Don Juan bowed with respect, and caused the gate to be thrown open. It was the captain of the infantry, Fildalgo d'Estremas, bearing a letter from the king to the governor. The count took the letter and read it in haste. While he was reading, Don Juan questioned the bearer as to where the king was, and received for a reply that he was outside the gates of the city, with the two regiments. Count de Lemos finished the letter, and after a moment's hesitation, he handed it to d'Aguilar to read, who, raising his voice, read as follows:

"The king hears with pain the light disorders of which his arrival has been the cause, and after having deliberated in his council, and taken the advice of his ministers, recognizes the privileges accorded to the faithful inhabitants of Navarre by all the kings, his predecessors. His majesty declares it to be his will and pleasure to have on his entrance no other escort than the citizens of Pampeluna; and, further, his majesty condescends to grant to them, during his sojourn in the city, the sole honor of guarding his person and palace."

This paper bore no other signature than this: "For the king, our lord and master, Count de Lerma, first minister."

It was evident from the despatch with which this resolve had been taken, that it had been made by the favorite. It was doubtful even if the king had been consulted. Pale and trembling with indignation, Don Juan d'Aguilar read twice the writing which proved to him the weakness which had already fallen upon the king. Without speaking a word, he returned the paper to the governor, who hastened to quit the hospitable roof where he had found refuge and protection. The old man remained alone with his nephew, and for a long time they were perfectly silent.

At last he exclaimed:

"Alas! what have I said to you, Fernand! I was not wrong in trembling for Spain and for my king." And not daring to say any more, he rose and hastily left the apartment.

CHAPTER IV.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF A TRIUMPH.

THE news of these events spread rapidly through all quarters of the city. The citizens of Pampeluna, those even who had remained at home during the action, now walked in the streets with an air of triumph and satisfaction. The hotels and coffee houses were filled to overflowing, and the hotel of the Golden Sun could not hold all the people who wished to enter. Gines Peres was no longer the same man; he had changed his black hat, his menacing tone, for a white cap, and an affable manner and engaging smile. The conspirator gave way to the host. He stood behind his counter, to see that no fraud or waste was perpetrated, when the brave alealde, Josue Calzado, and some friends, entered, followed by a dozen citizens, who, like himself, bore the shoulder-belt and halberd.

"Honor to the conquerors!" cried the host.

"Honor to you," replied the corregidor,—"to you, who the first exclaimed in favor of our charters. Yes, friends," pursued he, turning to his companions; "without him our liberties would have slept; no one would have thought of them. The king would have entered peacefully the city of Pampeluna, escorted by two regiments of Castilian soldiers, if our worthy host had not recalled our senses, and to him alone belongs the right of escorting and guarding our monarch."

The men shouted and drank to the health of their own captain, Gines Peres. The poor innkeeper grew pale, and pleaded that he could not leave his inn; it needed all his attention. But no denial was to be taken, and in half an hour, notwithstanding all his prayers and entreaties, Gines Peres was in the street, obliged to march at the head of the body of men as their captain. He had proceeded but a few steps, when he encountered Juan and Pedralvi, each followed by a dozen or more ragged little boys, each shouting his cry; Pedralvi, who had been hired by an alguazil, shouting: "Vive le roi!" and Juan, faithful to his promise, shouting, "Trent nos fueros! Live our charters!"

Giving orders to his men, he had the two little fellows seized, while their followers ran away in affright. Ordering four of his men to take the two children and put them in a dungeon belonging to the hotel, he marched on his way. Juan thought little of himself as he was dragged along, but of his friend Pedralvi, and how to liberate him. Suddenly he fell, as if by accident, and, unseen, picked up a poignard. The soldiers roughly pulled him up, and suddenly Juan turned, and with his knife struck Pedralvi's guards in the face, at the same time whispering: "Save thyself, brother!" Pedralvi seized the opportunity, and sprang away.

This generous action cost Juan many hard knocks and kicks from both his own guards and those of Pedralvi. They soon reached the hotel of the Golden Sun, where, obedient to orders, he was thrown into a damp dungeon in the cellar, hungry and bruised, and the halberdiers ran to join their comrades.

Juan was many hours in the dungeon. He tried vainly to break open the door, or obtain help by crying out; but it was of no avail, for the dungeon was deep under ground, and the great noise in the inn prevented his voice from being heard. Finding all his efforts vain, Juan seated himself and wept bitterly. Suddenly the ray of light which shone feebly through the bars of his cell, was obscured by the figure of a person. The figure paused an instant, then fled quickly, while a partridge nicely cooked fell at the feet of Juan.

"I swear to you," said, an instant after, in the dining saloon, the sweet voice of a young girl,—"I swear to you there is not a single partridge left."

Juan was provided with a good supper, as well as a breakfast, through the kindness of Juniata. Having finished his repast, he felt invigorated, and looked round in hopes of finding some means of escape. The only hope he saw was in the iron barred window. Putting on top of each other the two stools in the cell, he managed to reach the window, and though tearing his flesh in many places, he contrived to squeeze through, and soon found himself in the court-yard. Juan had left his cell, but not the hotel, for he found it enclosed by walls so high that he could not scale them.

He was disconcerted and discouraged, and stood looking at the wall in blank despair. As he gazed, he saw first a head, then a body appear above the wall, then somebody dropped at his feet, and in an instant a hand was placed over his mouth, while a voice whispered in his ear: "Be silent; it is Pedralvi. You saved me, and I will save you." And removing his hand from his mouth, Pedralvi led him to the wall, where hung a light rope ladder. With perfect silence they mounted the ladder, and then Pedralvi descended first into the street, that Juan might feel secure. Juan was descending carefully, when he felt himself seized, and heard a rough voice:

INTERIOR OF ALADDIN'S PALACE.

"Where do you come from, little thief?" cried Captain Josef Baptista.

"Senior cavalier," cried Juan, "I am no thief; you are mistaken. Please let me go."

"No—I shall not let you go, little rascal. You will follow me." "Let him go," cried Pedralvi, in wrath, "or I will call loudly for help."

One of the men who accompanied the captain drew a pistol. Josef Baptista seized his hand, saying:

"What would you do, fool? A noise like that at this hour? Of these two night-birds, one is enough."

"Help me!" cried Juan, in despair.

"Help! to the rescue!" cried Pedralvi, remounting the wall.

The cry was heard by the roysterers in the hotel, who rushed into the court; but the captain and his little captive were far away.

Josef Baptista was a Portuguese, the illegitimate son of the Duke of Santarem. Wholly unprincipled, he had accumulated considerable money in various unlawful ways; and one day discovering a castle built on rocks, shrouded by a dense oak wood, not far from the main road, he bought it, and established himself in it with a band of lawless men, himself their captain. It was in these hands that poor Juan had fallen.

Seeing him descend so stealthily from the walls of a fine house, the captain had taken him for a young thief, a brother in trade, or an apprentice, at least. The candor and honesty of the answers given by Juan soon undeceived him, but he could make him what he wanted, for he was young, and Josef Baptista knew that he began at a good time. The greatest regret Juan had was leaving his companion. What would become of Pedralvi, who had exposed himself to save him? Juan Baptista and his friends were out of the city before the break of day. Outside the city, some men were found waiting with horses and mules well laden. The captain smiled grimly as he saw them. The cavalcade set out at a little trot, and travelled all night—crossing, about the middle of the next day, a river which Juan knew was the Ebro, and a few hours after, began to ascend the mountain and enter the forest. Juan understood nothing of the conversation that passed during the route, but when he looked at the captain, determined to ask, he lost all wish to do so. Already cowed and fascinated by him, he did not dare open his lips, and was seized with inexpressible feelings of terror.

When he reached the castle Socoro, he felt worse still, for there reigned a frightful silence which contrasted sadly with the noise of gayety and revelry which was always heard at the Golden Sun; that hotel remained a long time in his memory, as the image of a terrestrial paradise, an enchanted place; he even regretted the cell where he was imprisoned, and which seemed to him far better than the apartments of Captain Josef Baptista Balsiero. The remembrance of the pretty, smiling Juniata, and his friend Pedralvi, made the society of the castle seem yet more sad and terrible. The table of the captain was always well served; good wine and brandy were freely circulated; but what he heard only confounded his ideas of right hardly yet framed,—the orgies finishing nearly always by oaths, imprecations and disputes, which Josef took no pains to stop. When Juan, frightened and disgusted, wept at these scenes, they shook him by the shoulders, or mocked him, and that which excited his horror, on the contrary received praises from those who surrounded him. For the poor child, who had no very definite notion of right or wrong, and no one to guide him in his darkness, this horrible tavern or castle was the antechamber of hell. Juan was forbidden to leave it; it was the order of the captain, and woe to him who dared to disobey! Juan had had a proof some days previous of that.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

If ever crystal water ought to flow sparkling over shining stones, it should be the heart-stream of the family.

EXTERIOR OF THE IMPERIAL BATHS.

SCENES FROM "ALADDIN," BOSTON MUSEUM.

We present on this page three striking scenes from the fairy spectacle of "Aladdin, or the Wonderful Lamp," now performing at the Boston Museum, and produced with all that splendor of scenery, decoration, costume, general and detailed effect for which Mr. Kimball's establishment is renowned. These pictures were drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Champney. The large scene represents a Chinese market-place, and a most amusing picture of Asiatic life. Here are rice and tea vendors, rat and cat sellers, sham-shee men, toy girls, fruit dealers, tom-tom players, dancers, soldiers, conjurers and beggars, and other characters too numerous to mention. This is the third scene of the first part of the spectacle. One of the smaller cuts represents the entrance gates to the imperial baths, with their gay and fantastic architecture, and the meeting, producing love at first sight, of that fortunate youth Aladdin and the incomparable Princess Dahlia-Yan, the emperor's daughter. The remaining engraving represents the interior of Aladdin's Fairy Palace, with a distant view of the country—Aladdin and the princess in front. The legend of the "Wonderful Lamp" is a prime favorite among the tales of the Arabian Nights entertainments, and on the stage, as represented by Mr. Kimball, it produces a wonderful effect on young and old. The story is quite pleasing, and the representation of Chinese architecture, costumes and manners, very instructive. Mr. Kimball has spared no expense, no labor and no study in producing this gorgeous oriental spectacle; it is a blaze of splendor from the first scene to the last. Some of the pageants—such as the grand procession down the Mount of Bridges—are unsurpassable. "Aladdin" was first produced at the Museum ten years ago, and initiated a series of brilliant spectacle pieces. It is now revived, after the lapse of ten years, with more than its original brilliancy. It has attracted overflowing audiences, and will probably run with undiminished success for many nights to come, winning golden laurels for the popular manager.

CHINESE MARKET SCENE, IN "ALADDIN."

THE FORTRESS OF HAM.

The whole history of the present emperor of France is a romance; indeed, had Scott, or Dumas, or Victor Hugo attributed such a career to a fictitious personage, the tale would have been treated with derision, as involving a tissue of glaring improbabilities, not to say impossibilities. His story is indeed, from beginning to end, stranger than fiction. Louis Napoleon Bonaparte was born at Paris, April 20, 1808. He was the third son of Louis Napoleon, king of Holland, and of Hortense Beauharnais, sister of Prince Eugene Beauharnais, and daughter of the Empress Josephine. Napoleon was his god-father, and he was baptized by Cardinal Fesch. At one time, previous to Napoleon's divorce, it appeared as if Louis would inherit his uncle's throne. It is certain Napoleon took the deepest interest in the welfare and education of Louis and his brother. After the fall of Napoleon, Hortense removed to Switzerland, all the Bonaparte family being exiled from France. Louis received a careful education, rather military in its character, and displayed great proficiency in mathematics, the art of war, engineering, political economy and history. His various works, published from time to time, attest high mental culture and great talent. On the occasion of the Italian outbreak in 1831, he took part with the revolutionists, and displayed courage under fire at the defence of Bologna. Hortense and her son visited France incognito, but were not permitted to remain there, and went to England, where they were received with great distinction. The subsequent events of his life are pretty well known—his failure at revolution at Strasburg, his imprisonment and exile, his visit to America, his abortive descent on Boulogne, in 1840, his trial, sentence to imprisonment for life in the fortress of Ham,

BIRD'S EYE VIEW OF THE CASTLE OF HAM.

ing and left every evening, all the time under strict observation. The attempt, however, was made on Monday, May 25th, 1846. Louis Napoleon on that day had his mustachios shaved off, stained his face and hands, and put on a workman's blouse, cap and coarse trousers, having his ordinary dress underneath. His high-heeled boots he thrust into coarse shoes, and thus increased his stature. Then he pulled a shelf out of his book-case, and carrying it on his shoulder, so as to give the appearance of a carpenter, and also to disguise his face as much as possible. He also stuck a short pipe shoulder, moved it to the left; the men, however, appeared so curious that the prince thought for a moment he should not be able to escape them; and when at last they were near, and appeared as if about to speak to him, he had the satisfaction of hearing one of them exclaim, "O, it is Berthoud!" Our engraving represents the scene of this thrilling adventure, fraught with such vast consequences to Europe. We behold the lofty embattled gateway, with the portcullis raised and the drawbridge lowered, as indicated by the chains on the right and left. Sentinels and officers are on either hand. The workmen are pouring through the opening in the wall, which is commanded by two pieces of artillery. In front, holding a board in his right hand, and with his faithful friend and servant beside him, the future emperor of France casts a backward glance at the scene of his five years' imprisonment. A few moments more, and he will reach his carriage and baffle all pursuit. Little more than two years after his escape, he took his seat in the Assembly, chosen a member by a prodigious vote, soon after prince president, and then emperor, the wild dream of his early youth, the object of his constant aspirations, realized. Though we are dazzled by the splendid fortunes of Napoleon, though we think that no success justifies the means by which he rose to power, still it would be idle to withhold from him the credit of having done much to benefit his country. Not to look behind his acts at his motives, we must concede that he has labored hard to improve the condition of the laboring classes. He has erred in some of the measures adopted with reference to their wants, but they were not wilful mistakes. It was a great error, for instance, to attempt to regulate the corn-market; it was an error to demolish the houses in the crowded faubourgs, before equivalent accommodation was furnished elsewhere. These ill-judged measures have produced a strong feeling against Napoleon in Paris, but with the army secure to him, and the middle classes opposed to revolutions, he may be considered safe in his seat. Not long since, he rode through the faubourg in advance of his guards, at the time when all the workmen were going to dinner. His fearlessness had its effect, and he was loudly cheered. No one, we think, will dispute that the sudden death of Louis Napoleon would be a calamity for France. On the other hand, had he failed in his famous coup d'état, the republic in France would have been established on a firm basis, some sound man would have been chosen president, and the principle of rotation in office would have enabled the government to move on smoothly and regularly, the nation becoming every day more interested in the stability of democratic institutions. As it is, the press having been virtually silenced, all political assemblages and discussions having been interdicted, there is no concert of opinion among the people, and revolution would produce anarchy.

CASTLE OF HAM, NAPOLEON'S PRISON.

his escape therefrom, his return to France in 1848, his admission to the rights of citizenship, his election to the presidency of France, and his successful usurpation of the imperial power, confirmed by an immense electoral majority of the people. We have not space to follow out this career in detail, and would refer our readers to a well written life of Louis Napoleon, by Edward Roth, published and for sale by Alexander Moore & Brother, of this city. That work which we have already noticed, and which we are now using as reference in compiling the present sketch, embraces a full history of the remarkable man of whom it treats. We now proceed to the description of the engravings on this page. The first represents a general view of the strong fortress of Ham, in which Louis Napoleon was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, after the failure of his descent on Boulogne, in 1840. The fortress of Ham, in a little town about 90 miles northeast of Paris, is situated in the province of Picardy, and department of Somme. It stands in the midst of a wide plain. Its name, which is derived from the German, signifies a resting-place. It was frequently taken and retaken during the wars of early French history. Some portions of the present wall were built more than one thousand years ago, but the present castle dates from 1470. The great round tower seen in the left hand corner of the quadrangle, and which is 100 feet in diameter, with walls 30 feet thick, was built in the 15th century. Here the fallen ministers of Charles X. were imprisoned in 1830. The only gate of this formidable fortress is to the northeast, and is shown, on a pretty large scale, in the second engraving. Louis Napoleon's imprisonment commenced here on the 7th of October, 1840; here he remained for five years. Negotiations for his release by pardon having failed, the government being decided to enforce his sentence, the prince resolved to attempt an escape. He was aided by Dr. Conneau, who had been a fellow-prisoner, but remained voluntarily as the prince's medical attendant, and by Charles Thelin, his valet, both of whom were allowed to visit the town whenever they chose. The plan adopted was for Charles Thelin to ask permission to go to St. Quentin, as he had done several times before; then he was to go and hire a carriage for the purpose. As he was leaving the prison to find the carriage, the prince, disguised as a workman, was to go out at the same time. This project appears simple enough, but its execution was accompanied by great dangers. The strictest surveillance was kept up, and the prince would have to pass many persons acquainted with his person. Moreover, the workmen, in whose company he was to leave, could not be trusted with his secret. These people, who were engaged in making repairs on the interior, came every morning and left every evening, all the time under strict observation. The attempt, however, was made on Monday, May 25th, 1846. Louis Napoleon on that day had his mustachios shaved off, stained his face and hands, and put on a workman's blouse, cap and coarse trousers, having his ordinary dress underneath. His high-heeled boots he thrust into coarse shoes, and thus increased his stature. Then he pulled a shelf out of his book-case, and carrying it on his shoulder, so as to give the appearance of a carpenter, and also to disguise his face as much as possible. He also stuck a short pipe in his lips. He then boldly left his room, accompanied by the faithful Thelin. He succeeded in passing the door-keepers, at the foot of the staircase, unchallenged, passed the first sentinel unchallenged and unsuspected, passed within a few feet of some of the officers of the garrison, and finally issued from the gateway. Once or twice he narrowly escaped detection. "Between the two drawbridges," says Mr. Roth, "the prince saw two workmen coming straight towards him, on the side, too, on which his face was not concealed by the plank. They looked at him with great earnestness from the distance at which they still were, and in a loud voice expressed their surprise at not knowing him. Fearing lest their surprise might impel them to seek an unpleasant explanation, the prince, pretending to be tired of carrying the plank on his right

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

DEPARTED YEARS.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Retreating down Time's weary way,
A long procession, sad and slow,
With feeble steps and garments gray,
And mournful mien, I saw them go.

Each, full of joy had started forth,
Mid January's snow and cold,
From chilly regions of the north,
Freighted with hopes of young and old.

Returning seasons rolling round,
The budding Spring—the Summer's smile—
Autumn with yellow harvest crowned,
And Winter with his snowy pile.

Each year had seen: the falling leaf
Whispered its warning to the ear,
And winter days, so few and brief,
Dethroned the old, decrepit year.

Slow disappearing from the sight,
In silence passed the spectral train:
Entered eternity's dark night,
Ne'er to be viewed by us again.

Departed years! Ah, who can tell
What withered hopes, what griefs ye bear!
Each footfall is a funeral knell,
Re-echoed by the grim Despair?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MY FRIEND'S VALET.

BY SUSAN HOLMES BLAISDELL, AUTHOR OF THE CONTRABANDIST, ETC.

"My dear Charles, pray, what is the name of that handsome young man dancing with the coquettish waiting-woman of Madame d'Arville?"

I asked this of my friend, M. d'Arville, as we stood on the terrace before his country-house, watching the gay movements of his domestics, who, with some of the honest people of the neighborhood, were assembled on the wide lawn below, enjoying the animated recreations of a general holiday, which was slowly drawing to its close. The soft, rosy sunset shed a clear glow over the merry scene, brightening the faces of the dancers as they moved hither and thither in their fine holiday costumes, and bringing out into especial relief the figure and countenance of one, a handsome, graceful youth, who far surpassed his companions in appearance, and who seemed to be particularly attentive to the pretty damsel at his side.

"He?" said M. d'Arville, "O, that is Edmond, a favorite attendant of mine, whom I have taken into my service since you were here, last winter. You are pleased with his appearance, Louis?"

"Extremely. There is about him an air of frankness, and at the same time, of modesty, which is most engaging. What a fine, cheerful, open countenance! Honesty itself is imprinted there."

M. d'Arville looked pleased.

"Yes, he is a fine fellow, I think—that is, if one may judge correctly from his appearance from a six months' acquaintance with him, and from the good character he has always borne, and that, I should say, is amply sufficient—I like him very much. He is a general favorite with the other servants, also."

"Doubtless. A very decided one, I imagine," was my answer, as I observed the bright smile which his companion, pretty Mademoiselle Josephine, cast upon her handsome partner, as she moved along by his side.

"Except, perhaps," added my friend, "except with Baptiste, my valet, whom you may see close by, there, and who is somewhat discomposed by the preference of Ma'am-selle Josephine for Edmond rather than for himself."

"Ah, then!" I cried, laughingly, "your well-behaved Baptiste is jealous?"

"Precisely—jealous—though his jealousy is evinced in a very mild way, which makes me sympathize with him so much the more. For, instead of being angry with Josephine and hating Edmond, as any other disappointed lover would do, he displays only an air of subdued seriousness, which he cannot conceal, though he evidently desires to hide his wounded affection. He is civil to Edmond, and treats Josephine as one who will probably soon be betrothed to his rival, with grave courtesy, through which, however, is visible at times, despite himself, a tender, and sometimes gently reproachful melancholy, telling how severe is the disappointment which he tries so heavily to overcome. The poor fellow displays a generosity—a magnanimity—worthy of being followed as an example, and which much advances him in my favor."

At this moment, Baptiste himself, who was not dancing with the rest, but merely looking on, as one who is inclined less to festivity than to grave meditation, passed near us, and saluted, with a polite yet serious air, his master and myself; his countenance, meanwhile, wearing a slightly dejected expression, which I readily comprehended. Then he passed on, his glance resting for a moment, as I observed, upon Edmond and Josephine.

"Well—and Edmond?" I said.

"O, Edmond, I believe, is really sorry for the disappointment of Baptiste!" answered M. d'Arville; "but he is very much in love—that is, fascinated—with Josephine; though I confess, I wish it were with some one less coquettish than she. I think she is hardly the wife for him. She makes my wife a very excellent waiting-woman; but she is too trifling, too fond of dress and display, which is not well for a young woman in her place. She is fickle, too—inclined to think best of those who are in the best circumstances. Baptiste was the favored suitor before Edmond came. When Edmond was found to be the favorite in the esteem of people, she smiled on him instead. Ever ready to turn to the one highest in favor, I very much suspect she will make a false move one of these days."

Such was our conversation on the evening of my arrival at the Chateau d'Arville, at mid-summer. Very often, I had occasion to observe during my visit, the deportment of Edmond, who was so faithful, steady and trustworthy, and had, moreover, such excellent abilities, that M. d'Arville came gradually to treat him with the utmost confidence, and to entrust to him the transaction of many of his minor business affairs; which, being so well executed, were after a time succeeded by those of more importance. Although a poor boy, and obliged to maintain himself by hard labor, Edmond had found little opportunities, now and then, of acquiring some earning, so that he had now a very good plain education. He was, in particular, a good arithmetician, and M. d'Arville, discovering this, frequently employed him in the arrangement and settlement of accounts, in writing or copying letters, etc. He grew continually in his master's favor, and also in that of Ma'am-selle Josephine, who was, one could see, not a little flattered and gratified by learning the comments of people on her good fortune in possessing such a lover.

Baptiste, on his part, seemed to grow gradually resigned to the prevailing state of affairs, and by degrees to be recovering from his disappointment. He got quite cheerful at last, and was very friendly with Edmond; indeed, on one occasion he was heard to declare that he did not doubt that Edmond would make Ma'am-selle Josephine a great deal better husband than he. I sometimes wondered that Baptiste could be so generous—that he could look with friendly feelings on Edmond, who had innocently transplanted him in Josephine's good graces, and who was daily becoming such a favorite with his master.

"That Baptiste of yours is the most good-natured fellow in the universe," said I to my friend, when we were speaking on the subject together.

"Yes, indeed—but did I not tell you so?" he returned. "Though then I did not know how much he could hear. I have lately employed Edmond in several matters which I formerly gave only into the hands of Baptiste. Baptiste is evidently a little disappointed at the transfer of confidence, but will not complain, and, if anything, treats Edmond the better. I have tried him purposely. Yes, Louis, he is really a most excellent-hearted fellow."

"And Edmond gains every day in your confidence," I said.

"Yes—every day. I really admire his good qualities. So much, indeed, do I value him, that—I may as well tell you now—I have determined to make him my steward, in place of M. Jean Pierrot, who is obliged to resign in a month of two, the infirmities of old age rendering it necessary for him to retire from his situation. M. Jean will spend the remainder of his days in quiet, upon the little farm which I have given him, near my estate; and Edmond, meanwhile, will assume the duties of his office. But do not mention the subject to him, if you please. Madame d'Arville is the only other person who is acquainted with it. I wish it to remain quiet at present."

"My dear," cried Madame d'Arville, gaily, to her husband, "what is the matter over which you are pondering with so much gravity? Absolutely in a brown study, I declare."

M. d'Arville started up from the meditative position which he had unconsciously assumed.

"I was wondering, Emilie, what can have become of my seal ring—that which your brother gave me."

"You have lost it, then?"

"Yes—that is to say, I can find it nowhere."

"When did you have it last, my dear—do you remember?"

"Yesterday evening, when I was writing letters at the desk in my study. I perfectly recollect using it, and I do not remember having had it since. I do not think I put it on again, though I might have done so. My impression is that I left it on the desk."

"It may have rolled off upon the floor, may it not?"

"Possibly. But it is not upon the floor now. I have searched carefully. There is no sign of it."

"Have you asked Edmond if he has seen it?"

"No—he is out, and I only missed it a little while ago."

"He was with you in the study, writing, last evening. He may have observed it and put it away for you."

"He would not, in that case, have forgotten to mention it to me."

"No—no. He cannot have seen it."

At that moment, Edmond himself, with his usual cheerful face, entered the vestibule, having just returned from a brisk morning walk, and M. d'Arville, thinking he might have heard their last words, said:

"We were speaking, Edmond, about my seal ring, which I have mislaid. You have not seen it, I presume, lying anywhere in the library?"

"No, monsieur," said Edmond, "that is, not since yesterday evening, when I remember that you used it in preparing your letters. I held the candle by which you melted the wax to seal them, if you recollect. It was then that I observed the ring last. Did you not put it on again?"

"I do not think I did. Well, we will search in the library once more."

"Allow me to assist you, sir," said Edmond.

They sought together. We all looked, wherever we thought it possible the ring might be found; for it was one which M. d'Arville valued exceedingly, as a gift from the brother of his wife. Inquiry was made among the servants; but the ring was not to be found.

"Never mind," said M. d'Arville, "it will doubtless come to light some time. Let it go at present."

We little thought what a sad hour it would be when it would be discovered.

But so the matter rested. Day by day a month elapsed. Why it was I could not guess, but of late, M. d'Arville appeared at times unusually grave. The reason of this gravity I could not comprehend. It was equally a secret from Madame d'Arville. At first, observing these moods of grave abstraction, she rallied him upon the matter, with her usual liveliness. Then, with much seriousness, she besought him to tell her the cause. He refrained, however, from disclosing it immediately, but assured her that she should sometime be made acquainted with it.

One morning, while walking with him in the garden, I observed that he wore this ever-recurring air of thoughtful gravity. Without being quite aware of it, I regarded him, I suppose, very attentively, myself falling into a mood of reflection concerning this perplexing matter. Suddenly I was aroused by his raising his head, and seeing me looking at him. He sighed.

"Come, Louis," he said, "shall we go in, now?"

Assenting, I turned back with him.

"My dear friend," said he, as we proceeded, "you have, doubtless, remarked that I have been somewhat absent-minded, occasionally, of late?"

I acknowledged that he had appeared so.

"And absence of mind in a host is extremely impolite; I will, therefore, give you an explanation, which shall be for an apology; and I know you will grant it to be a sufficient one. You are not, perhaps, aware," he continued, as we entered the library, "that I am somewhat careless in regard to money. I very frequently leave it lying about in my rooms, particularly in my study, in various sums. I have done this so often that it has become a habit; and when I am hurried at any time, and happen to have money in my hand, I lay it down, on desk or table, or throw it loose into a drawer, wherever I happen to be, and leave it there, where it stays till I think of it again. From this imprudence of mine, no trouble has ever resulted until lately. And within a few weeks past, since I have had occasion to be more circumspect, I find that my fault is not without its evil consequences; for, of the sums which I thus leave about, at least one half is invisible after I have left it. Probably I should never have ascertained this fact, had it not been for a certain circumstance which occurred some time since, and which aroused my suspicions. But so it is. There is in my household a traitor—a thief."

"Whom do you suspect, Charles?" I asked, thoughtfully.

"One in whom I have placed the utmost confidence—one of my own people. One who is nearest my own person, and who takes advantage of the knowledge he has gained of my habits to pursue his nefarious practices without fear of discovery. I do not think I am mistaken in the person, but I must wait for certainty before I make any accusation. The person whom I suspect has all along appeared to me such a paragon of perfection, that I am lost in indignation and astonishment at this sudden discovery of his guilt."

A terrible thought startled me.

"Charles!" I uttered, "you cannot surely mean—"

At that moment a knock was heard at the library door, which was directly opened by Madame d'Arville, who just put her pleasant face into the apartment, saying to her husband:

"My dear Charles, there is one of your tenants without here, who desires to see you immediately."

"I will come, my dear Emilie," said M. d'Arville. "Louis, you will be so good as to excuse me for ten minutes," and he followed his wife from the room.

As the door closed, a slight sound at the upper end of the apartment caused me to turn. I beheld Edmond standing by the escritoire at which he usually wrote, with one hand leaning upon it, while his face was deathly pale. I started as if I had been struck. Before I could recover myself, he had passed from the room. He had been there when we entered, though unnoticed by us, and must have heard every word his master uttered.

I did not see my friend Charles alone again that day, though I would have given much for an opportunity of doing so; for he had not concluded the business interview with his tenant before guests arrived at the chateau, thus depriving me of the hope of further explanations at present. And all that day, the thought of that unfinished communication, and the pale, trouble-stricken countenance of Edmond haunted me.

It was that morning that Edmond had requested leave of M. d'Arville to visit his mother, who was ill, at Clermont. He was to go on the morrow, and had permission to remain at Clermont a week. His portmanteau was packed in readiness for his departure on the following day.

But there was destined to be a delay. It was early on the succeeding morning when, entering the library, I beheld Edmond seated at a table, his head resting upon his hand, his eyes fixed upon the floor, his countenance pale, and his expression indicative of some inward agitation. He looked up as I entered. A feeling of pity filled my breast.

"Ah, Edmond—still here?" I said, endeavoring to speak as cheerfully as I could. "Why, I thought you were about setting off for Clermont."

"Monsieur," he answered, in a voice of pain, "I was to go this morning. It is no longer my intention to do so."

"But your mother, who is ill?" I said.

"My mother would not have me leave the chateau now, monsieur, if she were in much more danger than threatens her at present," was Edmond's reply.

"Why?" I asked.

"Because, monsieur," he returned, "in doing so I may place my own honor in peril."

The door opened. M. d'Arville entered, his face pale, serious, almost stern. He was followed by Baptiste.

"Shut the door, Baptiste," said his master.

The man obeyed; his glance fixed upon his master with apparent perplexity and curiosity to know the meaning of his proceedings.

"You do not know, of course, Baptiste," said M. d'Arville, calmly, "why you have been summoned to follow me thither—to a room which you so seldom enter."

"No, monsieur," answered Baptiste.

"It is, then," said M. d'Arville, "to investigate an affair which nearly touches the honor of some one at this moment present in this apartment."

There was utter silence for an instant. We all looked at M. d'Arville. I noticed that Edmond's paleness increased; but he did not shrink from the glance of M. d'Arville. Baptiste, meanwhile, wore an air of well-blended astonishment and curiosity, as before, and his eyebrows slightly raised at the mention of the word "honor," with a dawning expression of concern. Charles crossed over to me.

"My dear Louis," he said, "I am very glad you happened to be here. I wish you to mark well the countenances of Edmond and Baptiste, while I examine them in relation to the affair which I mentioned to you yesterday. It lies between them. I know now which is guilty. Do not be deceived by appearances. Watch well."

He returned, and seated himself by the table.

"Edmond—Baptiste," he said, regarding them by turns, "you both know that in one corner of my study stands a small iron chest."

Edmond bowed. Baptiste said, quietly:

"Yes, monsieur—in which, I think, you keep your papers."

An almost imperceptible smile curled the lips of M. d'Arville. "You are wrong, Baptiste. I do not keep my papers there. Edmond, what do you think I keep there?"

"Gold, monsieur," answered Edmond.

"How do you know that?"

"I have seen you deposit it there, monsieur."

"Right. I never kept it a secret from you. But you see Baptiste was ignorant. Is it not so, Baptiste?"

"Monsieur is correct," said the valet, with an honest air.

"I was not quite sure," went on M. d'Arville, "whether that were so or not, for this reason: Last night, just before retiring, I placed in that chest a certain sum of money, contained in a certain number of small bags. That money I was to pay away this morning. This morning, on going, just before breakfast, to take it out, I find that one of the bags is missing."

He paused. Edmond's eyes were fixed, with a look of intense distress, on his master's face. I read there the agonized thought in his breast—"how am I to prove that I am innocent?" Baptiste, on his part, started with consternation.

"Missing, monsieur!" he ejaculated.

"Missing, Baptiste!" returned M. d'Arville; "and I regret exceedingly to say that, as I know no one but you and Edmond have entered my study since yesterday, one or the other of you is responsible for the loss."

"I am sorry if monsieur suspects me," said Baptiste, with simple candor and dignity—"that he should suspect his old servant, who has served him faithfully and affectionately for so many years. I thought monsieur knew the heart of his Baptiste."

"That is scarcely to be doubted, my good fellow," answered his master. "Yes, indeed, Baptiste, you have served me as none other has ever done or could do again."

I thought I perceived a double meaning to this speech; but was soon persuaded that I was mistaken. M. d'Arville proceeded:

"Baptiste, when were you in my study last?"

"At noon, yesterday, monsieur, when I went to announce that M. Lefevre desired an audience with you."

"Very good. And you, Edmond?"

"Monsieur," answered the young man, in a hollow tone of despair, at which I did not marvel, "I was there the greater part of yesterday afternoon, and spent the evening there."

"Alone?"

"Alone, monsieur."

He acknowledged the truth that formed the greatest evidence against him. He might have told a falsehood if he had chosen. But he told the truth; and I never saw so deathly a countenance as his. He leaned his head upon his hand. M. d'Arville gave him a goblet of water.

"Drink, Edmond," he said.

The young man mechanically obeyed.

"Now," said M. d'Arville, "I must perform a disagreeable but necessary duty. It is to search the apartments of both of you. Baptiste, I take yours first. Edmond, will you come with us?"

Edmond slowly arose, endeavoring to shake off the faintness that he seemed to feel. We went together. Readily Baptiste allowed us to examine everything in his room. Every box and drawer was thoroughly searched—every nook and corner capable of hiding anything. The money was not to be found there. It was not, then, Baptiste. A look of triumphant innocence set on his brow. M. d'Arville made no comment, but merely led the way in silence to the apartment of Edmond.

Rallying now, for the first time, under the weight of the terrible suspicion resting on him, he with his own hands opened to our view everything there, one after another. But the search did not take long. There was only the box in which he kept his clothes, a small cupboard in the wall, a little desk, in which were a few papers, neatly arranged, and some mementoes, a lock of his mother's hair, a plain, old-fashioned ring, marked with her name, and worn to a mere wire by forty years' wear, and a delicately-finished likeness, executed by himself, and religiously preserved, of a dead sister. The single table had no drawers, and held only books, from which he daily studied, and among which I remarked two or three well-worn ones, of a religious character. His portmanteau, packed the day before, was the last thing to be examined.

It was at the foot of the bed. He knelt down and unlocked it. One article of apparel after another was taken and laid aside, till he came to the bottom. Then—he started as if a serpent had stung him. With a convulsive exclamation he seized the portmanteau and emptied out upon the floor—a bag of gold!

We stood, silence-stricken, gazing on him. He, with a look of agony, bewilderment and despair, remained with his glance fascinated to the terrible object on the floor.

"Mon Dieu!" he murmured, wringing his hands, "my mother!"

Suddenly he turned to M. d'Arville.

"O, monsieur!" he uttered, in accents of impetuous anguish, "can you—will you, believe me—I never—never put it there! I never touched this money before!"

I saw his master's lip tremble. And Charles d'Arville turned away with tears in his eyes.

The door had been left open while this scene was going on. Some servant, in passing, had observed our movements within, and now quite a crowd of domestics had gathered outside. They all seemed to understand that Edmond was a thief; and we could hear them murmuring to one another. Some were evidently by no means sorry; for Edmond, having been the favorite of M. d'Arville, was envied by them. Among them stood Josephine, to whom one or two were whispering maliciously.

"Serves you right, Josette," I heard, quite audibly, "serves you right for jilting Baptiste. Now our master won't think any more of Edmond, and Baptiste will be favorite again."

"Come!" said M. d'Arville, suddenly, in a loud voice, "come, Baptiste, my good fellow! Come, Edmond!" and taking up the bag of gold, he turned to leave the room with me. The servants stood back.

"Now," said he, pausing at the threshold, and addressing the servants, "you see this young man, in whose possession my bag of gold has been found. Josette, what do you say, now?"

Slightly turning away, she tossed her head scornfully, with a withering look at Edmond. She would have nothing to do with the thief. But the next instant, she smiled graciously on Baptiste.

"Away—all of you!" cried M. d'Arville, with sudden sternness.

In consternation, the group scattered to right and left. M. d'Arville looked at us—at Edmond—at Baptiste. Now, his brow had grown black and threatening.

"Follow me!" he uttered, in a terrible tone, like the low muttering of thunder.

What did this sudden change portend? Edmond himself, I saw, was astonished by it. Baptiste started, as he met the frowning glance of his master. In silence we followed, as M. d'Arville led the way back—to the room of his valet. He paused on the threshold, turned to Baptiste, and said, commandingly: "Go in!"

The man looked at him, hesitated, and then slowly entered. M. d'Arville followed us in.

"Now," said he to Baptiste, facing him with a threatening look, and pointing with his hand to one corner of the room, "what is there in yonder corner?"

Baptiste looked, with a wavering glance, in the direction pointed out, glanced at his master again, and turned white as a ghost.

"Speak!" commanded M. d'Arville, with a yet darker frown. "What is it you have there? Go get it!"

"I—I have—nothing there," stammered Baptiste, losing completely his presence of mind, and quailing before the terrible gaze fixed on him.

"It is false. I know you, Baptiste! The play is played out! Do you think I was not watching you last night at twelve o'clock? I saw you! I have watched you all along! The secret visits to my study—the impression of the lock of my chest, taken in wax—the false keys—the ring and money secreted in Edmond's room—villain! you are discovered!"

"O, mercy, mercy, monsieur!" cried Baptiste, falling on his knees, his face blue with terror, his teeth chattering in his head. "Mercy, monsieur! Do not kill me! I will confess! I will make reparation! I will do everything—only have mercy!"

"Go and get me the false keys!" uttered M. d'Arville.

The wretch crawled, a picture of fear and detected guilt, in abject terror, to the farther corner of the room; and then, pressing, with hands trembling so that they could hardly perform their labor, some hidden spring in the floor, discovered a tiny trap door, not a foot square, which flew up, showing a small bunch of keys. These he brought fearfully to his master, cowering back, the while, as if afraid of being struck.

"Now, wretch, confess!" thundered M. d'Arville.

"I will—I do!" stammered the terrified culprit. "Only have mercy, monsieur—have mercy, M. Edmond—good M. Edmond! It was I who stole the ring, and the money, wherever I found it, and put the—the bag in M. Edmond's portmanteau! I was jealous of him! I wished to disgrace him in your eyes, monsieur, and revenge myself upon him for winning Josette from me! It was I who did it all. O, pardon, monsieur, pardon!" And he fell on his knees again, before his master.

"Behold, my dear Edmond!" cried M. d'Arville, turning, with joyful tears, to the young man, "behold, your innocence is proved! What—fainting—nonsense! Ho—water, Louis! The boy is swooning!"

The worst storm has the brightest breaking up. Those few hours of agony and suspense which Edmond endured, preceded the commencement of a lifetime of prosperity, of honor, and of happiness.

It was a terrible thing to be suspected of crime—a terrible burden to Edmond, thinking that his master suspected him.

The conversation which he accidentally overheard between M. d'Arville and myself, that evening in the library, first led him to fear that he was looked upon as the guilty one, for his master had said: "It is a person who is continually about me—who has learned my habits—one in whom I have placed the utmost confidence, of late."

To a person of a timid and sensitive nature such as his, the conviction that he was suspected, and, until lately, a stranger in his master's household, therefore more likely to receive the blame than older and better tried servants, was perfectly natural. But M. d'Arville had never suspected him. It was Baptiste instead, to whom he alluded in his conversation with me. But he has endeavored since to obliterate, by kindness and affection, the memory of the unhappiness which he caused Edmond.

Baptiste was sentenced, not long after, to the galleys, for some deeper crime than the one for which Edmond generously caused him to be forgiven. The coquettish Josette was severely punished for her fickle temper. And Edmond, three years after these events, married his master's daughter.

$1000!!

GRAND PRIZE OFFER.

EACH ONE TO BE PAID IN GOLD DOLLARS.

The unequalled and increasing circulation of our favorite illustrated weekly Journal calls upon the proprietor for a corresponding liberality in his offers to the public, for the new year. He therefore offers as an inducement to postmasters, or any other individual, male or female, to obtain and send to us clubs of subscribers to our paper,

TWELVE PRIZES IN GOLD,

to be faithfully awarded according to the schedule below. These prizes to be divided among the individuals who shall forward us the twelve largest clubs of subscribers for the "Pictorial," between the first of December, 1856, and the first of February, 1857, being a period of about sixty days.

When it is remembered that the agent has to work with, not only the most attractive, but positively

THE CHEAPEST PAPER IN THE WORLD!

It will be realized by every one how easily a large club of subscribers can be procured anywhere.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION

is now in its eleventh volume, volume twelve commencing on the first of January, 1857. It is the only illustrated paper of its class in America, and the plouger of illustrated papers on this side the Atlantic. It is elegantly printed on the finest of satin surfaced paper, containing sixteen super royal pages in each number, with an average of twenty illustrations weekly. These engravings are large and artistic in execution, embracing every current topic of interest, including rural scenery, maritime matters, architecture, noted localities all over this country and Europe, likenesses of eminent characters, male and female, at home and abroad, processions, celebrations, natural history, battles, fortifications, and, in short, every theme of general interest, forming an elegant

ILLUSTRATED RECORD OF THE TIMES.

Besides the illustrations, it contains eight or more super royal pages of original sketches of adventure, tales, poems, biographies, and choice miscellaneous reading, humorous sketches, a careful record of events (no advertisements will be admitted), altogether forming a delightful weekly visitor to the home circle, and making two elegant volumes each year for binding, of 416 pages, with about one thousand splendid engravings.

PRESENT CIRCULATION, 163,000 COPIES WEEKLY!

THE PRIZES.

To the person who sends us the first largest club we will present in gold..... $300 00
To the person who sends us the second largest club we will present in gold..... 200 00
To the person who sends us the third largest club we will present in gold..... 100 00
To the person who sends us the fourth largest club we will present in gold..... 50 00
To the person who sends us the fifth largest club we will present in gold..... 50 00
To the person who sends us the sixth largest club we will present in gold..... 70 00
To the person who sends us the seventh largest club we will present in gold..... 60 00
To the person who sends us the eighth largest club we will present in gold..... 40 00
To the person who sends us the ninth largest club we will present in gold..... 30 00
To the person who sends us the tenth largest club we will present in gold..... 20 00
To the person who sends us the eleventh largest club we will present in gold..... 15 00
To the person who sends us the twelfth largest club we will present in gold..... 10 00
These prizes will be paid in gold dollars, that there may be no question as to their value.

No person will be considered a competitor for the prizes who does not send us at least fifty subscribers.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $3 00
4 subscribers, "..... 10 00
10 "..... 20 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis. Thus every thirty-sixth copy is given profit to the getter-up of the club, except to those persons winning the first three prizes.

Any person sending us fifty subscribers, shall receive the eight volumes complete of our "Pictorial," elegantly and uniformly bound in gilt, with illustrated title-pages and indexes, containing nearly ten thousand fine illustrations.

It is very important that the names, accompanied by the money, should be sent to us as fast as they are obtained, that we may be able to print an ample number of papers to meet the demand. Therefore, as soon as ten or a dozen subscribers have been obtained, the person who has procured the club can forward them with the money, and he or she can then add to the club any number of names at the same rate, and they will be duly credited to the account of the person sending, until February 1, 1857.

It is not requisite that the entire club should be taken in one town; we will send the papers to any neighboring post-office, but all subscriptions must come through the same agent, in order to be counted to his or her credit. This prize offer cannot be applied to any regular wholesale agent of our paper. The clubs must be bona fide, and each name sent with the money.

The result will be duly published, and evidence of the receipt of each prize, by the successful parties, will be given.

Sample copies of the paper furnished gratis when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.
Ballou's Pictorial and The Flag of our Union are sent to one address for $4 per annum.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address, at the lowest club rate.

POCAHONTAS SAVING THE LIFE OF CAPTAIN SMITH

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AUTUMN RHYME.

BY WILLIAM L. SHOEMAKER.

O, the autumn-time—the autumn-time!
The clouds grow dark and drear;
And the wailing winds sing a mournful rhyme
For the waning of the year:
Their voices sound like prophecies
Of desolation near;
And the last few leaves on the wild-wood bough
Are fluttering pale and sore.

O, the autumn time is a mournful time,
And it brings sad thoughts to me,
As I muse of the Summer's golden prime,
And her warmth, and light, and glee!

O, the autumn-time—the autumn-time!
Its tender grace is o'er;
And the streamlets murmur a mournful rhyme
To the sedges along the shore;
And the splendor has gone from the bosky hills,
That late, like a crown, they wore;
And the lingering flowers, as fast they fade,
Seem whispering low—"No more!"

O, the autumn-time is a sombre time,
And it brings sad thoughts to me,
As I muse of the Summer's golden prime,
And her flowery pageantry!

O, the autumn-time—the autumn time!
There is sadness everywhere;
And the crickets gray trill a mournful rhyme
In the meadows brown and bare;
And the ominous caw of the ebony crow
Shrills through the misty air;
But the tuneful choir have left their nests
For a clime more bright and fair.

O, the autumn-time is a tuneless time,
And it brings sad thoughts to me,
As I muse of the Summer's golden prime,
And her wood-notes wild and free!

O, the autumn-time—the autumn-time!
Its solemn sway I own,
As I listen in turn to each mournful rhyme,
And think of the beauty flown,
And over the grave of delight how soon
The pall of the past is thrown;
And a gradual gloom o'er my soul is spread,
As I walk through the woodlands lone.

O, the autumn-time is a faded time,
And it brings sad thoughts to me,
As I muse of the Summer's golden prime,
And her joys so swift to flee!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"THY WILL BE DONE."

A NEW YEAR'S TALE.

BY FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

ARTHUR GLADFORD walked home through the snowy streets of Boston upon New Year's eve, with his accustomed firm and manly step. His tall figure was protected from the driving storm by a rich cloak trimmed with fur, and his entire dress betokened a man whose circumstances were easy, if not affluent. The thinly-clad beggar, who had known better times, glanced at him with an eye of envy, and bitterly contrasted his position with his own. But could the wayfarer's eye have pierced that calm and polished exterior, and read the story of the heart within, he would have shrunk appalled from the revelation. Or, could the eye of an intimate friend have looked steadfastly upon Gladford's face, as he moved onward against sleet and snow, he would have seen traces of suffering that belied the firm expression of the lips, and the studied calmness of the deep lustrous eyes.

Gladford turned from Washington into Winter Street, traversed the bleak Common, that lay in its fresh winding-sheet of snow, and hastened his pace as he approached his palatial house in Beacon Street, the elegance and taste of whose exterior were but an indication of the comforts and luxuries within. The glimmer of gas and the glow of coal fires blazed out through the richly-draped windows on the snow. A pass-key admitted the owner of the mansion, and, hanging up his outer garments in the hall, he passed into the spacious drawing-room. His footsteps made no sound as he moved mechanically to the fireplace, and sank into a luxurious chair. He glanced uneasily about him; taking in every familiar object, the pictures, the statuettes, the books, the piano, the embroidered footstools, the rich drapery. But these make not home. The merchant missed objects near and dear to him—the wife of his bosom, the child of his affections—his joy, his support and blessing in his early struggles; the sharers of his prosperity, the angels of his house. They were gone from him; and now, when fortune had smiled upon his efforts, when his talents and probity had been crowned with complete commercial success, when unbroken health promised him many years of existence, he sat at his hearthstone alone.

Alone! how the word and the thought echoed through the chambers of his heart. Alone! no light foot to spring to his coming; no light arm to wind about his waist; no musical voice to breathe words of welcome in his ear; no bright smile to shame the firelight in its innocent glance. Alone!

Arthur Gladford had recently received the saddest news that a father and husband could hear. A ship of his—the Gloriana, richly freighted with silks and wines, and bound from Havre to Boston—had perished in a tornado on the broad Atlantic. She had been seen to go down—and a boat containing the crew and passengers had also perished. Vainly had the vessel which brought the news cruised about the scene of the disaster. Among the victims of that fearful catastrophe were Gladford's wife and daughter. He had himself accompanied the former to Europe, and they were to bring back their only child, a daughter, whose education had been completed abroad. But Gladford was suddenly summoned home on business before the ladies were ready to return, and he had left them in charge of his captain. He was momentarily looking for the arrival of the Gloriana when the news of her loss reached him.

To say that he was not for a season stunned by the blow, would be to make him out more than mortal. But he had early learned to look beyond the shifting lights and shadows, storms and sunshines of this world, to that bright, unclouded sphere, where the weary are at rest, and trouble never cometh. And in the hour of his sore trial and his heavy affliction, his faith forsook him not, and he could say, "The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away—blessed be the name of the Lord!"

And now—as the blithe New Year approached, as joy-bells rang upon the air, as smiling faces greeted him in his daily path, as misery, too, stalked abroad under its constant cloud, he forgot not his sympathy both with the joyous and the afflicted. His munificence flowed forth in his accustomed charities—the houses of the poor and the invalid were gladdened by his presence and his bounty—his domestics were made happy—he intermitted not one of his daily duties. Then the careless and unthinking said that, after all, his sensibilities were not so delicate as they had given him credit for possessing; his mind was too much taken up with business to leave room for sorrow—he would marry again before long. And the house in Beacon Street would be as gay as ever before the season closed. Alas! they measured the mourner by their own narrow standard.

It was late when Gladford retired to his lonely chamber. There were many little objects there that revived his sorrows—embroidery and pictures, the handiwork of his wife and daughter, books they had read, flowers they had tended. But he knelt down in prayer, and found consolation and relief in communion with the Ruler of the universe; and it was from his very heart that he uttered the fervent exclamation: "Not my will, but thine, be done!"

The next morning, just as he had finished dressing, he was told that a person was below waiting to see him. He followed the servant into the breakfast room, and found a roughly clad, seafaring man waiting to speak with him. The merchant and his visitor were left alone.

The sailor, sitting uneasily on the edge of the ottoman, and twisting his tarpaulin hat in his hand, seemed rather at a loss for words:

"Mr. Gladford," said he, "I don't know as you remember me, but my name's Braxton—Captain Braxton, of the brig Dart."

"I remember your countenance, now," said Gladford. There was a pause.

"A good deal of rough weather, lately, Mr. Gladford."

Gladford shook his head mournfully.

"Have you arrived lately, captain?"

"Just in, sir. I suppose I don't bring you news of the loss of the Gloriana?"

"Alas!—no, sir."

"No tidings of the boat that left the ship?"

"None," said Gladford.

"Have you given her up?"

"Entirely."

"Well," said Captain Braxton, uneasily, "I don't think I should if I were in your case. She may have lived—may have—"

There was something in the expression of the honest man's face which awakened agitation in the merchant's breast.

"You—you—" he stammered—"have something to communicate, I'm sure—some bodies have been found—"

"Mr. Gladford," said the captain, taking his hand, "they tell me you have borne trouble like a hero."

"I—I have endeavored to be firm," said the merchant, the tears forcing their way from his eyes as he spoke; "but sorrow like mine is hard to bear."

"They say that sudden joy is harder."

"Joy!"

"Yes; good news," said the sailor, now as much agitated as the merchant himself.

"One moment," said Gladford. And he buried his face in his hands, and prayed for a moment—prayed that he might have fortitude to bear whatever was in store for him.

"Now, then," Captain Braxton, said he, "if there is a ray of hope—as your words lead me to imagine—speak! Tell me what it is! I can bear it—it will not kill me!"

"Then, sir," said the sailor, taking his hand, "let me wish you a Happy New Year! Your wife and child are saved! I had the happiness of saving the boat's crew of the Gloriana. Your wife and daughter will soon be here—they are here already! Look!"

The door was thrown open. A noble-looking woman and a beautiful girl rushed forward, and were clasped in a speechless agony of joy to the manly heart that had been so severely tried, and so gloriously rewarded for its truth and strength.

The scene was too much for Captain Braxton, and he rushed out of the room, bringing up at the head of the staircase, to "swab out his lee scuppers," as he said. But he was brought back by Gladford, who overwhelmed him with demonstrations of gratitude. He was only permitted to leave the house on condition of returning to dinner, which he did, and was witness of a joy that angels might almost envy. Such is our simple record of a New Year's Day.

There is a wider division of men than that into Christian and Pagan; before we ask what a man worships, we have to ask whether he worships at all.

ORIGIN OF THE WORD "CANARD."

The origin of the word "canard," when employed to signify some unfounded story, is not generally known. The following are the terms in which M. Quetelet relates, in the "Annuaire de l'Académie" (article on Norbert Cornelissen), the manner in which the word became used in its new sense:—"To give a sly hit at the ridiculous pieces of intelligence which the journals were in the habit of publishing every morning, Cornelissen stated that an interesting experiment had just been made, calculated to prove the extraordinary voracity of ducks. Twenty of these animals had been placed together, and one of them having been killed and cut into the smallest possible pieces, feathers and all, and thrown to the other nineteen, was most gluttonously gobbled up in an exceedingly brief space of time. Another was then taken from the nineteen, and being chopped small like its predecessor, was served to the eighteen, and at once devoured like the other; and so on to the last, who was thus placed in the position of having eaten his nineteen companions in a wonderfully short time. All this, pleasantly narrated, obtained a success which the writer was far from anticipating, for the story ran the round of all the journals of Europe. It then became almost forgotten for about a score of years, when it came back from America with amplifications which it did not boast of at the commencement, and with a regular certificate of the autopsy of the surviving animal, whose esophagus was declared to have been seriously injured. Every one laughed at the history of the 'canard' thus brought up again, but the word remained in its novel signification."

POWER OF THE MUSCLES.

The muscular strength of the human body is indeed wonderful. A Turkish porter will trot at a rapid pace and carry a weight of six hundred pounds. Milo, a celebrated athlete of Crotona, in Italy, accustomed himself to carry the greatest burdens, and, by degrees, became a monster in strength. It is said he carried on his shoulders an ox four years old, weighing upwards of one thousand pounds, and killed him with one blow of his fist. He was seven times crowned at the Pythian games, and six at the Olympic. He presented himself the seventh time, but no one had the courage to enter the list against him. He was a Pythagorean, and to his uncommon strength that learned preceptor and his pupils owed their lives. The pillar which supported the roof of the house suddenly gave way, but Milo supported the roof of the building, and gave the philosopher time to escape. In old age, he attempted to pull up a tree by its roots and break it. He partially effected it; but his strength being gradually exhausted, the tree, where cleft, reunited, and left his hand pinched in the body of it. He was then alone; and, unable to disengage himself, died in that position. —Musical World.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

CORNELL'S HIGH SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY AND ATLAS. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857.

We have examined with much care these works, issued in the Appletons' best style of publication, and can cordially commend them to teachers and heads of families. The Geography is admirably arranged, perfectly reliable in its details, and liberally illustrated by fine engravings. The maps in the Atlas are beautifully engraved and colored. For sale by Redding & Co.

LAKE NGAMI: or, Explorations and Discoveries during a Four Years' Wandering in the Wilds of Southern Africa. By CHARLES JOHN ANDERSON. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 511.

Interesting as a romance, well-written, crowded with startling incident, and full of beautiful engravings, this work is sure to go like wildfire. For sale by Redding & Co.

STORIES OF AN OLD MAID. RELATED TO HER NEPHEWS AND NIECES. Translated from the French of Emile de Girardin. By ALFRED ELIAS. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1856. 18mo. pp. 249.

Very pleasant stories for young people are all of these pretty tales. The illustrative wood cuts are well executed, and the volume makes an admirable gift-book. For sale by Redding & Co.

MILLE FELICIA. Selected from Notes and Queries. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857. 12mo.

A "thousand sweets!" The book is rightly named. It is full of charming curiosities, and may be taken up or laid aside whenever the whim suits, for it treats on a myriad of interesting topics. A charming fireside companion. For sale by Redding & Co.

WOMAN AND FISHING. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. This clever book, which we have already noticed favorably, is for sale by Sanborn, Carter & Bazin.

ROME, CHRISTIAN AND PAPAL. By S. D. SANCTUS. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 261.

This illustrated work is written by a convert to Protestantism, and of course gives a Protestant view of matters and things in the Eternal City. It is written in the form of letters; it is elegantly printed. For sale by Redding & Co.

BEAUMARCHAIS AND HIS TIMES. Translated by HENRY S. EDWARDS, from the French of Louis de Comencio. New York: Harper & Brothers. 12mo. pp. 499.

A brilliant picture of French society in the 18th century—a world in itself. Beaumarchais was one of the most brilliant adventurers of the age, and played his part with singular tact. He was a man of brilliant talent, and contributed largely to the revolution which convulsed Europe at the close of the last century. This is one of the most readable books we have met with for a long time. For sale by Redding & Co.

FAKA. An Army Memoir. By MAJOR MARCH, author of "Shoepac Recollections." Boston: James French & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 538.

To those familiar with "Shoepac Recollections," we need hardly say that this is a readable, lively book; for Major March has already won an enviable and reliable name. "Faka" is a very pleasant story, opening well, progressing well, and ending well. American military life has never before been portrayed in novel form, we believe; and there is a freshness and vigor in these pictures of it which are quite charming. The book is sure to make a powerful and lasting impression.

MONROE WRITES. A Narration of Facts stranger than Fiction. New York: Durby & Jackson. 1856. 12mo. pp. 313.

The title of this story sufficiently indicates its character. The peculiar features of Mormonism are herein delineated by a vigorous pen. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

ONE DOLLAR.
WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 69,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, or below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WE MEET NO MORE.

BY ELLEN ALICE MORIARTY.

We meet no more. Yet how can I
The language of those eyes forget?
And time has passed. Thy tender sigh
In memory thrills my being yet;
And oft amid the throng I start,
Some gentle voice recalls thy own—
Alas! from my regretful heart
The blessing of sweet peace has flown!

I dreamed of thee last night—ah me!
That dreams and hopes are all in vain—
I cannot bear to dream of thee,
Since waking brings such bitter pain.
Knew the sad bliss that others find
In dwelling o'er the happy past,
Can ne'er be mine; my heart resigned
All joy when it beheld thee last.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE BLIND GIRL.

BY HERBERT LINTON.

In 1840, I started in life as a physician. I had received collegiate honors that were, to say the least, respectable. My partial friends called them a little more than that. As a medical student, I had acquitted myself to the satisfaction of the professors, and I was armed with recommendations and certificates enough to have made the fortune of a dozen schoolmasters.

The only really skilful physician in the town of Danforth having removed to a better locality, and the remaining two being, one a botanic physician, and the other somewhat irregularly trained to the profession, I was advised to enter on this field of practice immediately, without waiting for one more promising. I hired an office in one of the principal streets—for there were actually two—and looking up a pleasant boarding-house, I spread out my hooks to make as much show as possible, and sat down to await the coming practice. As there was no dentist in town, I had the pleasure of removing a number of ponderous teeth from the jaws of several of the inhabitants, and a few, of a smaller kind, from some little children. This was small practice; but I pocketed the quarters from time to time, and comforted myself that "many drops make a shower."

I succeeded in obtaining board in the same building with my office, which, in fact, was a parlor of the house, and belonged to my landlord, who was a silversmith, and had converted his other front room into a shop for himself. Both rooms were pleasantly shaded by two large maples; and a fine garden, which extended on each side of the house to a back street, added to its attractions, and made it the pleasantest location in town.

My expectations were not, in the end, disappointed. An epidemic prevailing among children, in the first case of which I was successful, brought me into notice; and for a few weeks I was on the continual move night and day. I did not have time even for my meals, and my landlady was ever expressing the greatest anxiety for my own health.

This epidemic decided my success. I was ever after, the doctor par excellence. The other two were left to hide their diminished heads before the superior skill of Doctor Alexander Westman. I could now repose upon my laurels. I had cured the minister's baby, Squire Lowe's only child, a girl of five years, and a special favorite with everybody, Deacon Farmer's little boy, and the son also of a rich widow, who lived just at the edge of the town, kept her carriage, and was exceedingly popular in Danforth. My fortune was made—and made, too, without the claptrap of riding at full speed through the street, or causing myself to be called hastily out of church. If half the professional compliments which Mrs. Blanchard, my landlady, retailed to me were just as she told them to me, I was a famous man.

Mr. Blanchard's family consisted of himself and wife, two sons and three daughters. The latter were pretty, accomplished girls, yet not above taking their part in domestic concerns, under the direction of their active and industrious mother. As I grew more acquainted with the Danforthites, I received many hints that they would be just the wives for professional gentlemen, and that doctors were much more likely to be successful when they were married. I invariably expressed the profoundest regret for the young ladies in question, but added that I could not take the three, and feared to offend two of them by a preference of one.

My relations with these amiable girls were of the most pleasant and satisfactory nature. They showed me every kindness, and treated me with such openness and frankness, as to disarm all suspicion of any scheme to entrap me into matrimony had I been ever so vain and presumptuous. We evidently had no designs upon each other, and the fact rendered our intercourse perfectly easy.

I had seen enough, too, of young physicians embarrassing themselves with family cures before their practice was established—drawing wife and children, too, perhaps, into situations of distress and difficulty, which were hard for the helpless ones to bear, and harder still for man to look upon and not be able to relieve. I wished to be free to stand or fall by myself, without running the risk of dragging others down with me, if it should be my lot to fall.

Perhaps, if I had happened to love any woman devotedly, I might have adopted some fine-spun theory of the necessity of a physician becoming a married man, but my time was not yet come. Women there were, plenty of them, too—for, in my profession, one sees a great deal of the angels—women who pleased me as companions, and many, too, whom I recognized as congenial spirits—sisters, as man should ever recognize them; but as yet they had found entrance only to the outer vestibule of my heart. The inner sanctum had not yet been invaded. I could afford to wait, too, while my selfishness was so nourished by Mary Blanchard and her sisters. I did not need a wife while Mary attended to my wardrobe, and Emily worked my slippers, and Jane made my dressing gowns, and prepared my bandages for broken bones, and received my messages when absent; and when all three knew exactly where I was gone, and how long before I should be in, and the thousand and one fussy little matters of a physician's life.

I had been there some weeks before I knew there was yet another member of the family whom I had not seen. I had heard Mary, it is true, talking with her sister-in-law, Mrs. Jane Blanchard, about a certain delicate dress pattern of light, flowered cloth, or something of that sort, which she said would be so becoming to Florence. I had seen Emily boxing up a splendid lounge to send away by express, which she said was for Florence; and I had some curiosity to see this friend of theirs, as I supposed her, who was to be the receiver of all delicate and odorous gifts. Mary enlightened me. She was their youngest sister, this Florence; but had been away from home many years, only returning at midsummer. I wondered—but seeing Mary's eyes moisten, I did not like to ask any questions. I learned gradually, however, that Florence was blind!—that she was at an eminent establishment for people of her class, and that she was coming home in a few weeks. I thought a good deal about the absent Florence, as her situation interested my medical experience. Already I had two cases of partial blindness under my care, which I feared would become total, and my latest studies had been much occupied with this disease.

I was much from home after this, having all at once an accession of practice. I returned home one evening to late tea, and found only the servant girl to wait on my table. Mary had always specially attended me. The dining-room was just under the parlor, and the doors and windows were all open. As I raised my cup of tea to my thirsty lips, I heard a voice, the sweetness of which I shall never hear excelled, save by the angel choir above; and it was singing a low, sad, melancholy air, that pierced my very heart. I sat back in my chair, and listened with "lips apart" to that soul-enchanting melody, until it seemed as if all meaner sensations had passed away from me.

"It is Miss Florence," said the girl, who was treading round the table on tiptoe, as if she, too, feared to break the sound.

I did not want her to tell me that. I preferred to keep the illusion that it was no mortal voice a little longer. It ceased—but my hunger and thirst were gone, and I rose from the table uncertain whether I ought to invade the drawing-room until the first hours of intercourse with the new comer were over. Mary solved the difficulty, by rushing down stairs to see if I had come home.

"Tea over, doctor, and no one to wait on you! Too bad! But come up and see Florence."

In a low rocking-chair sat a child, as I then thought, about ten or twelve years old. Her soft, curling hair hung down far over her dress of white muslin, and the beautiful arms and neck were bare. She was leaning her arm upon her mother's knee, while Emily and Jane knelt by her side, apparently just as they had done when she was singing. Mary led me to her, and said simply, "Florence, this is our friend, Doctor Westman." She put out her hand, and the blue eyes were turned towards my face just as if she could see me. The light shone upon them. They were perfect in form and color, and shaded by long dark lashes. Sitting there in repose, no one would have thought that there was no vision in those full, beautiful orbs. After a while she sang to me again, by Mary's request. This time the music of her voice was not so mournful to my ear, but it was sweet and powerful.

A few days brought me into intimate relations with the fair blind girl. She learned to distinguish when I was in the room, when she entered it, and the sound of my step at the door. She made various ornaments for my table, and took an interest in me, because she felt how much her sisters contributed to my comfort.

After her return I became an intense student. Every work that treated of the eye and its diseases I could lay hold on, was eagerly devoured; and the particular species of blindness to which she was a victim, commanded the most intense thought. I made communications of her case to the best oculists that I had heard of, stating the time she was taken blind—ten years of age—and every circumstance of her situation, health, intelligence, and so forth. Some of the answers were favorable to an operation, some doubtful, and one or two positively adverse.

I did all this privately, not daring to raise hopes in the family which, it was more than probable, would be crushed. Conversing with her father, I found that nothing had ever been done for her, except a few simple washes by my predecessor—that he had declared the case incurable, and advised her being sent to an institution where she could learn the various employments and amusements of the blind, and where she would be less conscious of her calamity than at home. Good advice from Dr. Croft, provided she was incurable, which I doubted!

I let the midsummer pass away, feeling that it was better for the weather to subside into cold before anything was done; and meantime I took charge, with her mother's permission, of her diet, exercise and entire manner of living. The family was pleased with my interest in her case, and prolonged her stay at home, that she might continue under my care.

A regular course of salt water bathing, a walk in the open air every day, and frequent drives, strengthened her system; and I fancied, too, that the atmosphere of sound, healthy people was more favorable to her, such as she found at home, than that of the sickly inmates of the institution. At all events, she grew stronger and larger, and the rose-leaf color assumed a deeper tint upon her cheek. I bestowed so much care on her, that I really began to feel that she belonged to me; and it was amusing to see how she returned it. She watched every change in the weather—for her sensations were very acute in that respect—and never allowed me to go out without ascertaining if I was well clothed to meet it.

I thought so much of her restoration to sight, that I made myself positively unhappy when any answer came to my inquiries at all discouraging. I wrote now to a fellow-student of my own, who was in Paris prosecuting this very branch of our profession, and awaited his answer with great impatience. Two steamers arrived, and no answer from my friend Arthur. The third brought me a letter, which I hardly dared open, so great was my anxiety. I broke the seal, and read as follows:

"The case you mention is an interesting one, and I have great hopes that something may be done. What if I ask you to wait my return, which will be in February! I have performed two operations in cases which I believe to be nearly similar to your friend's. By the way, you speak in more than professional interest of your patient. I should like to give you the pleasure of witnessing my skill."

I knew if there was one man in the world who would lend his whole soul to such a case, it would be Arthur St. John, and I now talked with Mr. and Mrs. Blanchard about the matter. They proffered a great deal of confidence in my judgment, but did not dare to hope, and begged me not to speak of it to Florence at present.

Part of the winter passed away in sweet and intimate communion with this unfortunate but highly gifted creature. A perfect child of song, and with a talent for conversation which I never knew surpassed, drawing, as she did, all her images, either from the memories of early childhood, or from her own heart, and not from the outward that was passing around her. You will learn, reader, that the blind girl was now the dearest object to me on earth, and can judge, perhaps, something of my intense anxiety on her account.

The February steamer was delayed. It seemed ages to my expectant thoughts, and when at length its arrival was announced, I thought that Arthur was unnecessarily long in coming. He came at last, and I introduced him to the family. He watched every movement of Florence, and after a day or two, they became great friends, without her suspecting that he was thinking of her eyes. In a careless way, he asked her to let him examine them. I watched his face, and saw it brighten up as he looked carefully, and even hurt her by his continued pressure. A look of intense satisfaction passed between us. We prepared now to acquaint her with what we desired to do; and she gave her consent very sweetly, but apparently without any hope.

We thought it best to perform the operation without witnesses—only that Mary, whose strength of mind and nerve was very great, might be present, in order to give us what assistance we needed. The house was to be very still, and we were to occupy the back attic, where no sound could be heard from the street, and where a strong light was obtained from above. Not a word was spoken, except to ask for necessary assistance. Our sweet patient lay back upon pillows, with her hands crossed on her lap. She had promised not to struggle, if we would not confine them.

It was a moment of intense expectation. Arthur was firm of eye and limb. His steady hand held the instrument without the slightest wavering, and in a few minutes, but which seemed hours, the deed was done. She had seen his face! A bandage was applied, and she was carried in my arms to the chamber below, and laid in bed. Perfect stillness and repose was prescribed for her, and she obeyed it to the letter, only speaking in whispers. At length Arthur permitted the bandage to be thinned, and at last withdrawn altogether, and he gratified me by allowing me to withdraw it. It was a moment of intense excitement to me, but she calmly opened her eyes upon my face, and whispered my name; and then closed them again, as if her joy was too great to be real, and as if she wished to go back into darkness again to realize it all.

If life seemed to hold a new and divine prospect to the blind girl after her long sitting in darkness, it was no less so to me—to me who had long ago told her how very dear she was to my heart, and had received her assurance, that if she ever obtained her sight, she would be my wife. Nothing I could say would induce her to strike out this proviso.

"I will never be a burden on you," she would say. "If I am never to recover, I shall feel that God himself places a bar between me and you that must not be passed; and that it is His pleasure that I shall be solitary." Sweet girl!—while I loved her better for this delicacy, I was only more eager to overcome her scruples.

In a few weeks she was well enough to visit my office, her father's workshop, and to take long walks and rides with me. Her eyes were perfectly restored. O, the happiness which such a restoration brings! Who can tell! I cannot describe the joy of the parents, nor the intense satisfaction of the brothers and sisters, nor the still intenser gratification of Arthur St. John, at his share in the general happiness. I think he confides it all to Mary—for they hold long private conversations together, which, doubtless, are entirely upon the treatment of the eye. Both seem pleased at the result of these studies, if one can judge by the animation of their countenances when accidentally discovered in their speculation.

Florence is the "doctor's wife." In her new relation, she is interested for all the sick and suffering everywhere; and to those whose privation is similar to her own, she feels the tenderest sympathy. I have not yet withdrawn her from the pleasant atmosphere of her father's house, because I fear that in my absence, and unwatched by mother and sisterly eyes, she might be tempted to strain the precious orbs which are alike my pride and my care.

And Arthur St. John is reaping abundant laurels in his profession. He is going to Europe next month, and I shall not be surprised if Mary accompanies him. It is not his purpose to settle down anywhere at present; and our active, efficient and gentle Mary will be just the right one to take care of the wanderer.

MAJOR BEN: PERLEY POORE.

We present on this page an admirable likeness of our friend and correspondent, Major Ben: Perley Poore, drawn expressly for the Pictorial, by Barry, from an ambrotype by Cutting & Turner, of this city. We fancy that Shakspeare must have had a prophetic glimmering of the future major, when he wrote, "Each man in his day plays many parts." It is true that we all pass through many marked stages; but to very few of us is accorded the ability to do well so many things as the subject of our sketch, though a young man, has already accomplished. Born in Newburyport, Mass., where he now resides, in November, 1820, we find that, at the age of fourteen, he had gratified an ardent desire to see the world, by visiting nearly all the principal cities of Europe. Though his home was an attractive one, still his wandering propensities were stronger than his love for the paternal fireside; and probably anticipating a veto on his plans of travel, which he would have reluctantly obeyed, he started again on his wanderings without leave or license. In the course of his rambles, he was received into the office of Messrs. Myrick & Bartlett, of Worcester, as a printer's apprentice, and there learned the mysteries of that craft, whose history, in one of his addresses, he has delineated with such ability and warmth. When editing the Boston Bee, Mr. Poore, in speaking of the printer's craft, said:—"We entered a printing-office a spoiled 'eldest son,' who had devoted more attention to Shetland ponies, and a juvenile infantry company, than to his books; and at the end of our apprenticeship could write almost as well as we can now. This is not saying much, perhaps; but we will show our 'copy' for plainness and correctness, with any professional writer in the country. It used to be rather hard work to wash rollers and bring wood, but we had a pretty good time after all. A warm piece of gingerbread—the regular donation of the subscribers at a baker's shop, when their paper was handed into them early in the morning—had far more relish, than the sumptuous banquets tasted at royal entertainments within five years afterwards. The heart of the ill-clad newspaper-carrier was lighter and merrier, than when it was afterwards encased in an old embroidered diplomatic coat." Finally, after a period of severe, but not unprofitable discipline, young Poore returned to his father's house. At the age of seventeen, he was established by his father as editor and proprietor of a paper. In the year 1840, being then just twenty-one, we find him an attache of the United States embassy at Belgium. One of his early adventures was a journey on foot to Venice—not in a direct line, but with deviations to embrace interesting places in Switzerland, Lombardy and the Tyrol. Very likely this early training gave him that confidence in his powers of endurance, which caused him to undertake recently the feat of wheeling a barrel of apples from Newbury to Boston, in fulfillment of a sportive political bet—a feat which he accomplished with ease and credit. This little incident is a sample of the true Anglo-Saxon pluck which the major manifests in all his undertakings. Soon after returning from his pedestrian tour, Major Poore took up his residence in Paris, and was appointed agent of the Massachusetts Historical Society, to describe the documents in the marine and colonial departments relating to the history of our State. In 1845, in pursuance of the resolve of our legislature, he was appointed by the governor his-torial agent of Massachusetts for the same purpose. His labors make ten large folio volumes of MSS., and two of maps. Their style of execution is admirable. The able manner in which he performed his task, caused a recommendation from the committee of the legislature to double his compensation. Before returning home, he travelled extensively in Greece, Asia Minor, Palestine, Egypt and Europe; and, during a portion of his time, corresponded with the Atlas, of this city, embodying in his spirited letters the fruits of his excursions. Among his own tangible records of travel, is a splendid collection of autographs. Since his return to America, he has performed a great amount of labor—was, for a time, editor of the Boston Bee, has written books, among others, a popular life of Louis Philippe, has been a large contributor to periodicals and journals, has lectured, raised a rifle battalion, which he commands, is a member of the State Board of Agriculture, and, above all, is a practical farmer on a very large scale, as is evinced by the splendid condition of "Indian Hill," at West Newbury.

MAJOR BEN: PERLEY POORE.

MERCANTILE WHARF BUILDINGS.

The success of the Hon. Josiah Quincy in his speculation with the City Wharf property, induced other parties owning similar dock rights to enter the field also. The Mercantile Wharf Corporation, which, it will be remembered, bounded upon the east side of Commercial Street from City Wharf to Commercial Wharf, has within the last two years laid out and disposed of seven large valuable lots upon the site of a portion of its dock property. These lots are surrounded by four important streets, viz., Commercial, Clinton, Richmond, and a new marginal, or water street, parallel with, and 102 feet east of, Commercial Street. Upon these lots has been erected a block of granite warehouses, having its four façades bounding on the four thoroughfares abovenamed. This building is 456 feet in length, 100 feet in depth, and six stories or 70 feet in height. Its frontage upon the four streets which surround it, is one thousand feet, and the whole exterior from basement to cornice is granite. It is divided from front to rear into stories of 13, 12, 11, 10 and 9 feet each, and the total cost, not including the land, has been four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. We give our readers a view of this leviathan structure, taken from the corner of Clinton and Commercial Streets, and drawn expressly for us by Mr. Champney. In its massive and far-reaching façades, there is a simplicity which should especially mark buildings of this class, and yet there is a vigorous boldness produced by the pier and pier block construction of the first story, the irregular ashlar of the stories above, the sill-bands, chamfered window jambs and projecting console cornice. The great excellence of this work is a true fitness or expression of purpose, and a pleasing effect—a building which, at a glance, is regarded as an exponent of commercial wealth, without the least useless expenditure or architectural whim, and one that does credit to its architect, G. J. F. Bryant, of this city, who has designed and built a large number of our buildings, and has fairly earned an enviable reputation by his skill and taste. It is probable that, as Commercial Street is built up, a similar style of building will be adopted for the future blocks that may be erected. In the commercial parts of a city, such uniformity is a desirable feature. As a general thing, the irregularity of our city architecture is a noticeable point—and is a thing which particularly strikes strangers.

But while some unhappy contrasts are the result of a diversity of tastes, and of means in real estate owners, a sort of picturesqueness is produced which is by no means displeasing. In architecture, as in painting, contrasts are sometimes as effective as harmonies; and as the force of a color is brought out by apposition with its direct antipodes in the chromatic scale, so certain styles of building are the more striking from being placed in juxtaposition with a totally dissimilar style. We have read that travellers soon grow weary even of St. Petersburg, whose continuous magnificence and stuteliness are monotonous, while Moscow, from its very irregularity, is far more interesting, both to strangers and residents. Mr. Delane, of the London Times, was reminded by the variety of our architecture of the towns and cities of England; where the same spirit of Saxon independence produces a variety of building, each man going, as we say, "on his own hook." In England, as in America, there is no Louis Napoleon to plan out streets, tear down buildings, and order new ones at his will.

MERCANTILE WHARF BUILDINGS, BOSTON.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATHEW M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. BURBAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- M. C. R.—A dissolution of partnership, in order to be legal, must be regularly advertised a number of times in the daily papers.
- L. D.—There is a book relating entirely to the subject, which may be had by addressing Phillips, Sampson & Co., of this city.
- H. P.—Helioid died at the age of 33, in 1837.
- T. W. R.—The Marcelline Hymn was not composed at Marcellus, but at Rurzburg. It derived its name because it was introduced into Paris by a body of Marcelline troops.
- R. H.—You are right. Captain McClure, of the British R. N., actually discovered the Northwest Passage in 1850, if we remember lightly.
- BOOKWORM.—The official returns of the Imperial (formerly Royal) Library, of Paris, in 1850, accounted for 501,000 volumes and 80,000 MSS. It was commenced in the 14th century, by King John, with ten volumes.
- EMMA V.—The property of the fabulous river Lethe, or Stream of Oblivion, was to cause those who drank of it, to forget their whole former existence.
- J. O. S.—The lines:
" 'Tis not in mortals to command success—
But we'll do more, Seneca, we'll deserve it," occur in Addison's tragedy of Cato.
- S. J.—If the husband die without making a will, the wife is entitled to one half of his personal property, if there be no children; and to one third, if there be.
- MAINE.—The word letter-of-morque, for the commission granted to a privateer, is derived from mark, the German for frontier—as being the right to capture property beyond the limit or boundary of another state.
- W. H. S.—No harpsichords are manufactured now. Harps have entirely superseded them.
- SPIRITUALISM.—A belief in apes has certainly been entertained by many ancient men—but has chiefly prevailed in times of ignorance and superstition.
- C. O.—Lieut. Maury has declined the Knighthood of the Order of Danneberg offered him by the king of Denmark. It is a very ancient order—founded in 1219, revived in 1838, and reconstituted in 1868.
- C. C.—You are not far wrong in your calculation. Some years ago it was estimated that the milk-lake of the people of London and its vicinity amounted to four millions of dollars annually.
- LAYMAN.—The first appointment of deacons is mentioned in the sixth chapter of Acts.
- SENATOR.—We agree with the principle you have laid down. The question never ought to be, whether any proposed measure or regulation has a tendency to benefit agriculturists, manufacturers, or merchants; but whether its tendency be to benefit the public.
- JULIA B.—If you have the courage to brave notice and comment, why then adopt the larger style of bonnet. You will soon be in the fashion—the French court have set their faces against small bonnets.
- STUDENT.—David Hazzio was Mary Stuart's vocalist and secretary. He was murdered in her presence, A. D. 1565.

THE MYSTERIOUS MINER:

—OR—

THE GOLD-DIGGERS OF CALIFORNIA.

A STORY OF THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC SHORES.

BY MRS. L. S. GOODWIN.

This is the expressive title of the stirring novellette with which the twelfth volume of "The Flag of our Union" commences. We can promise much interest in this charmingly written and intensely interesting story. Each successive chapter is vivid, and presents a tableau in itself, depicting the wild life at the mines, and frontier adventure on our south-western border—as well as much interesting matter of scenes nearer home. Secure the first number, and preserve the story complete.

SPLINTERS.

- .... A splendid manuscript copy of the Bible, written in the early part of the 12th century, has been found at Grenada, Spain.
- .... Sir John Davie, in a poem on dancing, written in 1396, describes the polka minitely. There's really nothing new.
- .... Lord Brougham is now sojourning at Cannes, France. He is said to be wearing away very fast.
- .... Jackson Square, in the centre of the city of New Orleans, is now a civic garden, tastefully laid out.
- .... There is scarcely a doubt that American commerce will soon be relieved from the burthen of the Danish Sound dues.
- .... A Russian engineer has found out how to convert peat-turf into hard coal. Peat-er! the grate!
- .... In Rome, Italy, there are 244 painters, 105 sculptors, and 144 engravers, natives or permanent residents of the city.
- .... The Rothschild family, of Paris, are publishing the works of Moses Maimonides, the St. Thomas d'Aquinas of the Jews.
- .... The man who has an "ancestry," has his feet shod with lead. Our authority is the New Orleans Picayune.
- .... The first theatre ever established in America was at Williamsburg, Virginia. It opened September 5, 1752.
- .... The Spiritualists of New York have divided into two sects—the "Christians" and "Non-Christians." Both are numerous.
- .... The itinerant flower-vendors of New Orleans are quite an "institution." They sell a neat bouquet for a dime.
- .... In the city of New York there are about 12,000 more males than females. A few more ladies wanted.
- .... The copper mines at Flemington, N. J., are again worked, after a lapse of some time, by a new company.
- .... A son of John C. Breckinridge, vice-president elect, was lately severely injured while playing with gunpowder.
- .... The Messrs. Cunard are about establishing a line of steamers between Liverpool and the St. Lawrence.
- .... The canal season in New York is now over. The receipts for the present year far exceeded the last.
- .... Congressional districts must contain 91,958 inhabitants, according to the last apportionment.
- .... Hoc, of New York, has sold two of his largest presses to London journals—quite a triumph.
- .... The Circassians reckon a woman at one half the value of a warrior—the heathen!
- .... A snake exhibitor in California was lately bitten by one of his pet rattlesnakes, and came near dying.
- .... A lad at school, being asked to name the four seasons, promptly answered, "Pepper, mustard, salt and vinegar."
- .... A Pole in this country has invented a sort of shield to avert fatality in railroad collisions.

THE NEW YEAR!

We come before our readers and the public, in the present number of Balloy's Pictorial, with a cordial greeting and an earnest wish for a happy new year to one and all. It will be seen that we appear in an entire new suite of type, new heading (after our old style), and fresh and bright from head-line to imprint. Every material which goes to make up the number of the paper now in the hands of the reader, is new and perfect, just from the manufacturers' hands. It is not egotistical in us to acknowledge a little honest pride in the complete appearance of our favorite illustrated journal. The degree of perfection to which it has been brought, has not been the work of a brief period, but is the result of nearly six years of heavy expenditure of time, industry and money.

That we have exactly met the requirements of the public taste, and have succeeded in producing a paper universally sought after and fully appreciated, is attested by our immense circulation and our mammoth subscription list. In this respect we are entirely satisfied, and freely acknowledge that, even with our present enlarged facilities and admirable machinery, we could print but a very few thousand copies more per week than we now issue. Grateful for this complete success, we are resolved to deserve it by unremitting endeavors to please, and by continuing to make Balloy's Pictorial a truly valuable fireside companion for every American home.

During the last ten days, our clerks have been engaged night and day in registering the hosts of subscriptions that have poured in upon us from the far West, the extreme South, the North and our immediate Atlantic neighborhood. We expected that with the increasing numbers of readers and the improvement of our paper, that our list would increase, and our circulation would be extended, but we hardly anticipated such a welcome avalanche of subscribers as have come to us with the new year. In arranging our mail hooks, with so many thousands of new names, added to the renewal of thousands upon thousands of old ones, some errors must occur, but we trust our friends will have patience with us; inform us at once of any mistakes, and all shall be made scrupulously correct.

In closing, let us add that it is all-important for those who would secure the work complete, to send in their subscriptions at once, and thus prevent any break in the perfect sets of the volume. Once again, a happy new year to one and all!

FREE ADMISSIONS.

Miss Laura Keane, in her Varieties Theatre, New York, has been compelled to request gentlemen of the press to leave their cards with her door-keeper each time they pass in, as a check on impostors obtaining the entrée as editors. We would suggest to Miss Keane an improvement on the system, and that is, to request editors to send their daguerreotype, with the name attached, to the theatre. These daguerreotypes might then be arranged in a case over the door-keeper's table, and it would be a pleasant amusement for him to study the intelligent countenances at odd times, and thus enable himself to identify the originals. After all, it would be no great barn if the free admissions were abolished. The privilege does not secure a seat to the editor, and if anything worth noting is going on, every seat is likely to be occupied. If the presence of critics is desirable, they should have reserved seats.

A RETROSPECTIVE GLANCE.—We would suggest to those of our subscribers who have been with us from the first—and there are a vast number of them—to turn back to the early numbers of our illustrated journal, and compare the style of our engravings then published with the number in hand. The improvement is remarkable, and a source of congratulation to realize to what perfection American hands and American enterprise are bringing this branch of art.

THE PAST VOLUME.—We have volume eleven bound and for sale at our office, in full gilt, uniform with the preceding volumes, with illuminated title-page and index. Price, single volume, $3. The whole set of eleven volumes complete will be sold for $22. These books can never be re-printed, and we have but a few complete sets left.

FRENCH'S AMERICAN DRAMA.—The recent issues of this admirable series of acting plays, arranged with stage business, costumes, relative position of performers, etc., are, "That Blessed Baby," a most mirth-provoking farce, Coleman's play of the "Iron Chest," and Shakespeare's play, the "Merchant of Venice."

THE EXILE'S HOME.—Longwood House, at St. Helena, is in a ruinous condition, and Napoleon's chamber is used for a grain-room. Thousands of travellers yearly make a pilgrimage to Longwood House and the grave that once held the remains of the great captain.

USE OF HOOPS.—An old lady, who fell overboard from a brig in our bay, lately, was saved from drowning by her hooped skirts. She appeared in a "watered silk" when she was fished up.

WHAT A COUNTRY!—It appears that we owe only about thirty millions, and that would have been paid if creditors had asked for their money. Uncle Sam seems to be doing pretty well.

PORTWINE AND WINE.—It seems that Lamartine will make 2500 hogsheds of wine, this year. He receives also about $80,000 per annum for his serial work.

SHAKESPEARE.—Mrs. Fanny Kemble has been reading Shakespeare in various parts of the country. It is a treat to hear her.

POCAHONTAS SAVING THE LIFE OF SMITH.

The large picture drawn expressly for us by Billings, and occupying the whole of pages 8 and 9 of the present number, illustrates one of the most thrilling and dramatic scenes in the whole range of our history. Though all are familiar with the story of Captain Smith and Pocahontas, still we are quite certain that this vivid picture will flash a new light on the heroism of the Indian maiden. Captain Smith has been surprised by the Virginia Indians, and after heroically defending himself and nearly escaping, has been taken and condemned to death. His hands are bound behind him, and he lies with his head on a projecting rock, placed there to receive the fatal blow from the executioner's war club. Over him stands Pocahontas, the youthful daughter of the Indian chief Powhatan, her graceful form shielding the Indian captive from instant death. Around her swarm her savage countrymen, in various attitudes expressive of astonishment, indignation and demoniac fury. Powhatan, seated on his throne on the right, and leaning on his plumed lance, exhibits no traces of emotion on his stoical countenance, but listens to the remonstrances of the scarred chief beside him. The Indian drummer on the left, the woman with the child behind Pocahontas, all the dusky, agitated figures that surround her, are animated by one spirit of vengeance, by the same deadly hate of the white man. Even in civilized communities he must be a man of heroic mould who dares to plead the cause of an enemy against the united voice of his countrymen. Let us then accord full honor to the gentle Virginian maiden, who, at the peril of her life, and in opposition to her father and her whole people, interposed successfully to save the life of a wounded captive of a strange race of men. From the very first, Pocahontas was the friend of the white, and she frequently braved peril to do them service. Her friendship for the settlers resulted in her exile from her native land, but, married to Thomas Rolfe, an Englishman, received as a convert by the Christian church, she was treated with great respect by the people and court of England. When she met Smith, whom she had been led to believe dead, in London, she was completely overcome by emotion. When about to revisit Virginia, with her husband and infant son, she died suddenly, at the age of twenty-two. The son was carefully educated by an uncle in London, and afterwards became a wealthy and distinguished character in Virginia, where his descendants still exist. Had Pocahontas wedded Captain Smith the romance of this historical episode would have been complete.

SHORT AND SWEET.—Our friend Baron Nathans complains of the length of presidential messages. He says if he were president he should say nothing more than "all right—go ahead," or "looks squally—keep a sharp lookout," according to circumstances, referring for particulars to small bills.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. Wm. E. Porter, of West Cambridge, to Miss Lavina E. Berry, of Stratford, N. H.; by Rev. Dr. Nye, Mr. Edwin B. Lee, to Miss Elizabeth P. Lane; by Rev. Mr. Fuller, Mr. David Adams to Mrs. Nancy M. Malstrom; by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Lemuel Nichols, of Cornish, Me., to Miss Sophia Magray; by Rev. Mr. Blake, Mr. William H. Mitchell to Miss Elizabeth F. Sprui; Mr. Thomas Watson to Mrs. Grace Brannon;—At Charleston, by Rev. Mr. Tappan, Mr. Lorenzo B. French to Miss Lucie A. Glinore;—At Somerville, by Rev. Mr. Pope, Mr. Charles H. Moore to Miss Clara J. Prince;—At Jamaica Plain, by Rev. Mr. Wilson, Mr. Theodore Lyman to Miss Elizabeth Russell;—At Malden, by Rev. Mr. Bagnall, Mr. James E. Harris to Miss Caroline A. Strong;—At Milton, by Rev. Mr. Morison, Mr. Gideon Beck to Miss Alice S. Briggs;—At Newton, by Rev. Mr. Furber, Mr. R. Dana Morse to Miss Helen S. Hutchins;—At Woburn, by Rev. Mr. March, Mr. Samuel A. Fowle to Miss Mary Waltham;—At South Dedham, by Rev. Mr. Fisher, Mr. Lewis Day to Miss Anna M. Smith;—At Lawrence, by Rev. Mr. Wilcox, Mr. J. Knudson to Miss H. E. Stevens;—At Hingham, by Rev. Mr. Peter, Mr. D. W. Bates to Miss Abby O. Hice;—At Essex, by Rev. Mr. Prince, Mr. G. S. Perkins to Miss Ednah Burroughs;—At Conway, N. H., by Rev. Mr. Adams, Mr. A. F. Adams, of Castine, Me., to Miss Isabella V. Osborn, of Boston.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mrs. Lucy Parsons, 79; Mr. Samuel F. Gray, of Cambridge, 38; Mr. Stephen Macdonald, 28; Rev. Ephraim Peabody, D. D., 49; Mrs. Hannah B. Deland, formerly of Salem, 66;—At East Boston, Mrs. Sarah F. Lufkin, 48; Mr. J. Franklin Bradford, 28;—At Charlestown, Miss Ada T. Lee, of Manchester, 51;—At Chelsea, Mr. John F. Fenn, 86;—At N. Chelsea, Mr. Benjamin Watte, 84;—At Dorchester, Mr. Moses Gleason, 59;—At Quincy, Noah Curtis, Esq., 84;—At Malden, Mrs. Eliza T. Walt, 63;—At Milton, Mr. Henry Thayer, 85;—At Newton Lower Falls, Mrs. Eliza P. Pulsifer, 54;—At Lynn, Mrs. Mary Wilson, 81;—At Waltham, Miss Cornelia Hobart, 21;—At Needham, Mr. Joseph Mills, 83;—At Groton, Mr. Ezra K. Farnsworth, 86;—At Newburyport, Mr. John Ballou, 75;—At Warr, Mrs. Lydia Pope, 88;—At Belchertown, Mrs. Thankful Low, of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary melange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best AMERICAN AUTHORS, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, ..... $3 00
4 subscribers, ..... 10 00
10 ..... 20 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the Illustrated Copy gratis.

* One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU.

No. 22 WINTER STREET, BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Wall, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; R. A. Duncan, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roy, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodard, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel H. Gould, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TWILIGHT.

BY SARAH A. NEWELL.

The golden twilight, soft and meek,
Fled from the rosy god of day—
Then waited, with a flushing cheek,
For dark-browed Night, who bade her stay.

Softly he threw his mantle o'er
Her form, as they together went,
And wooed her, gently, as before,
To come within his silent tent.

And, one by one, he drew from far
His diamond treasures, clear and bright,
Till, on her brow, a single star
Gleamed, peerless, in its heavenly light.

DISAPPOINTMENT.

O, ever thus from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay;
I never loved a tree or flower,
But 'twas the first to fade away.
I never nursed a dear gazelle,
To glad me with its soft black eye,
But when it came to know me well,
And love me, it was sure to die!—MOORE.

EARTH AND HEAVEN.

Flowers, that bloom to wither fast;
Light, whose beams are soon o'ercast;
Friendship warm, but not to last;
Such by earth are given.

Seek the flowers that ne'er shall fade;
Find the light no cloud can shade:
Win the friend who ne'er betrays—
These are found in heaven.—MISS H. F. GOULD.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

KALED, THE PAGE.

A ROMANCE OF THE COURT OF LOUIS XIII.

BY DELL DRAMBLE.

WITHIN a dimly-lighted saloon of the beautiful archiepiscopal palace of Narbonne, sat a thin, gaunt man, whose cadaverous visage was impressed with an air of subtlety and finesse. His bald brow was bordered with thin white hair, seen straggling from beneath a closely-fitting red cap. He was dictating to a page, notes and memoranda, to be handed after to a secretary to copy. The old duke had several of these pages in his service. These boys were younger sons of high and powerful families, yet, according to the custom of the day, were placed in the family of great nobles, a remnant of feudal patronage, receiving wages from them and holding themselves ready to do their bidding,—were devoted to their lord's interest. The page now writing at the table, near which sat the old duke, was the young Vicomte Henri d'Effiat, son of the late Marechal de Chaumont. The old man with the close, red cap and gaunt figure, was Armand Duplessis, Cardinal de Richelieu.

For a while, he dictated his instructions, reading them from a slip of paper, written in his own hand. A profound melancholy spread over his features, and when he had ended, his head sunk forward on his folded arms, and the stripling page, surprised, heard him mutter the memorable words:

"What utter weariness of spirit—what disgust of life is mine! For twenty years have I toiled and striven to give a more fixed light to the glimmering ray of the star that on my birth shone bright—ever since casting a dim, uncertain gleam. Had I but possessed the king's hereditary rights, what could I not have achieved? The genius that should be given to deeds of high enterprise, is all wasted in the endeavor to merely sustain my balance in his feeble, vacillating mind. What boots it, that I hold within my grasp the destinies of Europe, so long as my interests are perpetually frustrated within the narrow space of his mutinous cabinet?—its few feet of dimensions causing me more infinite calculation to compass, than it requires to direct and govern all Europe besides! And this is the life so envied—of a prime minister!"

At this moment, the tapestry was pushed aside, and a courier entered.

"Ha! that little miscreant, Gondi (afterward Cardinal de Retz.) The queen insists on having him for her secretary. Well, I owe her some amends for separating her from her admirer, Buckingham, I suppose. Come hither, Kaled," (a pet term employed by Anne of Austria for the young Gondi.)

The page approached, holding up a packet, sealed with black, for the king; this, he replaced under his arm, as he drew near the duke, presenting him at the same time with a little billet, which the cardinal eagerly clutched, reading over again and again, the words of laconic brevity, of such import to him. "Mary de Medici is dead!"

Tearing the billet into fragments, the minister spoke long and earnestly to the page, in so low a tone, however, that the other page, Henri d'Effiat, could only occasionally catch a few disjointed words, such as, "Take heed that you reach not the Louvre for twelve hours yet—remember the reward—the hand of the young Duchess of Mantua (d'Effiat started)—pooh, your glance at Henri de Cinq Mars—his head is too full of his handsome figure and shoulder knots, to ever rise in the duchess's favor—and now, Gondi, be firm or perish!"

Bowing low, the page withdrew, while the cardinal, without showing the least emotion, went on with his dictating, while the young Vicomte d'Effiat trembled in every limb. These two pages belonged to the first families of France; yet could they, either would have escaped from out the gilded doors of the minister's cabinet, gladly as a bird from its cage.

And now entered Mazarin, insinuating and cringing as ever, and with him the Duke d'Angouleme, that Valois, who, having long struggled against Henry IV., now paid court to the cardinal-generalissimo, by detailing the operations of Perpignan, by way of preparatory to the tutelage himself would yet receive, even on the battle-field, from Richelieu.

"Monsieur le Duke, it is with unaffected pleasure I inform you that the king has created you Marshal of France. But here comes Marechal Schomberg who has, doubtless, something of importance to communicate."

An hour later, and the pompous litter of the cardinal stopped at the Louvre. Two ushers, clothed in royal livery, raised the great curtains that hung before the council-chamber, where the king, Louis XIII., stood, encircled by the great officers of the crown, and announced "his eminence." The king glanced with an angry, haughty air of resolute defiance at him, which was afterwards remembered by Richelieu, who, attired in all a cardinal's pomp, advanced slowly, leaning on the young page, Henri d'Effiat. Slowly, as if in much pain, the minister approached; not that suffering caused him to halt in his gait, but that each step was arrested to observe the courtiers before him. A hurried glance of his practiced eye around, sufficed. Calm and placid as a summer's morning, was the minister's smile of disdain, as, assuming that look of firmness and grandeur he ever bore when danger threatened, he walked direct to the king. Louis turned round in astonishment. His head was uncovered, and his pale and noble features, with their melancholy expression, his lofty brow and classic profile, set off by a faint, straggling sunbeam, that made distinctly visible the proud lineaments, easily recognized, of the Bourbons. He had all the characteristic traits of his race except their fiery glance, so potent in a princely line. His sole forte, owing to weakness of sight, being in a cold, icy look, that, though it did not compel submission, was, nevertheless, effective in its way. Without uncovering his hoary head, the cardinal, leaning heavily on the page, approached the king, and said:

"Sire, my health, long failing, admonishes of other and eternal duties. Eighteen years ago I accepted from you the charge of a divided, weakened kingdom. I have conquered all your enemies, and return it united and powerful. My life's great aim is accomplished. I now only crave to retire, to end my days in meditation and prayer."

Offended at the haughty tone of the cardinal, the king merely said:

"We thank you for the services of which you remind us, and grant monsieur le cardinal the opportunity he craves for retirement and repose."

Deeply irate, yet did Richelieu repress all outward indication of the rage he felt, as he went on:

"The only return I would ask for my poor services, would be the recall of your mother, Mary de Medici, whom, though I always loved, yet state policy forced me to require her banishment. I would pray her recall from exile."

For a moment, Louis XIII. looked on his aged minister without venturing to reply. He saw the snowy hairs and wan face before him, of Richelieu, and thought only on his long-trying devotion and boundless capacity. That pitying look upon that aged, decrepid man, decided the fate of France. With all the noble frankness and kindly courtesy of a Bourbon, he extended his hand to the duke, as he promised to recall the queen.

The council had ended. Louis sat in the dressing-room of his beautiful wife, Anne of Austria. The dauphin, afterwards Louis XIV., was playing on the carpet at his feet. Mademoiselles d'Hautfort and Lafayette were braiding the beautiful blond tresses of the queen, while the young Duchess Maria of Mantua looped up her slashed sleeves with strings of pearls. A captain of the guards was announced, who, on entering, spoke in a low tone to the king, who, unable to restrain his agitation, exclaimed:

"A courier from Cologne, said you? I come!" and while the captain of the guard held up the curtain of the adjoining cabinet, the young Duchess of Mantua noticed the stripling page, Gondi, presenting a packet to the king, sealed with black.

When the curtain was again raised, Louis, paler than usual, reentered the queen's apartment. Mazarin, de Thou, Richelieu and his page, Henri d'Effiat, were there. Glancing at the imperturbable cardinal, the king observed:

"Gentlemen, the queen has just died, at Bologna. Perhaps others knew of this before me. Give orders; in an hour we will proceed thither. Monsieur le Cardinal, I would confer with you." And following him, without a sign of either sorrow or annoyance, Richelieu entered the cabinet, to leave it a victor.

After a somewhat protracted conference, the cardinal rose to retire, observing:

"This is the hour I usually begin my avocations for the day."
"I will hereafter open all letters, and issue commands myself," replied the king.

The minister touched a bell, and his page entered, on whose shoulder, heavily leaning, he left the room. Louis, left alone, stared in very helplessness at the mass of papers that lay heaped before him. His weak sight failed, his throbbing brain reeled; he fancied he felt his kingdom crumbling away from under his trembling limbs. The blood forsook his wan face, receding to his heart, as he called, feebly:—"Richelieu!"

Languidly re-entering the cabinet, Richelieu fixed his keen eyes on the pale face of the heart-sick monarch.

"You have recalled me. What would you?"
Turning away his head, the king faintly answered:
"I am ill—unable to govern. You must rule in my stead."
"Then sign this paper," said the implacable cardinal.

"O, do not ask this!—anything but this!" entreated Louis, in a faltering accent. "I promised the Marshal de Chaumont the hand of the young Duchess of Mantua, for his son, Henri d'Effiat. For pity's sake, don't urge me to break this compact. I am ill—dying."

"And I have promised herself and duchy to Gondi, or Wladislaus of Poland—whoever bids highest," continued he, imperatively, whom men call the great Richelieu.

The king signed the paper. The beautiful Duchess of Mantua began to be considered as the bride of Wladislaus, King of Poland. Henri d'Effiat was created grand ecuyer; Gondi was made abbe, afterwards Cardinal de Retz. Meantime, Anne of Austria grew daily more grave and immovable. She, alone, separated from her Buckingham by the crafty policy of Richelieu, saw his hand in the movements of the puppets evolving around. She had vainly endeavored to confer with Milton, ere his return to London, where the parliamentarians, under Essex, had raised the siege of Gloucester, and Prince Rupert lost a battle at Newbury; while Charles I. implored of France the assistance his queen now vainly sought of Holland.

It was the eve of a fete in the Louvre. The prince palatine was present, sent by the old King Wladislaus of Poland, to escort his promised bride, the Princess Maria Gonzaga, Duchess of Mantua, to his northern court. Seated beside the queen, the duchess was apparently listening to some pleasanties addressed her by Gaston, Duke of Orleans, when, raising her eyes, they rested on the pale features of the grand ecuyer, Henri d'Effiat. He was pale as death, and his dark eyes looked sadly on her from beneath his knit brows. Following him with her alarmed gaze, she noted that he made a sign as if wishing to speak with her. Obtaining permission to retire, a few minutes sufficed to exchange her ball costume for a domino; when, with a black velvet mask held to her face, following the retreating figure of the grand ecuyer, the young and trembling duchess pushed open the folding door of the private chapel, where she was met by his tutor, the Abbe Quillet, who conducted her within the confessional, while Henri d'Effiat carefully locked the chapel door, to guard against the entrance of any one from the outside.

"How I tremble, Henri! The queen looked so grave when I asked permission to retire. Why remain in France? Why not throw up your appointment of master of the horse? O, let us fly to Tuscany—anywhere, to escape from that old rebel Richelieu!"

He was silent. The mere question showed the ignorance of a girl of eighteen—born to a throne, and accustomed to the frivolity of a court.

"Maria, I have summoned you here either to cement or release you from your vows."

"Alas! Henri, why this urgency? Can I wed you when so changed, or do you fear that I could leave you, when so unhappy?"

They were married. Straining the fair girl to his breast, d'Effiat said:

"And now a short farewell, my beautiful, my own! To-morrow places many a mile between us and France."

"O, happiness! Nothing now can ever part what God has just united. The queen favors us both. We are yet very young, and now that we are united, the future looks like a bright, joyous holiday—"

At this moment, a rustling in the aisle, like the soft sigh of a wind harp, startled them. Henri d'Effiat called aloud:

"Who goes there?"

No one answered. The young duchess trembled, and even the grand ecuyer was agitated. Throwing his arm round his girl-bride, he hastened to the door. It was unlocked; and the next moment he was in close pursuit of a muffled figure, who sped with the swiftness of an arrow along the corridor leading to the grand staircase, as Maria de Gonzaga, falling heavily against the aged Abbe Quillet, exclaimed: "O, Santa Maria! Kaled!"

An hour later, and the master of the horse, pale as death, entered the king's cabinet unannounced. Richelieu was with Louis. Without noticing the minister, the young ecuyer approached the king with an undaunted mien, saying:

"Your majesty might find it difficult to arrest the son of Marshal de Chaumont—having twenty thousand men under my command. I have voluntarily come to surrender myself."

Unbuckling his sword, he laid it on the table, while the feeble king said:

"I pledge you my word, Henri, you are only required to stay in the Bastille for a few days, until this strange affair is satisfactorily explained."

And the young bridegroom left the room, following de Thou to the Bastille—his sad fate the next day made matter of history.

The long parliament still endured in England. That the Earl of Strafford had been condemned to death, seemed but to render Richelieu the more immovable—above or below the common standard of human nature. Submissive Europe listened to him through its representatives. His levees were thronged with presidents of parliaments, princes of the church, marshals and ambassadors. The king dared no longer brave him; and the grave face of Anne of Austria became paler, and each day more melancholy, as she noted the inquiring gaze of Mantua's young duchess wandering anxiously over the court's glittering throngs for the unreturning grand ecuyer. She noted with surprise, that while the merits of older dignitaries of the church were passed over, Richelieu had importuned Urban VIII. to grant the Roman purple to the Abbe Paul de Gondi, who, still a favorite of the queen, had won her over to further the minister's compact, that setting aside the previous marriage of the young duchess, made her queen of Poland, and transformed the young secretary into a cardinal—for to this elevation did Richelieu's compact raise Kaled the page, afterwards the Cardinal de Retz.

Editorial Melange.

The State of Illinois has the largest coal area on our continent, and greater by 56,695 miles than the whole area of Europe. — An improved mode of lubricating the spindles of machinery used in preparing and spinning cotton, and other fibrous materials, revolving in a lifting rail, has recently been adopted in England. The invention consists in attaching to the lifting rail a rib covered with flannel, which, being kept saturated with oil or other lubricating material, imparts the same to the spindles as the lifting rail moves up and down. — Governor Briggs, in his annual message to the North Carolina Legislature, says the common school system of that State is rapidly acquiring value and efficiency, and now gives instruction to 130,000 children. — At Cincinnati, coal has run up to seven dollars per ton, and wood to eight dollars a cord, and they are beginning to be anxious about the chance to procure fuel at all. Think of that—in a country that was all forest forty years ago! — Eighteen hundred millions of bricks are produced per annum in England, weighing about 5,400,000 tons. The capital employed in the business is about £2,000,000, and the patents that have been issued in connection with it number 230. — Artificial teeth are now made of flint or quartz rock and feldspar. After trituration, a paste is made of the mixed powder, which may be fashioned into any shape, and then hardened by heat. — The North China Herald thus sums up the present position in China: It appears to be established by a variety of concurrent testimony, that over a region, equal in extent and population to some of the most powerful States of Europe, the people have discarded the Manchu costume, and reverted to that of the Ming dynasty. — A submarine telegraph wire is to be laid across the Detroit River, from Windsor to Detroit, by means of which direct communication will be had between Detroit, Toronto, Montreal and Quebec. — The Dublin Freeman's Journal chronicles the sailing of an Irish emigrant ship for Buenos Ayres. It says the Irish now in Buenos Ayres number 12,000, and they have succeeded remarkably well, fortunes of £5000 up to £50,000 being not uncommon among them. — The Second Presbyterian Church, in Stillwater, Minnesota, which was just being finished, was destroyed by fire, recently. A large new bell, which had just been put up, was also destroyed. — Vienna papers announce the death of Dr. Friedrich Krauter, at the age of sixty-six. He was the private secretary and intimate friend of Goethe. Mr. Lewes, in his life of the great poet, speaks of him as "his last secretary Krauter, who never speaks of him (Goethe) but with idolatry. — Blankets were first made at Bristol, in England, by a poor weaver, whose name was Thomas Blanket, and who gave his name to his peculiar manufacture of woolen cloth. — An organized band of desperadoes is existing in Boone, Montgomery and Putnam counties, Indiana, who steal horses, break open dwelling-houses, and help themselves generally, in the most cool and off-hand manner. — The Hingham Journal, alluding to newspaper horrowers—a class who use an editor's brains without contributing to cover his back,—offers to give the paper to those persons who will procure a certificate from the selectmen that they are too poor to subscribe for it. — Benjamin Ashly, who built the first steamboat on the Connecticut River, died recently at Springfield, Mass., aged 81. — The London News says:—"Either the Emperor Napoleon is panic-stricken, and undoes one day what he has done on the preceding, in his uncertainty how to proceed; or there is a 'power behind the throne greater than the throne'—the Bourgeois gamblers and the protected interests—strong enough to withhold him from obeying the dictates of his better judgment." — The Maine Farmer says, there is not one blacksmith in fifty who knows how to shoe a horse properly.

DEBATING SOCIETIES.—These are excellent institutions, and we should be badly off for good public speakers without these preparatory schools for orators. But they sometimes have queer discussions. At the last meeting of the Pigtown Debating Society, a young Cicero started the following question:—"Mr. President, sponin' I was courtin' a young gal, and she was to run away, and I was to run arter her, would I be happier when I cotched her than when I was running arter her?" The question of the evening was whether there was more pleasure in the possession or pursuit of an object.

LADIES' LETTERS.—It is said the dear creatures who tease us never can write a letter, no matter how brief, without appending a postscript thereto. Dr. Byles, of facetious memory, once affirmed this in a company of Boston ladies, his parishioners. "My very next letter shall refute you," said a lady present. Three days afterwards, the doctor received an epistle from her, which closed thus—"P. S. Who is right!—you or I?"

THE OLDEST APPLE.—A gentleman in the town of Wisconsin, Va., has in his possession an apple which was grown in the year 1787. It grew into a bottle which was attached to the branch of a tree, and when the fruit was ripe, the stem was severed and the bottle sealed up. The fruit is in perfect preservation. It ought to be sent to Major Poore, of apple fame.

DELICATE PHRASEOLOGY.—A dress-maker in the Bovey, New York, advertises for assistants who are required to "amuse themselves" with work between the periods of refreshment, consisting of breakfast, dinner, tea and supper. Almost everybody in this country can find plenty of such "amusement."

PROSPERING.—Canada is rapidly progressing in solid prosperity, judging from her railways. Five years ago, there were about 100 miles constructed—now there are nearly 2000 miles.

Upside Gatherings.

Recruits for Walker now sail in large numbers, unmolested, from New York.

The Virginians have been amusing themselves with a tournament at Fredericksburg. From three to five thousand ladies and gentlemen were in attendance.

At Funchal, Madeira, it is the fashion to wear white boots instead of black ones, and a lump of chalk does the service of the blacking brush.

The Oswego Palladium says that Mr. Peter Rozelli of that city, now 103 years old, has voted almost ever since political parties have had an existence in this country.

The Engineer states that one of the largest landed proprietors of Cuba is now introducing steam culture upon his estates, for the purpose of superseding horse and slave labor.

Lieut. John T. Walker, of the Navy, committed suicide by hanging himself, at his lodgings in Chambers' Street, N. Y. He was under orders to join the ship-of-war St. Mary's at Panama.

Twelve of the superb capitals, which were to surmount the great columns in the new Custom House at New Orleans, La., costing $4000 each, were recently lost in the ship Oliphant.

A writer in Porter's Spirit states that he got a beautiful, sleek, glossy coat on his horse by simply giving him a few raw carrots every day to eat. The remedy is said to be infallible.

A firm in Jackson, Miss., have commenced laying the foundation of a large cotton factory building. The site chosen is on the banks of the Pearl River, between the city and the railroad bridge.

Nine Frenchmen, recently political prisoners at Cayenne, but who succeeded in escaping on a raft, and reaching Demerara, from whence they were conveyed to Baltimore in an American vessel, arrived in New York.

The Cincinnati Enquirer states that there is now at that place an amount of manufactures, the value of which is moderately estimated at $3,000,000, waiting to be shipped as soon as a sufficient rise in the Ohio River shall take place.

A number of persons have been indicted in Baltimore during the past and the present terms of the Criminal Court, for selling lottery policies in violation of the act of Assembly of 1856, which makes the offence a fine of two hundred dollars.

A boy named Martin was shot by a man named Stewart at a turkey-shoot near Watertown, N. Y., recently. The ball passed through the boy's temples, just back of the eyes, cutting off the nerves of the eyes, but failing to kill him, though his recovery is hardly expected.

The demand for furs of fancy descriptions this season exceeds all precedent, and as a consequence, prices on raw stock, for varieties, have gone up to fifty per cent., or even higher, compared with last year. For dress goods, furs will be worn the coming winter to an unusual extent. Sets costing $150 are very common.

In Woburn, lately, there was great excitement on account of the disappearance of a little girl five years old. The whole population turned out to search for her, and about three o'clock in the morning she was found asleep in one of the pews of the Orthodox church.

A gentleman who resided at Nyack, N. Y., has left by his will the sum of $20,000 to the Five Points House of Industry, New York city, and $5000 for the personal benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Pease. He had previously made various donations to the institution, one of which amounted to $2000.

The suspension bridge about to be erected over the Mississippi at St. Louis, it is said, will be the most costly in the world. It will cost about two million dollars, will be eighty-four feet above high water, and over a mile in length. The bottom of the towers will be sixty feet below low water.

Amherst College, according to the Independent, is in a flourishing condition. About $10,000 have been secured for the Alumni fund—$15,000 being needed. In case this is raised, a friend has pledged $10,000 to repair the college buildings, and another $10,000 to erect a hall for the Alumni and literary societies.

Ballooning is becoming an institution in Philadelphia. Last week, M. Goddard took up with him a party of six gentlemen, landing them at a magnificent rural country seat, where they were feasted, and the whole party, with the balloon, returned to the city by train in the evening.

A priest of Rome has just sent to Turin a subscription towards the 100 guns of Alexandria, accompanying his donation with the following quotation from the Missal: "We pray thee, Lord, to humble the pride of our enemies, and to prostrate their perverseness by the power of thy hand."

A New Yorker who fired a revolver in the streets in London, was let off with a light fine, on the ground that it was a common practice in the United States, where nobody thought anything of it. The lord mayor said it was a very surprising state of society, but he was not prepared to dispute the fact.

An interesting mechanical operation has been lately performed at the imperial dockyard at Cherbourg, in the hauling up of a line-of-battle ship, under a building shed, upon an ordinary launching cradle and way. It was performed with the assistance of six captains, manned by about 700 men, and occupied nearly seven hours.

A new steamboat is being built on Lake George, in the place of the John Jay, burned in July last. She is to be 145 feet long and 26 feet wide. The boiler and furnace are to be placed in compartments encased in iron, entirely fire-proof. The life-saving apparatus is to be of the most modern and improved kind, and no expense to be spared to make it complete and perfect.

A Mr. Hayt, aged forty-two years, murdered Calista C. Allen in Erie, Pa., because she would not marry him. She was fourteen years old. Hayt has been tried, found guilty of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to ten years imprisonment. Medical men testified that he was afflicted with "moral insanity." What is that?

A London paper gives a very gratifying account of the progress Christianity has made in New Zealand. A chief of that cannibal country was questioned by one of the missionaries as to how far the study of the Scriptures had broken him of his unnatural passion for human flesh. The chief answered, proudly: "You missionaries men have done me much good. I never eat my enemies on Sundays now!"

A night or two since, a woman in Philadelphia called at the mayor's office and asked for lodgings. Seeing that the woman was in a stupid condition, she was searched and two empty vials, labelled laudanum, were found. The woman said she had taken their contents, but as she took that quantity daily, there was no danger. She was permitted to go to sleep, and next morning awakened all right—demanded her vials and change, and started for more laudanum.

Foreign Items.

The Paris Medical Gazette states, that of the 3,205,292 young men examined in France for military service during nineteen years, 13,007 were exempted on account of defective sight.

The naval force of Spain consists of 4 ships of the line, 10 frigates, 5 corvettes, 11 brigantines, and 11 smaller sailing vessels; 32 side-wheel steam frigates, 4 screw frigates, and 6 smaller steamers; together, 82 vessels, carrying 1301 guns of various calibres.

M. Lindenberg, the principal editor of the Berlin Gazette Patriotique, has been found guilty of defaming the Prince of Prussia. He has been condemned, by the Tribunal of Potsdam, to nine months' imprisonment, and the deprivation of all civil rights. General Gerlach appeared as a witness.

A locomotive weighing sixty tons, with ten feet driving wheels, and said to be capable of attaining a speed of one hundred and fifty miles per hour, has been exhibited in Paris. Its centre of gravity is placed so low as to render it safer than ordinary engines at the usual speed, so far as getting off the track is concerned.

During the late war, a certain M. Teletsky, attached to the commissariat of the 4th corps d'armee in Russia, took to flight, carrying with him the contents of the treasury, amounting to the enormous sum of 600,000 francs. By an official notice in the Journal de St. Petersburg, he is summoned to appear before a military tribunal at Warsaw in the course of six months, if in Europe, and one year if he is out of Europe.

Sands of Gold.

... Love is a reality which is born in the fairy region of romance.—Tullyrand.

... Every good writer has much idiom; it is the life and spirit of language.—Londor.

... Women, ever in extremes, are always either better or worse than men.—La Bruyere.

... The errors of great men, and the good deeds of reprobates, should not be reckoned in our estimates of their respective characters.—Tullyrand.

... Poets, by the constitution of their minds, are neither acute reasoners nor firmly minded. Their vocation was allied to a sympathy from the beginning.—Londor.

... I learn several great truths; as that it is impossible to see into the ways of futurity; that punishment always attends the villain; that love is the fond mother of the human breast.—Goldsmith.

... The Christian religion alone contemplates the conjugal union in the order of nature. It is the only religion which presents woman to man as a companion; every other abandons her to him as a slave.—St. Pierre.

... A society composed of none but the wicked, could not exist; it contains within itself the seeds of its own destruction, and, without a flood, would be swept away from the earth by the deluge of its own iniquity.—Colton.

Joker's Budget.

A Canadian paper tells us how one Miss Philbrick set a trap for a bear, and how the bear boldly carried the trap away. We have heard of cases of worse fortune; in which a lady, in her idleness, not only set a trap for a beast, but absolutely caught him.

A gentleman, coming into a barber's shop to be shaved, was tormented by the fellow's finical manners, and insignificant garrulity. "In what manner would your honor wish to be shaved?" exclaimed the tonsor. "If possible," replied the gentleman, "in silence."

In a tavern in a small town sat a farmer, who was plagued and hartered by over a dozen guests who were present. "Well," said the farmer, at last, "I've got the best of all of you."—"How so?" asked all. "In me you've only got one fool, while in you I've got over a dozen."

Two fellows were disputing about their respective claims to distinction on the score of ancestry, when a third stepped in and said: "I rather think my ancestors made more noise in the world than those of either of you; for my father was a drummer, and my mother cried oysters."

Mr. Garrow, examining a witness, asked him what his business was. He answered: "A dealer in old iron."—"Then," said the counsel, "you must, of course, be a thief."—"I don't see," said the witness, "why a dealer in iron must necessarily be a thief more than a dealer in brass."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.
DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled popularity and reputation, is a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the fire-side of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years of editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its tales, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost irrevocable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for this reason that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $2 00
4 subscribers, " " 7 00
10 " " 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the Gifted gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate.

"The Flag of our Union" and "Ballou's Pictorial" are sent to one address for $4 a year.

Sample copies sent when desired.

Published every Saturday, by M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

VIEW OF THE FULTON FERRY BUILDINGS, BROOKLYN, LONG ISLAND.

FULTON FERRY BUILDINGS.

BROOKLYN, L. I.

The very spirited picture on this page was drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Hill, and is not only an accurate delineation of the scene represented, but an effective work of art. The ferryways, offices and signal-tower, are seen on the right, beyond which is the hotel and Fulton Street, stretching away in perspective. In the slip is seen one of the noble boats of the ferry company, with ample accommodations for carriages, horses and foot passengers. The regularity and frequency of the passages render this ferry about as convenient as a bridge. The East River, in the foreground of our view, is alive with various craft. On the left is the Metropolitan steamer, of the Fall River route, coming in with all her flags flying—on the right, heading in an opposite direction, a fore and aft schooner. The East River is crossed by several steam ferries, the principal of which are the Fulton, Wall Street, South, Jackson and Hamilton Avenue ferries. Of all these, the Fulton Ferry is by far the greatest thoroughfare. Boats leave the opposite landings every few minutes during the day, and on every half hour from 12 o'clock at night till morning. From early morning till late in the evening, a constant tide of travel is passing. Merchants, mechanics, pleasure drivers, milkmen, marketmen, hucksters, specimens of every variety of life and occupations are to be met with on these boats. The passage occupies but five or six minutes. The sail is quite a pleasant one, particularly in summer, when the fresh sea-breeze comes up from the Narrows, and sweeps over Brooklyn and New York. Not very many years ago the communication between Long Island and New York was by means of row boats. We believe that horse-ferry boats were subsequently added. But the introduction of steam ferries worked marvels in promoting the growth of the towns on the island, and creating and developing wealth there. To this beneficent agency of steam we must attribute the prodigious growth of Brooklyn, which, from a small village, has attained the gigantic stature of a splendid and flourishing city. It now embraces within its limits, Williamsburg and Bushwick, and extends from Newtown Creek, including Greenpoint, to the boundaries of Brooklyn, below Greenwood Cemetery, a distance of about seven miles, or nearly ten miles, if we follow the line of low water mark. It varies in breadth, averaging about three and one-half miles. Fulton Street, the commencement of which is shown in our engraving, is the principal thoroughfare, and with its blocks of lofty buildings, forms an imposing entrance into the city. The south-western portion rivals upper New York in the splendor and style of its private residences. Brooklyn is one of the best built cities in the United States. Among its public buildings, the city hall, which is bounded on Fulton Street, is a conspicuous and splendid specimen of architecture. It is built of white marble, and covers an area 162 feet by 102. The summit of the dome is 153 feet from the ground. Brooklyn has been called by some the city of churches. It contains, we believe, sixty-six, and many of them are very fine and costly structures. The church of the Pilgrims, with its lofty tower and spire, is a commanding landmark. The Church of the Holy Trinity, built of brown stone, in the Gothic style, cost $150,000. Grace Church, the Church of the Restoration, Dr. Cox's and Dr. Bethune's churches, are noted structures. Among the remarkable features of the city we must not omit to mention the Atlantic Dock, about a mile from the spot delineated in our picture. It is a work of great magnitude and importance. It was built by a company incorporated in 1840, with a capital of $1,000,000, and embraces an area of more than forty acres. It is deep enough for ships of the largest size. The dry dock at the navy yard, is also a great and costly work. The shores of Brooklyn where not protected by docks and wharves, are rapidly wearing away by the current of the East River.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM } VOL. XII., No. 2.—WHOLE No. 288.
0 CENTS SINGLE.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.

The fine picture on this page was drawn expressly for us by Billings, and engraved by John Andrew. In the centre is the State arms, with the eagle and the sun rising over the waters. This is surmounted by an armed figure of Minerva, bearing the liberty cap on the spear in her right hand. On the left we behold De Soto, the governor of Cuba, and probably the first white man who ever saw the River Mississippi, in converse with an Indian chief, while his mailed followers are grouped behind. To the right is a sketch illustrating the great agricultural interest of the State—field laborers bringing in their baskets of cotton to the huge cotton-press which rises in the background. The State of Mississippi is bounded north by Tennessee, east by Alabama, south by the Gulf of Mexico and Louisiana, and west by the Pearl and Mississippi Rivers, which divide it from Louisiana and Arkansas. It has an area of about 47,156 square miles. The eastern and central parts of the State are a kind of table-land, descending by two ranges of irregular bluffs to the Mississippi, the largest river in the United States, and one of the largest rivers in the world. A considerable portion of the territory is low and swampy. The rivers generally run in a southwest course. The northern and central parts of the State are undulating; the northeast is prairie land; the southeast part is low, but abounds in pine. Portions of the State are heavily timbered. The Mississippi River renders this State accessible along its whole western boundary for steamboats of the largest size. The State approaches near the torrid zone, and its long summers are warm. There is a great variety of soil in the State, and much of it is of unequalled fertility. The great staple is cotton; the other products are Indian corn, peas, beans, Irish and sweet potatoes, butter, beeswax, honey and live stock, wheat, rice, tobacco, wool, fruits, cheese, molasses, sugar, barley, buckwheat, wine, hay, grass-seeds, rye, hops, hemp, flax and silk. In 1850, there were 23,960 farms, averaging about 146 acres each. In January, 1855, there were, in the State, 239 miles of railroad completed and 755 in the course of construction. In the same year, there were 866 manufacturing establishments, each producing $500 a year, and upwards. The commerce of the State is mostly carried on through New Orleans. In 1850, the State had 11 colleges, with an aggregate of 862 students, 782 public schools, and 171 academies and other schools. According to the last census, four tri-weekly and semi-weekly and 46 weekly newspapers are printed, with an aggregate annual circulation of 1,752,504 copies. There were also reported four public libraries with 7264 volumes, 109 school and Sunday school libraries with 4380 volumes, and four college libraries with 10,093 volumes. Population in 1850, 603,948. In January, 1854, there was but one bank, with $240,165 capital, and a circulation of $234,745, and $5669 in coin. The Missisippians have missed no opportunity of testifying their loyalty to the confederacy, and their gallantry was signally displayed, in the war with Mexico, on the bloody field of Buena Vista, under General Taylor, where they contributed to the victory.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—on—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRIIDE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER IV.—[CONTINUED.]

Josef Baptista had a cask of excellent rum, brought probably from Jamaica, and which he reserved for himself alone, and one day he discovered somebody had dared to take it. It was a young Bohemian named Paco, a new comrade, who, loving rum, took a bottle of it, which he was offering to Juan, who refused, when the captain entered.

"What are you doing there?"

"Drinking to your health, captain."

"That rum is mine."

"Everything is ours—that is our law," returned the Bohemian.

"But the law is to obey me."

"And if by chance you are disobeyed once?" said Paco, laughing ironically.

"I am never disobeyed a second time," coldly responded the captain; and drawing a pistol from his belt, he fired. The Bohemian fell dead. Juan uttered a horrible cry. The captain turned, saying: "I do not like noise." But when he saw Juan trembling, he smiled grimly, saying, as he left the room: "I did not know you were there; but that will serve you as a lesson in future that you may know how to obey."

Since that day, Juan had for his terrible master an obedience, or rather a terror, that kept him quiet in the castle; and all the freedom he dared to allow himself, was a look from time to time from one of the castle windows into the woods and rocks.

One beautiful day, the sun was so bright, and nobody but himself in the castle, Juan could not resist the desire to walk in the forest and breathe the pure air. He had hardly taken a dozen steps before he felt refreshed; the cool air of the morning, the perfume of flowers made his blood bound; a ray of happiness glided into his sad little heart; a joyful smile curved his lips, when suddenly his cheerful face became pale and cold. He could hardly breathe, and was obliged to support himself against a tree. He had come, by a turn of the path, face to face with the captain.

The captain and his lieutenant Caralo were discussing a projected expedition. Josef Baptista cast a terrible look upon Juan, like the one he had given the unfortunate Bohemian, and without uttering a word, signed to his lieutenant to seize the trembling culprit. Juan was carried into the dining-saloon, stripped of his clothes, and Caralo, detaching from the wall a leather lash, made it ready to apply to the back of the shrinking child, with a care and precision which showed that he enjoyed the task. The other bandits, occupied with their breakfast, paid no attention to the cries and groans of poor Juan. When the captain entered, he seated himself gravely, and counted the strokes.

"Ten, twelve, fifteen—not so quick, Caralo,—sixteen, seventeen. Ah, see that! What is that—the sign on his left arm?"

"Nothing, captain," said Caralo, continuing to strike; "pay no attention to it; they are Arabian characters, religious or devilish signs that Moorish mothers put on their children when they are born."

"That proves that the little miserable fellow is not a Christian—eighteen, nineteen—as he is a pagan—"

"It would be wrong to spare him," continued Caralo, striking harder.

"Bravo, Caralo! One more stroke well applied!"

So well was it given, that Juan, whose body already dripped with blood, uttered a piercing shriek and fainted. The captain ordered vinegar to be brought, and the child was soon restored.

"It is well. Remember, Juan, what it is to disobey me; if it happens a second time, you will not fare so well. Remember Paco, the Bohemian."

From that day, Juan had neither the courage nor wish to leave the castle. When he went out, it was either with the captain, or by his orders, with instructions which he followed without wishing to comprehend the meaning, so much had terror and slavery paralyzed his faculties and dulled his intelligence. Oftentimes, when sent of an errand, he felt like falling on his knees and imploring the people to save him, but he feared the vengeance of the captain. He remembered with affright the day when, touched by the kind reception he had received from a rich man, he was going to throw himself on his knees and implore protection, when happening to look from the window, he saw Captain Josef Baptista Balseiro dressed like a rich cavalier.

Thus persuaded that this man was his evil genius, who saw all and knew all, Juan submitted in silence to a domination against which he had neither the strength nor power to struggle. To all travellers who asked admission, it was granted, and they were hospitably received. To them the captain denied nothing—not even the Jamaica rum of which he was so jealous, and after an excellent supper, they were conducted to a fine chamber, which Juan had never entered, but through the open door he had seen a splendidly decorated room with two beds. That chamber alone was at all elegantly furnished. One thing Juan remarked—that these travellers did not make their appearance in the morning, and he never saw them leave; often, even, they left without taking away their carriages, and leaving their horses in the stable. They would probably return some day.

CHAPTER V.

THE TWO GUESTS.

MORE than two years passed in this savage state, and the incessant brutality, little by little, was exercising an influence over Juan—an influence he did not perceive, and for which he was not accountable. When he have breathed the pure out-door air, and enter a close room or pestilential prison, we think we cannot remain there one instant; if compelled to, we get accustomed to it—not to live there, but to die there. The habitual contact with vice produces the same effect, even upon a good and honest nature; the disgust which it inspired at first does not prevent the contagion and death. The finest, sweetest flower, surrounded with filth, will fall defiled.

Juan seeing no other manners, no other examples than those which surrounded him, began to think that all the world was so—that Juniata and Pedralvi were exceptions which he should never meet again. Although young, he began to be indifferent. His natural instinct, which for a better guide he followed, showed him no more what was good or bad, except that from time to time some old remembrance made his heart beat. All the sap within him was withered; the tree existed still, but the finest branches were beginning to wither and die.

The lieutenant Caralo lost no occasion of annoying and vexing him, and he could seek no redress, for the hand of the captain was as heavy as that of the lieutenant, but the captain knew how to excite the gayety of the troops by wounding the vanity and pride of the child, and raising in his heart angry and vindictive feelings. Above all, when the lieutenant was angry—and that was often,—Juan was the victim of his bad humor.

One day, while he was drinking and playing, he ordered Juan to bring him his pipe, which Juan promptly brought, when he received thanks and a sound box on his ears. Juan was furious, and threw the pipe on the floor and broke it to pieces with his feet. The lieutenant thought a great deal of his pipe. The captain applauded, and the lieutenant rose, red and angry, from the table.

"Yes—bravo!" said the lieutenant; "for this time he shall die by my hand." Then turning to Juan, he said: "Count the pieces of my pipe (it was in a thousand pieces), and thou shalt receive as many lashes with the scourge."

He went to the wall and took down the fatal whip. Juan sprang to the table and seized a large carving-knife. All the bandits were astonished, and made a circle round them.

"Do not advance a step!" cried Juan, and his voice, ordinarily so feeble and low, was loud and firm. "I appeal to the captain; I appeal to these cavaliers. You have given me a blow when I did not deserve it, and I have heard you say to all that a blow is worth blood. Do not advance, or I will have yours!"

"Bravo!" exclaimed the captain, clapping his hands.

The lieutenant imitated the movements of the toradors, at the commencement of a bull-fight; then feigning, like them, to excite the animal to fury, he waved a red handkerchief which he held in his left hand, and with his right he flomished the whip around his head. The whole circle laughed at this ingenious pleasantry of the man, and he, animated by the bravos of the assembly, struck Juan with the end of the lash. Blind with rage, Juan threw himself upon him, and struck him with the knife. The lieutenant fell with a wild cry of rage and pain. The bandits rushed and seized Juan, and in a moment ten poignards would have found their way to his heart if the captain had not stopped them.

"Stop—by all the saints of Spain, stop! The combat is loyal and good."

"Too good," replied Caralo, fiercely.

"Bravo, Juan,—bravo!" continued the captain, paying no attention to his lieutenant. "And you, sirs, by Saint Juan Baptista, my patron, had better take care how you touch that young comrade, who knows how to use arms. Now that the young tiger has licked blood, I tell you for him, he is one of us. Come here, Juan, and you, Caralo, consider what he has done."

"Perhaps so," replied the lieutenant; "but I wish you to bear witness that he shall yet become acquainted with the blade of my poignard."

"You must take care of that," coldly answered the captain; "it is an affair of your own." Then when they carried away the lieutenant, he said to Juan, with the air of an affectionate master to his pupil: "The stroke was too low; it is necessary to strike higher."

From that day, Josef Baptista was not less brutal or coarse, for with him that was impossible, but more communicative to his young apprentice. Juan, in spite of his youth and his inexperience, commenced then to comprehend what road he followed and what guides were given him. The same discovery filled him with horror, and awoke in his heart all the good feelings nature had placed there. He was not yet initiated into all the mysteries of the order. The captain demanded from him a blind submission and passive obedience.

When any strangers came to pass the night there, the red chamber was always prepared for them, which excited his curiosity and anxiety; for one evening he thought he saw traces of blood on some of the furniture. But since then nothing had confirmed his suspicions. The chamber was very hand-some, airy, with two windows, one opening upon the wood, the other upon the court-yard; the apartment was perfectly private, and the door itself was provided on the inside with large bolts, which, when moved, could be heard on the outside. Nevertheless, as we have said, Juan rose very early, and placed himself like a sentinel in the room which served him for a chamber, which was the attic of the house; but he never saw the strangers go away, especially when their dress or equipage denoted wealth or rank. Juan made still another remark.

The master of the house always kept his guests company during their supper; the repast finished, they retired to their apartment, and the captain remained to drink; then when he had drank an hour or two, instead of going to bed, which was more proper, he descended to the cellar, and returned in a few minutes, bringing back neither bottle nor cup of wine. That was very mysterious; and despairing of discovering the reason for such conduct by thinking alone, Juan had many times, at a distance, followed to the staircase the captain. He had seen him descend the stairs and open a door with a key he always carried, and even leave the keys in the lock. There his discoveries ceased. One day, Juan had the audacity to go further, even to the door of the cellar. He followed behind the captain, saw him enter, and was about turning the key, when he thought he heard a noise. His courage fled, and he returned to his chamber and threw himself, trembling, upon his bed. Since then he had not dared to renew the attempt, and probably the mystery would always remain unsolved; for the captain was going to leave the castle for some time, for the repentation of the place, never good, had grown worse of late, and he deemed it prudent to absent himself for a time at least.

Disclosing to his friends his new projects, Baptista snipped with his companions, without his lieutenant Caralo. The latter had hardly recovered from his wounds, and his return among them frightened Juan; but although nearly well, the lieutenant preferred to remain in his chamber; he only asked for three bottles of wine, promising to drink but one. Caralo, seated at a table, drank slowly, and it was evident that he was concocting some projects of vengeance. The captain and his men drank to the health of their absent comrade, and joyously ate a soup placed before them, the perfume of which delighted Juan, who stood behind the captain to wait all orders.

Suddenly a loud knock was heard at the gate, and two strangers demanded admission, which of course was given them. The man who had opened the gate led into the room Gongarello and his niece Juniata. Juan felt ready to fall at recognizing them, and was obliged to support himself upon the captain's chair. The remembrance of Juniata and Pedralvi was too deeply engraven in his heart to be readily effaced. His first movement had been to rush forward and speak to her, to ask of her news of his friend the Bohemian, his only friend; but a fear, an indefinable shame, perhaps also an instinctive feeling of the danger which menaced them—all concurred to keep him pale and immovable behind the captain's chair. She did not recognize him, and he felt easier.

The captain courteously invited the guests to be seated, and sent for two more plates and more wine. When his guests had eaten a little, the captain, with a winning smile and gentle voice, asked them their names and where they came from.

"My name is Aben-Ahon, though I am called, in Pampeluna, Gongarello. This is my niece Juniata, who has been at the Golden Sun, where I placed her as servant. My occupation is that of a barber; but I had no peace; every month nearly I was denounced to the Inquisition, and finally I determined to sell my goods, which I did for two hundred ducats, which I have in my valise,—yes, I have them there."

Juan, frightened at the turn the conversation had taken, passed quickly behind the barber, and brushed against him rudely, while he whispered:

"Imprudent fellow, be silent."

"Take care, sir page, you hurt my shoulder with your bottle," said Gongarello, to Juan. Then turning to the captain, he continued: "Yes, seniors,—two hundred ducats in gold. I am going to establish myself in Madrid, where I have a relation."

Raising his glass, Josef Baptista, who had not lost a word of the recital, cried out:

"Permit me to drink a glass of this good wine to your success, to your health, and that of your niece."

"My niece does not drink wine, but I will drink for both," gaily replied the barber.

"You have been accused of being a sorcerer. By Saint Jacques!" cried the captain, "tell my fortune."

"Willingly, my host; your band."

The captain held out to him a hand remarkably small and soft. After having examined it attentively, the barber said, in a low voice:

"Your French wine troubles me. It must be so, for I see lines of wickedness and misfortune traced on your palm. It is incomprehensible, and I cannot tell you."

"Speak!"

"Will it not frighten you?"

"Nothing frightens me."

"Well, well; I am undecided. One line tells me that you will be burned, and another that you will be hung, or, as one contradicts the other, you see that my prediction signifies nothing;" and he laughed loudly.

He was the only one, for the men looked on in astonished silence, agreeing, in all probability, with the barber. The captain alone was unmoved. He handed a fresh glass of wine to his guest.

"And you, sir barber, since you are so wise, can you tell what fate awaits you?" he asked, smiling.

"I am never uneasy about the future," replied Gongarello, who was a barber as well as philosopher; "but I can tell you, without being a sorcerer, what will happen to me to-day and to-morrow."

Juan trembled and the bold captain turned pale.

"Where do you see that?"

"Parbleu! in your face. I see first that I have good company, an excellent dinner, and exquisite wine; it is not that which makes me anxious—it is what follows."

The captain's face grew paler; he tried to appear indifferent, and even gay, like Gongarello.

"Yes," continued the barber, "it is what follows that makes me anxious. I see by your air that you are a man who will make us pay dear for our repast; it is plain; it is your habit, and that of many of your brothers. You will find that we can defend ourselves. I cry when I am scorched!" And he laughed again—a laugh which seemed to the captain satirical.

For the first time in his life, the latter felt ill at ease, and was disconcerted; his brow was covered with sweat, and his face was pale and red by turns.

"Ah!" exclaimed the barber, "you have had feelings. We have made you sit up too long, and we had better retire to our couches."

"You are right; I am weary," said the captain; and he gave Juan orders to go and prepare the chamber for his guests.

CHAPTER VI.

THE RED CHAMBER.

JUAN took the captain's dark lantern and left the room; but he had gone but a few steps, when he stopped, and gave vent to his despair: "At the risk of my own life, I will save Juniata. But hush! The young girl and her uncle think of no danger. How can I warn them, when I know not myself what to fear?"

Recalling his senses, he ascended the stairs, and entered the fatal red chamber. It was the first door opening upon a long corridor. He entered with trembling, and began to arrange the chamber, seeking always for some appearance of danger, but found none. He opened the bed, arranged the pillows, but could discover nothing. In his haste, he upset and put out his lantern, which rolled on the floor. Stooping to pick up the lamp, he thought he saw a long crack surrounding each bed. Having found the lantern and relit it, he approached the light and examined the floor attentively. No longer any doubt; each bed was placed upon a kind of trap, not very closely joined, for he felt a current of cold air rushing up, proving beyond a doubt that there was an opening below. Juan could not tell exactly how, but he knew now too well that if Juniata and her uncle once put foot in that chamber, once laid on those beds, they were lost—they would never leave the castle.

"Never—never," cried he, "will I lead them to their destruction; I will die sooner!" and his heart beat violently, and his head felt on fire. What should he do? He could think of no way to liberate them. He glanced round the room, but saw no hope; he looked to the dome, seeking there for some means to effect the escape of his friends.

What was his terror to perceive, coming from the first landing, the lieutenant, who, with a poniard in his hand, placed himself at the entrance of the room, thus closing the passage and all hope of retreat. The lieutenant had seen him, he was sure, and Juan had nothing with which to defend himself, not even the carving-knife, as in his first combat. He felt all hope was gone, and in calm despair, waited his death; and yet in this terrible anxiety, his last regret was for his first benefactress, poor Juniata, whose death now seemed inevitable. He knew well that he could expect no pity or mercy from his ferocious adversary; but by an instinctive movement, he closed the lantern, which he still held in his hands, and the room and corridor was in darkness. The lieutenant advanced, with slow, soft steps, upon his toes, and Juan, immovable, leaning against the wall, calculated by the sound of his steps how soon he would be there. He seemed already to feel the cold poniard. The lieutenant nearly touched him, and he trembled, hearing his voice:

"That devil Juan—he was here; I saw him. But he was not alone; there were two—yes, two!" murmured the lieutenant, who was in that state when he saw double, which proved that he had forgotten the moderation which he had promised. He was tipsy.

Juan felt a little reassured, although the danger was nearly as great; for the lieutenant, when he had been drinking, was more ferocious than ever. He seized Juan by the arm, and he thought himself lost; but he heard the poniard which the lieutenant carried fall on the floor. Juan hastened to seize it; he listened to the lieutenant, who continued, in an unsteady voice:

"You come from below?"

"Yes," responded Juan, in a disguised voice.

"Is Juan there?"

"Yes."

"Well, listen, comrade; go find him, and lead me to my chamber."

A sudden thought seized Juan, and with a soft, slow step, he led the drunken wretch to the red chamber, and laid him on the bed.

"It is singular; my bed was, a little while ago, on the other side of the room; it will turn—everything turns to-day."

A moment more and he was asleep, and Juan rushed from the room, closing the door, and descended bravely to the dining-hall, where the captain, who awaited him, said to him, with an impatient air:

"All well?"

"Well," replied Juan; "the chamber for Señor Gongarello and his niece is ready, and I have the honor to conduct them there."

The barber took his hat and valise, while Juniata looked for her mantle. During the time, Juan, pale and motionless, resembled a statue of stone. The captain, who perceived his trouble, approached him. Juan trembled, and thought all was lost. But instead of his usual brutal tone, he said, softly:

"Thou beginnest to know what he fears? It is well, only it is necessary next time to have more indifference and assurance; but for the first time, it is not bad."

"We are ready. Good-night. To-morrow, señor, we will settle our account," said the barber.

"To-morrow," gravely said the captain, "all accounts will be settled. Good-night. Your apartment awaits you. For me, I remain a little longer with my friends, to drink another bottle."

He saluted them; then said, in a low voice, to Juan:

"Conduct them to their chamber, and then go to your own. I have nothing more for you to do to-day."

Juan, holding his lantern, passed before Gongarello and his niece. The door of the dining-hall closed behind them, and all three mounted the staircase. Juan, whose heart beat with alacrity, as well as joy, ascended so rapidly that the barber cried out, in a loud voice:

"Where does he go—where does he go to, the young scamp?"

The captain opened the door to learn the reason of the noise.

"It is I, master, who run up so fast, in my haste to get there, that my friends could not follow me," replied Juan, trembling.

"It is well," coldly said the captain, and retired and closed the door.

Hearing it reclose, Juan breathed more freely, and this time had courage enough to ascend more slowly. Arrived at the first landing, and passing the door of the red chamber, he stopped for an instant, unable to proceed.

"Is it here?" asked the barber.

"No," replied Juan, severely repressing a shudder, and he continued to ascend.

The barber, as well as Juniata, was surprised at the silent air and troubled face of their young guide. Keeping silent, but not without astonishment, they followed Juan as he mounted higher and higher. At last they arrived at the attic which served as a chamber for Juan. He made them enter, closed the door, and putting his hand over the mouth of the barber, who wished to speak, he whispered:

"Silence—silence, or you are lost!"

The barber felt his gaiety and indifference leave him on the instant.

"Lost—lost?" he stammered, but he could say no more, not even ask how—why? His teeth chattered and his limbs trembled.

"Juniata," continued Juan, "you do not remember me?"

"No, I do not," she answered, slowly, looking at him attentively.

"Have you forgotten the two poor little mendicants whom, two years ago, near the hotel of the Golden Sun, you kept from starving?"

"The friend of Pedralvi?" cried the young girl, blushing.

"Yes—Pedralvi, my friend, my comrade. What has become of him?"

"Since that time he has been near me, a servant in the hotel. He wept when I quitted him, and said he felt as if some misfortune would befall us."

"No, for I will be near you. Listen to me." And the faithful companion of Pedralvi, in a few words as possible, informed them in what kind of a hotel they were, what was the profession and projects of the captain, and the only chances which remained to them. "They will all be asleep in an hour. Then, according to his habit, the captain will descend into the cave. We must immediately descend then, and strive to leave this infernal house. By what means? I know nothing. We shall see when we are there. Await me. I will go and make a survey."

He left the barber and his niece more dead than alive, and descended a few stairs, and laying flat down, he listened, watching in the darkness, hearing the least noise. His watch was long. At last he heard the bandits rise, and with considerable noise, leave the dining-saloon and enter successively their chambers. He waited till all was quiet, then descended a few steps more, and stopped listening attentively. A minute or two the door of the dining-hall again opened. The captain came out, bearing a lantern in his hand.

He began to descend the steps which conducted to the cellar, leaving the large door open behind him. Juan slowly and carefully ventured to follow him. He softly closed the door and double locked it, drew out the bunch of keys and ascended with the greatest rapidity the stairs leading to his room.

"Now," said he, to his two friends, "there is no time to lose. Come. Among these keys we will find one which will open the gate leading to the wood. If we reach that, we can escape."

"You are our saviour," cried Juniata.

"There is no time for thanks. I have done nothing yet. Come quickly."

Gongarello tried to rise, but it was impossible. His head sank, his eyes closed, his limbs refused to do their office. At last, after a moment's unsuccessful struggling, he fell on to the bed, and, to the terror of Juniata and the despair of Juan, he was asleep. All their efforts to arouse him were useless. He stammered a few words, and fell back into unconsciousness again.

"Ah," cried Juan, "it is the wine—that pretended French wine! To run no danger, to make sure of their victim, they have drugged the wine. It is useless to attempt to rouse him."

"I understand—I understand!" cried Juniata, despairingly.

"If we could carry your uncle, but that is impossible. Let us hasten to descend, for you, my dear benefactress, must be saved, and we have lost time now."

"No," said Juniata, resolutely,—"I will not abandon my uncle."

"And I, Juniata, will not leave you. We will all three die together," and he seated himself beside her on the bench.

Clasping her hands, Juniata prayed fervently to the God of Mahomet for Pedralvi, her uncle, Juan and herself. Juan almost wept for joy that he should be remembered in her prayers—she, so good, and he the associate of vile robbers.

Just then a terrible noise was heard, and with clasped hands they awaited their dreadful fate. The noise came from below, and was of an indescribable character. The listeners were the more alarmed, as the human heart is the more appalled, the more vague are the dangers that menace it.

CHAPTER VII.

THE LAST HOPE.

A fierce combat raged in the cellar between the lieutenant and captain. The former had awakened upon feeling his bed descend, and instantly divined the reason; he knew he was to be strangled. He threw himself at the throat of his assailant, who, not expecting such a reception, had been overthrown, he and his lantern, by this vigorous attack. The two combatants rolled on the ground, and their strength, nearly equal, was redoubled by rage. They fought with teeth and feet, for the lieutenant had no arms, and the captain's pistol had fallen to the ground in the commencement of the struggle. All the bandits were awakened by the frightful noise in the cellar.

"To the rescue!" cried Carugo. "A troop of alguazils or familiars of the Inquisition assassinate our captain! Let us break the door, my friends!"

Some armed with mattocks, others with iron spikes and beams, which for a long time resisted their endeavors. That was the cause of the noise the two prisoners heard; the third heard nothing.

"All hope is gone!" cried Juan, who had gone to the head of the staircase to listen, and who divined what was passing. "We could not fly if we wished it now. All the robbers are on foot; behold them running hither and thither through the house; and if they come here to call me!"

He looked at Juniata in affright, and the poor girl, now fully realizing the danger awaiting her, threw herself into Juan's arms, crying, involuntarily:

"Save me—save me!" Then she looked at her uncle, and said, letting her arms drop: "Feel that I am, it is impossible!"

"No, no," cried Juan, struck with a sudden thought, "no—it is not impossible!"

The attic in which were the three prisoners had only one window overlooking the forest. Juan pushed open the shutter, letting the moonlight stream in, and Juniata, looking out, perceived the trees waving in the night wind.

"You see there is yet another means of safety."

"I understand; yes—thanks be to Heaven, it is very high; and if they come, I can throw myself out—"

"No—not throw yourself out, but descend," said Juan.

"How? and my uncle?"

"I will take care of him," and stepping out on to the roof, Juan showed a cord fastened to a pulley. "If you have no fear, and will trust yourself to me, I can save you."

"Yes, I will," merely answered the young girl.

Then making a loop, he passed the cord around her body and under her arms.

"Do not look at the abyss when you descend; close your eyes until your feet touch the ground, then send the cord back to me, and be ready to receive your uncle."

And with the greatest care he lowered the young girl carefully out of the window. It was a fearful height, but the cord was strong, and the girl cool and brave, and willing to die rather than fall into the hands of the robbers. Doubtless Juniata arrived safely, for the cord, when he pulled it, felt light and came unburdened. Now was the barber's turn, and fastening the cord round him in the same manner, he lowered him down. He listened attentively and heard a slight noise, and drew up the loose cord. This time he was to make the descent alone. Securely fastening the cord, he fearlessly launched himself into the air, slowly allowing the cord to wind till he reached the ground, and felt himself seized by two arms.

"Is it you, dear friends, and without accident?" he asked.

He was answered in the affirmative by two voices, for the aerial voyage had produced a good effect on the barber, and dissipated the influence of the opiate; and Gongarello was launching into a volume of thanks, when Juan silenced him, and began to make his way through the forest. All three marched forward bravely. They had walked scarcely an hour, when sleep again crept over the poor barber, in spite of all his endeavors to the contrary.

"Again!" exclaimed Juan.

"Yes, my boy,—a bad dream," murmured the barber, and he slept again.

"Do you hear nothing?" said Juniata.

"Yes—I hear the tramp of horses," said Juan, after bending his ear to the ground.

The sounds grew louder, and very soon they could hear voices and distinguish words:

"No, Kaled,—no, my good companion; let us rest an instant."

These words were pronounced in the Arabic tongue, and Juniata, who understood them, exclaimed:

"Fear nothing; he speaks the language of the country; he is a Moor."

And Juan, quitting the cover of the wood, threw himself on his knees before the horse, who leaned and turned aside.

"I understand," said the young man; "it is a race he does not love—a Spanish beggar." Then addressing Juan, he said, in pure Castilian: "It is very late to ask alms. If thy companions are hid in the wood, tell them that in the morning I will have money to give them, but to-night I have only steel." Laying his hand on his sword, he said: "Go!"

Juniata, who had been watching intently, sprang out, exclaiming, in Arabic:

"Friend—friend, and child of the same God!"

At these words, the young man sprang from his horse, which he gave in charge of a servant, and holding out his hand, said, in the language of his fathers:

"See me, brother; what wishest thou?"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

NEAPOLITAN BOATS.

BOATS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

We have grouped together on this page several pictures delineating different kinds of boats used in foreign countries, and remarkable for peculiarity of construction. In a former article we made some mention of the history of boat-building, and showed that the raft was probably the pioneer of all naval constructions. The first picture represents a group of Neapolitan boats. Their sails have a very singular appearance from the great curvature of the yards, and are unlike anything we see in our own waters. The second picture shows as the very singular boats employed on the Ganges, in India. It would seem almost impossible for boats with so much top-hamper, and such clumsy sails, to navigate with safety. The Ganges has many peculiarities about it, and requires great skill in its navigation. It is navigable throughout the year for small boats to the base of the Himalaya range, and during six months in the year, for boats of a larger size. The number of boats of various kinds on the river is estimated at upwards of thirty thousand, for the most part crazy and ill-constructed vessels. Those in the districts of Bengal and Chittagong have high heads, with large clumsy rudders suspended by ropes, and worked by helmsmen raised at a great height above the vessel. Bishop Heber gives a description of a Ganges boat in Bengal, which he characterizes as the simplest and rudest of all possible structures. "It is decked over throughout its whole length with bamboo, and on this is erected a low is both clumsily built and ill-managed. Many of the boats are floating-ships; cargoes of glass, cutlery, perfumes, etc., being carried as high as the stream will admit, and sold to any purchasers who may be met on the way. The whole system of internal navigation in India, however, is now undergoing a mighty change by the introduction of steam. Some of the towns on the upper course of the Ganges are practically, in respect to time, fatigue, discomfort, freightage and insurance, as far from Calcutta as Calcutta is from England, when the navigation is conducted in the boats of the country; but by the introduction of steamboats, having a burden of about sixty tons, and drawing only two feet of water, a change has been wrought which promises to be of the highest importance. In Singapore, one of the East India Company's possessions, the natives employ the curious flat-sterned boats seen in the last engraving of this series. The deck of these boats has about the form of a common flat-iron, and their great breadth prevents their capsizing readily. Our third engraving represents a couple of the sailing-boats used on the River Nile, in Egypt, moored side by side. Some of them are quite elegant vessels and good sailers. Mr. Lane, speaking of the interior navigation of Egypt, says:—"The navigation of the Nile employs a great number of the natives of Egypt. The boatmen of the Nile are mostly strong, muscular men. They undergo severe labor in rowing, poling and towing, but are very cheerful, and often the most so when most occupied, for then they frequently amuse themselves by singing. In consequence of the continual changes which take place in the bed of the Nile, the most experienced pilot is liable frequently to run his vessel aground; in such an occurrence, it is often necessary for the crew to descend into the water to shove off the boats with their backs and shoulders. On account of their being so liable to run aground, the boats of the Nile are generally made to draw rather more water at the head than the stern, and hence the rudder is necessarily very wide. The better kind of boats used on the Nile, which are very numerous, are of a simple but elegant form, mostly between thirty and forty feet in length, with two masts, two large triangular sails, and a cabin next the stern, generally about four feet high, and occupying about a third or fourth the length of the boat. In most of these boats the cabin is divided into two or more apartments. Sudden whirlwinds and squalls being very frequent on the Nile, a boatman is usually employed to hold the sheet in his hand, that he may be able to let it fly at a moment's notice." Wilkinson gives rather a fuller account of the Nile boats, dividing them into the "djerm," and the "maadil," which carry corn up and down the Nile; the "aggub," carrying stone; the "sandal," a sort of ship's boat; the "gaarib," a fishing-boat, and the "maadeeh," a ferry-boat. The "maash," the "dababeh," and the "cangia," are three forms of passenger-boats, usually hired by Europeans in making the voyage from Alexandria to Cairo; the larger ones having two cabins, but the smaller ones only a single cabin, and many travellers cause an awning to be fitted up in front of the cabin, so as to enjoy what breeze

HINDOO BOATS ON THE GANGES.

SAILING BOATS ON THE RIVER NILE.

light fabric of bamboo and straw, exactly like a small cottage without a chimney. This is the cabin, baggage rooms, etc.; here the passengers sit and sleep, and here, if it be intended for a cooking-boat, are one or two ranges of brick-work, like English hot-hearth, but not rising more than a few inches above the deck, with small round sugar-loaf holes, like those in a lime-kiln, adapted for dressing victuals with charcoal. As the roof of this apartment is far too fragile for men to stand or sit on, and as the apartment itself takes up nearly two-thirds of the vessel, upright bamboos are fixed by its side, which support a kind of grating of the same material, immediately above the roof, on which, at the height, probably, of six or eight feet above the surface of the water, the boatmen sit or stand to work the vessel. They have for oars long bamboos with circular ends, a large one of the same kind to steer with, one and sometimes two sails of a square form (or rather broader above than below), of a very coarse and flimsy canvass. Nothing can seem more clumsy and dangerous than these boats; dangerous I believe they are, but with a fair wind they sail over the water merrily." One form of the Ganges boat is called the "badgerow." It is used as a passage-boat, and is generally accompanied by a luggage-boat, in which the cooking is conducted, while a third boat, smaller than either of the others, and called a "dinghee," keeps up a communication between them in the event of one being fixed on a shoal. Another kind, called the "pulwar," is employed for the conveyance of goods, and

FLAT-STERNED BOAT OF SINGAPORE.

WICKER BOAT OF THE RIVER WYE.

there may be stirring, without exposure to the torrid heat of the sun. Our fourth engraving represents the "coracle," or wicker-boat, used on the River Wye, England. It is a sort of basket covered with water-proof material, and may be transported readily on the back of a man, as seen in our picture. These sort of boats are of great antiquity. At Toombundra, in Hindostan, they have a curious mode of making basket-boats. They are circular, and of various sizes, from three to fifteen feet in diameter, but very shallow; yet some of them will hold thirty persons. In making them, a number of pieces of split bamboo are laid on the ground, crossing each other near the centre, and are then fastened with thongs; the ends of the bamboos are then elevated by several persons, and fixed asunder at proper distances by means of stakes, in which position they are bound by other long slips of bamboo; the latter are introduced alternately over and under the pieces first crossed, and tied at the intersections to preserve the shape. This being completed, beginning from the bottom towards the centre, the parts above the intended height or depth of the boat are cut off, and it is covered with half-dressed hides fastened together with thongs. These simple basket-boats are so easy of construction, that it is said one may be made by six men in as many hours, and the two principal materials used—hides and bamboo—are always at hand. The boats are navigated either by paddles where the water is deep, or are pushed over a shallow bottom by long poles.

FERDINAND II. KING OF THE SICILIES.

We present on this page a well-engraved and authentic likeness of Ferdinand II., King of the Two Sicilies, a potentate about whom so much has been said, recently, in the public prints, and who is a type of those bigoted despots who rule some parts of Europe with a rod of iron, filling their dungeons with noble men who dare assert the rights of the people, violating their own pledges, and preparing the way for convulsion and bloodshed in the future. Ferdinand does not look like the bigoted and tyrant that he is; but nothing is more deceptive than royal appearances. One would take him to be an honest, pompous and somewhat thickheaded military officer, and not the unamiable character which his acts avouch him. Ferdinand II., King of the Two Sicilies, is descended from Henry IV. of France. Of the family of the Bourbons, four sovereigns have already ruled this kingdom. The first was Charles III., who assumed the reins of government in 1734, by the cession of Philip IV., by the unanimous consent of the Two Sicilies, by the investiture of Clement XII., and by the conditions of peace signed at Aix-la-Chapelle. Called to rule over Spain, Charles was succeeded on the throne of this country by his son, Ferdinand IV., who, after the Congress of Vienna, assumed the title of Ferdinand I. On his death his son, Francis I., succeeded to the paternal throne in 1825; and, after a short reign of five years, was succeeded by his son Ferdinand II., the present sovereign, in 1830. His majesty was first married to Maria Christina, of the house of Savoy—a princess so beloved that her acts, even to the present day, form some of the most cherished traditions of the people. Her body within the last two or three years has been disinterred, and placed in a new sarcophagus. Miracles have been attributed to her, and her pious and loyal husband has already taken the first steps preliminary to her beatification. By this princess his majesty had one son, Francis Leopold, who was born January 16th, 1835, and who is heir to the throne. His majesty was married a second time to Maria Teresa of Austria, daughter of the Archduke Charles. By this lady he has had issue:—Luigi Maria, Count of Trani, born 1838; Alfonso Maria, Count of Caserta, born 1841; Maria Annunziata, born 1843; Maria Clementina Immacolata, born 1844; Gaetano Maria, Count of Girgenti, born 1846; Pasquale, Count of Bari, born 1852. His majesty's character and policy have of late been so much discussed that it is almost unnecessary to enter on the subject. Fully impressed with a belief in his divine rights, he belongs rather to the fifteenth than the nineteenth century. Superstitious by nature, and from policy disposed to make the most of it, he at once enslaves and attaches a portion of the public mind. Firm to obstinacy he resists all counsel; as a rule, acts in opposition to it, and doubts every resolution which does not emanate from his own royal head. Thus a minister must needs be nothing more than a registrar of his will; his majesty seeks such men to serve him, and all

FERDINAND II., KING OF THE TWO SICILIES.

but such have retired into private life. The great facts by which Ferdinand II. will be known to history, are the publication of the Constitution on the 10th of February, 1848: "In the name of the Most Holy God, Omnipotent, One and Three," and the swearing to observe it on the Holy Gospel, etc., on the 24th of February, 1848, in the presence of royal princes, the ministers, the officers of the army, the magistracy and the high officers of state. From that time to this the policy of the king has been one continued act in violation of his oath; his name has become a byword, his rule has been a scourge to his people, and a source of controversy and discussion in Europe. Such are a few details of the life and character of Ferdinand II., King of the Two Sicilies.

BARON VON HUMBOLDT IN HIS STUDY.

Let us turn from the portrait of one of the scourges of humanity to a very different character, one of its noblest illustrations, the man of science of two centuries. Our picture is a quiet, interior scene, and shows us the author of "Cosmos" in his quiet study, surrounded by those mute but eloquent companions, his beloved books. Though the figure of the philosopher is drawn on a small scale, still it is a striking likeness of his face and person, while his surroundings are delineated with accuracy. The room he occupies is plain and neat, with little of that litter and confusion thought to be indispensable to genius. A sofa, table and a few chairs, form all the furniture. On the wall hangs a map of the world. The large window admits abundance of light, and the whole apartment has an air of comfort. Though the weight of years has bowed the frame of the philosopher, still he enjoys good health, and his noble mind is as vigorous as ever. Frederick Henry Alexander, Baron Von Humboldt was born at Berlin, September 14, 1769, and is consequently now in his 88th year. He studied at Göttingen, at Frankfurt on the Oder and at Hamburg, but his whole life has been a course of study. In 1791 we find him a student of mining and botany in the mining school of Freiberg. In 1792 he was appointed assessor in the mining and smelting department, and soon after removed to Baureuth, as overseer of the mines of Franconia. He has published, from time to time, works of the highest scientific value, the mere enumeration of which would occupy a large space. In 1795 he voluntarily relinquished his office for the purpose of travelling. In company with Aimé Bonpland, the French naturalist, he set out for South America in 1799, travelled for four years in that country, drawing and recording the sylvia, the fauna, the geology, mineralogy, natural history and phenomena of that wonderful country. Among the rich collections of the two naturalists, were 6300 kinds of plants. The results of this scientific tour were given to the world in a series of volumes published in splendid style. He has since travelled extensively in Europe, daily adding to his stores of knowledge, and from time to time communicating to the world his discoveries and observations. His career is a noble example of a well-spent life, and his remarkable longevity, notwithstanding his severe mental toil, is an encouragement to students. His mind is still vigorous and active, and his spirits buoyant as a young man's.

BARON VON HUMBOLDT IN HIS STUDY.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

NO MORE AMONG THE WOODLANDS.

BY FRANK FREELOVE.

No more among the woodlands
We'll go in search of flowers,
Or haunt the dreamy lowlands
To find the fairy bowers;
For the tempest spirit's coming,
While he withers all the leaves—
And his chill breath o'er us humming,
A misty banner weaves.

No more among the woodlands
We'll wander forth at morn,
To cull us dewy garlands,
Our tresses to adorn;
For the Frost King mows the garlands,
And he scatters all the leaves—
While the Tempest o'er the lowlands
His misty banner weaves.

No more among the woodlands
We'll wander forth at eve—
Weird Solitude in lowlands
Will sit her down and grieve;
For the birds long since departed,
Warbled forth a long good-by—
And they leave her lonely-hearted
Beneath a northern sky.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SHADOW ON THE PILLOW.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

THE sun was just rising over the green hills above the town of Kirkcubright in Scotland, and shedding his rays over the silver water of the Solway. It rose on a mourning group that was assembled at a low, picturesque house at the upper end of the town; for Donald Murray, the only son of the family inhabiting it, was to set off on that morning to join the army.

The elder Murray was a fine specimen of the true Scottish peasantry. Shrewd, calculating and somewhat cold, in matters that did not come very near the heart, he yet preserved a corner in that heart where the tenderest and kindest emotions still dwelt. On that morning, those emotions were all called forth. The father triumphed over the man; for his pride and affection for this son was one of the strongest bonds that he recognized.

Murray's wife had been dead for several years, and her place was supplied in the family by the eldest daughter, Catherine. Two younger sisters, with Donald, completed the family. Donald had ever been distinguished for his daring and adventurous spirit; and added to this, he possessed what few knew of him—a strong poetical taste, and a heart alive to every keen sense of the true and beautiful.

Bred a peasant, dependent on the occupation of a gardener, he had lived in almost complete seclusion, keeping within his heart the beautiful fancies which so enchain his being, yet finding constant food for them in that very occupation. The lightest flower that opened under his fostering hand was a revelation of beauty to the lowly Scottish gardener. The tiniest bird that built in the overhanging trees, was to him a wonder and a delight; and already he had filled numberless sheets with his rude but correct drawings of birds, flowers and insects, which, with slender materials, he had colored to the life. But all these things he had kept to himself. Only his twin-sister, Rose, knew of her brother's gentle nature, and of these quiet pursuits.

Outside of his own family, he had another reputation—that of bravery and courage. Donald Murray had never looked on another's wrongs without trying to prevent or avenge them. His heart, while it was gentle as a woman's, was yet bold as a lion's; and, in his own neighborhood, he had been known from a boy as the champion of the oppressed. Among this class, was the orphan child of a man with whom his father had been on terms of intimacy for years. Robert Ashton died, and left his only daughter to the care of a man by the name of Nevis, who already held most of Ashton's hard earnings, and who, he thought, would certainly protect his fatherless child, and look after the little fortune he should leave her. Nevis, a whining, snuffling churchman, untrue to his religion, grasping in his pecuniary matters, and hard and selfish in his exactions from others, grew positively dishonest, when entrusted with little Flora's small fortune, and treated the child with real cruelty, either from the hope that she would die under his treatment, or become a household drudge in his family, thereby saving the expense of a servant to his sickly and complaining wife.

It roused Donald's indignation, when little Flora Ashton would pass the gate of the garden where he was employed, bare-footed, and with a heavy basket poised on her head, such as only a strong boy should have carried. When he passed the house of Nevis, he had frequently seen the delicate child of fourteen years, laying out large webs of cloth upon the bleaching ground, washing heavy clothes at the spring, and even carrying large burdens of wood. Once, too, he had heard passionate words, and the sounds of a blow, from within the house, and he was certain that the voice was that of Mrs. Nevis, whose temper was a well-known theme in the neighborhood. At the same time, Flora came out of the house with her cheeks red and swollen, and the purple mark of a broad hand on her white neck, which even hard-ship had not spoiled. Donald longed to go in and strike the heartless woman for her cruelty to such a being as Flora Ashton; but he wisely considered that he might do the child more injury than benefit, and he contented himself with following her down to the spring, to which she was carrying a basket of clothes for the bleaching ground.

He came up with her as soon as she arrived at a distance from which Mrs. Nevis's prying eyes could no longer discern her. She had done weeping; but there was an expression of settled grief, almost of despair, on the poor child's face, which touched the noble and pitying heart of Donald Murray. He took the basket from her hand, and went with her to the spring, wet the cloth and spread it upon the heather, and then talked with her, calmly and seriously, about her present condition in the family of Nevis.

Encouraged by his sympathy, she weepingly told him the hardships and privations to which she was subjected, and Donald's manly heart bled afresh at her recital. She had no idea that she had any right to leave Nevis, or to resist the cruelty to which she was exposed.

"You know I must hear it, Donald," she innocently answered to his execrations upon Nevis and his wife; "I must hear it, and I do, as patiently as I can; though sometimes I feel that I must have done wrong, when Mr. Nevis prays at night and sets forth all my faults in his prayer."

"Canting, lying hypocrite!" exclaimed Donald. "Don't tell me any more, Flora, or I shall want to go and strangle him and his abominable wife."

"Ah!" sighed Flora, "it is bad enough for him—a man—to be so savage, but when she gives way to her temper, it seems a great deal more terrible to me. Besides, Mr. Nevis, himself, never strikes me; he only encourages her."

"Say no more, Flora," he said. "I shall go mad if I hear anything more. Come with me instantly; nay, you must come to my father and sisters, and see if nothing can be done to relieve you from this bondage."

He led the weeping girl home to his father's roof, interested them all in her case, and represented to Mr. Murray how the child of his friend had been treated. Measures were taken that very day, to free the child from her tyrants, and she entered their house no more.

Nevis and his wife raged and stormed in vain. The powerful arm of the law made him account for every farthing of her father's property, and enough was obtained of him to send Flora to a respectable school in the southern parish of Kirkcubright, over which two English ladies had long presided. From this school she had come, at the regular vacations, for three years, to spend a few weeks in the family of her deliverer, for so she considered Donald Murray.

On his part, Donald, whose pity had been so thoroughly awakened, began, as Flora grew older, to experience a tenderer sensation. Of the beautiful ideals which had filled the imagination of the young gardener, Flora Ashton was the perfect realization; and, as she grew fairer and lovelier every year, under the fostering care of the two amiable women who instructed her, she was beginning to assume a height in his fancy to which he hardly dared to look up. She, a beautiful, accomplished and educated girl, and he, a simple gardener!

Had he known that the youths of many noble families, who came to visit their sisters at the school, from Glasgow and Edinburgh, were not half so noble, in the eyes of Flora, as the gardener of Kirkcubright, he would have marvelled how it could be so; but such was the fact; and even when the young Lord Rothwell condescended to notice the beauty of her figure, and praise her splendid hair, compliments which his sister repeated to Flora, she turned away from the flattery, with a silent wish that the words had come from Donald Murray.

The vacation season, falling as it did, in the month of roses, was the jubilee of the year to Donald. For her coming he preserved the rarest and most beautiful of his floral offerings. For this he labored to build and ornament the finest boat that was launched on the Solway. And it was his delight, on moonlight evenings, to take her out on the river, with his father and sisters, and to watch her undisguised pleasure on the little voyage. It was then that she would sing the beautiful English songs, that came so sweetly in her Scottish accent, now tempered and meliowed from the tone she had imperceptibly caught from her instructresses. Even the elder Murray, who had little of poetic or musical inspiration, acknowledged that the "poor orphan lassie had an unco pleasant voice;" and Rose would sit with her arm round Flora's waist, trying to catch and imitate the sweet Southern sound; while Catherine and Mysie would listen to her songs, pleased without knowing why, at the strain which sounded so oddly in their Scottish ears.

After these happy weeks, Flora would go back to school, with something like a shadow on her girlish brow, and a weight on her heart, that she had not experienced since the days when the brawny Nevis and his hysterical wife had held rule and sway over her. And Donald would go back to the garden, where the flowers seemed to have lost their beauty, and the voices of the birds their melody; for he could not help acknowledging to himself, that Flora Ashton, with her singular beauty, her talents and cultivation, might, and would look higher than the poor gardener. At such times he would passionately exclaim: "Why does she then allow me to think that she likes me? Why does she permit me to press her hand, and look for hours into those soft eyes, which perhaps are only lighting me to my ruin? O, Flora! you are either very cruel to me, or kinder than I can believe!"

To none, not even to his darling sister Rose, did Donald murmur these fancies. Like a true poet, he kept all his own sorrows closely locked within his breast, and only sung of imaginary griefs. But the true spirit of poetry was now actually developed, and already he had written much that was very sweet and touching. Some of these effusions he had given to Flora, who valued them above all price, and kept them as hidden treasures. Another memorial which she cherished, was a roughly executed but remarkably correct likeness of himself, which Donald had drawn in the leisure hours of the preceding winter. It was a noble head, and did more justice to his genius than credit to his materials, which were of the rudest kind. But Flora looked only at the perfect resemblance; and after many ineffectual attempts, on her part, to carry it off, she succeeded on her last visit, in obtaining it.

She hung the drawing in her chamber, at school, where she could see it the moment she waked in the morning. It was admired by all as a fancy head, and Flora never breathed to any one that it had an original. With this before her, she became more contented than she had usually been on her first return to the southern parish, after a vacation. And yet she hardly knew why it was that this picture afforded her such a perfect satisfaction. She thought that perhaps it was because Donald resembled her from the hands of Nevis; but as the elder Murray had taken a large part in the matter, she ought to have felt quite as much pleased with the portrait which Donald had executed, with a still greater portion of artistic skill, of his father, and which also graced the opposite wall of her chamber.

Many were the jeers which her volatile companions bestowed upon her, for the care with which she cherished this treasure; and they more than half suspected that it was a true resemblance to some one whom Flora knew. She had given it a beautiful frame, placed a glass over its surface, and hung a wreath of bright immortelles around it.

The school at Kirkcubright boasted of one pupil, at least, of noble blood. This was the sister of the young Lord Rothwell. Lady Alice Keith, a sweet, gentle girl, who had attached herself to Flora from the moment she entered the school. By her own request, Flora shared her chamber, and henceforth the two girls, equal in everything but rank, were inseparable.

One day, Flora was surprised to hear that some one was asking for her, in the parlor. She went down with some trepidation, and was struck by the apparition of Donald Murray. She did not know that two of the young girls had looked from the window and instantly recognized the original of her favorite drawing, in the noble head of the person who had vanished so lightly from his horse, at the gateway.

Flora approached him with a beating heart. His look was grave, and she feared that he had some unpleasant news to communicate of the family. He did not keep her long in suspense. He told her that he had enlisted in the army, and would join the troops going to the Crimea on the following day. Her emotion satisfied him that he had, at least, some interest in her heart; for she burst into a flood of tears, and hid her face upon his shoulder. It almost unmanned him.

"Why do you go, Donald?" she at length found voice to ask.

"Shall I tell you, Flora?" he said. "I go to win a name, and I will do it, or die on the field."

Flora shuddered.

"Nay, I go, Flora, that I may one day be worthy of you—of your love. You will not think me beneath you, when I have won that name, dearest, will you?"

"O, Donald, you are cruel, now? When did Flora Ashton ever think herself above the noble friend who rescued her from drudgery and oppression?"

"Well, I was wrong, perhaps. But say, Flora, may I hope that, if I serve the queen faithfully and well, my other and dearer queen will smile upon my return?"

The half hour was up which the Misses Macleesfield allowed to visitors; and Flora was obliged to send Donald away; but before he went, they were pledged for life or death, for good or evil, for earth or heaven.

The troops passed through the southern parish of Kirkcubright, on their way to join the English regiment. The pupils had a respite from study, in order that they might see them; and such was the excitement, that no one missed Flora, until Agnes Dean cried out:

"Look, Lucy; there is the man who came to see Flora Ashton, yesterday! Flora, here is the original of your favorite drawing!"

Flora was not there. She was sobbing in her chamber, with her head buried in the pillow, to shut out the sound of the drum. That was indeed an hour of agony, and the prelude to many more; for she watched the lightest tidings from the Crimea with an interest which took from her all power to think of aught else.

June arrived—but Flora could not bear to go home to Mr. Murray's. She could not bear the sympathy of Rose, to whom she knew that Donald would confide their engagement, and she gladly accepted the cordial invitation of Lady Alice Keith, to pass the vacation with her at her father's, in Edinburgh.

Gentle, modest and well bred, graceful and lady-like in her manners, and simple and yet elegant in her mourning dress, which she still wore, there was nothing in her station, as the daughter of a solicitor at Kirkcubright, which would appear strange or incongruous, as the guest of the good and simple Earl of Rothwell, and his sweet daughter, Alice. So far from this, they felt a positive honor, as well as satisfaction, in receiving a young lady who had distinguished herself above all others, at Misses Macleesfield's celebrated school; and they introduced her, with conscious pride, to their numerous other guests.

Had it not been for the thought of the absent soldier, Flora's visit would have been delightful. As it was, it proved exceedingly gratifying, and she carried away with her many pleasant memorials to write to Donald.

Alas! every breeze from the Crimea wafted evil tidings from the gallant troops. The sounds of suffering, of privation, almost of despair, came with every blast that swept over the expanse of waters. How would it be with Flora's gallant soldier? One letter she received from him, by which she knew that he well deserved to be called by that name. It was after one of those heavily fought, but ineffectual battles, before Sevastopol, when so many "gallant soldiers" lay, "with their feet to the foe," in the trenches. Donald had deserved and received the thanks of his commander, for his brave and fearless conduct, by which he had more than once signalized himself.

Flora read this letter with an exulting pride, which, for a short time, dispelled, or rather overpowered her fears. Now, she went gladly to the little home among the hills of Kirkcubright, and carried news that made the father's heart glad, for he, too, had pride, as well as love, for his son. And Rosa's gentle eyes overflowed with tears for the brother who seemed a part of herself, and from whom this was her first separation, since the day when their mother's angel spirit had blessed their birth, and then departed, to watch their future from a higher world. And Catherine and Mysie, intent on household cares, were making up clothes for that dear brother, which they hoped would reach him with the first supplies from England. It was a new phase in the lives of the hitherto quiet and home-loving family; but they met it hopefully and courageously, as Donald had exhorted them to do, at parting.

Another and another letter came, and with it, with pardonable pride, Donald sent the printed report of "the bravery and courage of private Murray;" and again and again did Flora's heart beat high with exultation. Again was heard, in the little parlor at Kirkcubright, the voice of thanksgiving and prayer, from the lips of the aged and venerable father, now almost past the active labor of life, and looking forward to his son as to the pillar and support of his declining years, and the protector of his daughters. Then came sad news indeed. The Scottish troops had suffered severely, and great anxiety was felt for the absent Donald. Un- certainly was stamped on every face, and the next tidings were anticipated with dread and apprehension.

At last, a letter came for Flora, directed in an unknown hand. She trembled as she held it in her grasp, unable to break the seal. Her head grew dizzy, and she would have fallen to the floor, had not Alice Keith caught her in her arms.

To Alice she had, at last, confessed that the original of her beloved portrait was her lover, and to her she had communicated, from time to time, the hopes and fears which his letters had awakened.

The sympathizing girl led her to the bed, from whence she could see Donald's picture; and breaking the seal from the letter, she hesought Flora to lie down and read it.

"He is dead!" said Flora. "He would have written me himself, had he been living."

"Not so, dear Flora. Sick he may be, but surely alive. Do not give way to apprehension in this matter. Nay, dear," she continued, resolutely putting her arms around her, and placing the open letter before her eyes, "nay, dear, you shall read it."

"I cannot read the words," gasped Flora. "Read it, Alice. I will try to hear it."

She covered her eyes with her hands and listened:

"A friend of Donald Murray, is requested by him to inform Miss Ashton that, in the terrible battle of yesterday, he was wounded severely in the right arm. The surgeon has pronounced amputation necessary; and it will be performed this evening. The friends of Eosign Murray have reason to be proud of his gallant conduct in yesterday's conflict. The papers, one of which is all I can procure to send you, are teeming with his bravery. In fact, the queen has no better men in her regiment than the Scottish troops."

"Later.—Miss Nightingale is at this moment with your friend, earnestly begging the surgeons to defer the amputation until morning, which they have promised her to do. She thinks it may not be needed, if inflammation does not supervene during the night. Your friend looks the thanks which he is too weak to speak; yet he whispers to me in broken words, 'Tell Flora to hope!'"

"Morning.—Miss Nightingale is again by his bedside, having gone the entire rounds of the hospital since I wrote last night. The arm, she says, is doing well. She bends over him like an angel of mercy; and he looks at her with a reverential gaze, that tells how deep is his thankfulness."

"Thursday.—Murray's arm is out of danger of being amputated. He is very weak from loss of blood, but has talked with me at intervals to-day, and told me of you, and of the deep anxiety which you would feel. He says, 'Tell Flora I owe it all to one whom, in gentleness and courage, she most nearly resembles—Florence Nightingale.' After a while, he raised his feeble head, and said: 'Tell her that I kiss the shadow of that angel form every time it has fallen on my pillow!'"

"Friday Morning.—The despatches are ready to be sent off, and I can only say that Murray is gaining slowly. I trust he will soon be able to write you himself, or at least, dictate. With many kind wishes, I am yours with great sympathy and respect."

WARRINGTON LINCOLN.

Flora was sobbing with both grief and joy, on her pillow, and uttering blessings on the noble woman whose courage and presence of mind had thus saved Donald from becoming a cripple.

"He will be sent home!" she said, "and then, dearest Alice, I can be all to him that she is now."

But weeks and months went by. A few lines painfully pencilled by Murray's left hand, were received from time to time; but the news came slowly and scantily. Hunger and thirst, cold and fatigue, were doing what the battle had only begun, and Flora's hopes were darkening into dread with each succeeding day.

Unable to bear the sight of a book, or to hear the sound of the music lessons—unable to attend to her own duties in school—she asked leave of absence, and went to the house among the hills, to see if she could cheer or be cheered by the companionship of those who also loved the absent Donald.

Still, her heart was unsatisfied. The rich, full stream of sympathy was wanting even here. The father was rendered almost imbecile by a paralytic attack, and Catherine and Mysie had their whole time occupied by attendance on him, while Rose took their place in the domestic department. Flora attempted to assist her, but her strength was visibly failing, and her sick heart would not enter into the details of household drudgery, when it was dying for the presence that would not come to her.

Thus passed the dreary winter, and the spring was shining vainly upon the garden where Donald had plied his peaceful labor the year before. Where was he now? she asked herself for the hundredth time, as she walked about the deserted paths, and attempted, with trembling hands, to tie up the vines which Donald had so carefully tended. Finding that she could not accomplish it, she opened the gate, and wandered to a little distance, out of sight of the lonely home. All the courage seemed gone out of her heart, all the light crushed from her spirit, and rebellious thoughts against God and man and nature, arose within her. She, an orphan, with neither father nor brother to protect her, was now to give up the only being who cared for her in the wide world. She could not see the justice of the decree which was to leave her thus alone and unprotected. She did not weep, but she seemed to shrink away from these misfortunes, just as she was then shrinking from the pitiless chill of the spring wind, that seemed pinching her to the very bone. She drew her shawl closer around her, shuddering all over with the breeze which would have been grateful to one in health and spirits, but which came to her like the cold breath of death. As she went on, in her aimless, objectless walk, she met young Hector Callum, an old friend of Donald Murray.

"Did you know the troops were on their way home, Flora?" he asked, with a pitying look at her wasted figure.

Flora pressed her hand to her side, and tried vainly to say "no," but the word would not come.

"I have a paper here," said Hector. "I have not yet read it, but I saw the announcement of their return, or, at least, a force sufficient to protect the large number of the wounded. Donald will soon be here. Come, cheer up, Flora, or you will never do for a soldier's wife."

He took the paper from her trembling fingers, for he saw that she could not open it. He found the place which contained the news from the Crimea, and the sailing of the troops. He read to her, but he might as well have read to the stones. Her eye was fixed, in a long, agonizing gaze, upon the list of the dead, where "Murray" was conspicuous from being on the officers' list. As she looked, the letters seemed to assume a larger, and still larger size, and, as they grew, they were surrounded by large black lines, which spread until they almost covered the paper. Hector snatched it from before her eyes; but in vain. The word was inscribed on the stones, on the vast trunks of the trees, even on the empty air.

This fit passed away, after a while. Hector sprinkled her waxen face with water from a little spring that bubbled up almost at their feet, by the wayside, and urged her to sit down and rest.

No; she would go home and rest. Home! where his loving eye and gentle footstep could never come! Home! where the father sat in darkness, and the sisters were, like herself, alone and unprotected!

Slowly—slowly—and only borne up by Hector's kindly grasp, she turned to go back. The sun, which had hidden itself in the clouds during the afternoon, was now shining out warm and bright, as if to mock Flora's vanished hopes. The sky was serene and blue overhead, as if no weeping eyes or bleeding hearts lay beneath its canopy. Only at the edges of the eastern sky hung a few fleecy clouds, with their foamy edges touched by a golden light, like the rim of a crystal goblet; while, shining through the tender green of the leaf buds, the sun itself was going down in the pomp and splendor of its purple and saffron drapery.

Flora did not heed it, or if she did, it was only to think how unsympathizing nature is to the unhappy. She might have said with another, "You go out among the woods and fields, when you are happy, and the quivering lights and dancing shadows—the blue sky fretted with bars of silver cloud—the low symphony of bees and waters, bearing up, as it were, the exulting vocal chorus of birds—all these things delight you, and tell you that the earth is rejoicing with you. Go out when you are sorrowful, and not a light shall be quenched, not a cloud deepened, not a bird silenced. You are neither missed nor welcomed; there is neither scorn nor sympathy; there is quiet, changeless indifference to you and all your troubles; and you may die, if you please, and of a broken heart, too (if people ever do die of such a disease), and this mother Nature, as she is satirically called, cares nothing for it. She is just the same; and perhaps while your coffin is being let down beneath her green sward, she renews the very same magic effect of light and shade—the same transparent gleam of perishable beauty, which caught and chained your eye the last time you visited her in life."

All this Flora felt, but she had not strength to give it speech. As the crimson light fell athwart her swollen and burning eyes, she made a convulsive movement, as if she would shut it out forever; and clasping her hands tightly over them, she went on, weak and stumbling, upheld only by Hector's strong arm.

He, poor fellow, could give her no comfort. Not a word came to his mind, except the cold, stereotyped sentences which he had so often heard doled out to mourners, and from which his good taste and sensibilities revolted. So he only held the drooping girl with a firmer and tenderer grasp, and led her gently along, with her eyes still closed—blind to everything but the one terrible consciousness of that one word—Murray's name on the dead list.

At the turn in the road, they met the Kirkcubright stage. Hector looked up, and met the eye of the driver. There was a pained expression shining all over his good-humored face, which at any other time, Hector would have accepted as an omen of good. Now, he saw no good in anything. His friend, whom he had loved from childhood, had lain down his young, brave heart in a soldier's grave, and this pale flower on his arm would soon follow him.

And Rose, too, his own beloved Rose, to whom Donald was joined as a second self, how would she bear this separation from the brother so tenderly remembered? Hector's stout, manly spirit was fairly giving way to the feelings which pressed upon him, and he wept like a child. Nor was he ashamed of this tribute to his friend's memory, nor the sympathy he felt with those who would mourn him with a lasting sorrow. Flora felt his arm loosen from her support, but she walked on. She knew that he had been weeping, and she knew, too, that he had suddenly stopped, but she had not yet come out from that terrible dream, and she had no curiosity to know what had stemmed the tide of Hector's tears.

"Flora! Flora!" said a voice from the little avenue, between the maple trees, leading to the house, for they were now at the gate.

Her first thought was that she had died in her grief, and that the voice was calling to her in the grave, from the skies beyond it. For it was Donald's voice, soft, tender and musical, with a sort of hushed sweetness about it, like the voice of one who has come out of great tribulation, and has kept some of the murmuring sadness in which it has been so long accustomed to speak.

She drew her clasped hands from her face, but she could see nothing yet. She was standing at the gate, where the sunset was like a flood of crimson light on her pale face and wasted figure, and he who spoke to her was far up the narrow avenue, where the shadow of the trees was falling upon him. But Hector drew her on, his own heart beating high with joyful surprise; and, under that deep shadow, he left her on the faithful heart of Donald Murray. On his heart, and encircled by one arm—the other yet too feeble to bear the weight of even that slight form. But he was alive—was at home once more—was faithful to his love—and that was enough. Never, until he welcomes Flora to the gates of the Eternal City, can she experience another meeting like that!

Within the house, in the darkening twilight, sat the father and sisters, unconscious either of the despair which Flora had felt that afternoon, or the joy that had succeeded it. Hector undertook the task of revealing Donald's arrival. The old man, who, since his attack, had relapsed into his Gaelic accent, forgetting the Scotch words he had acquired from his border neighbors, murmured some inarticulate sentences, that sounded strangely enough to Hector's ears, and Rose sprang to his side, speechless and almost breathless. Grave and staid, Catherine and Mysie received the news with a murmur of deep thanksgiving, but with small outward emotion. Their father's illness had taxed them so hardly that their natures had become less sensitive to pain and pleasure than in their earlier youth. But when he came in, leaving Flora to follow when she could command the tears which flowed now so freely, they all crowded around him, with words of deep and heartfelt affection; and the old father, restored to momentary consciousness by the sight of his son's face, exclaimed:

"Heh, lairn! what's come over ye, that ye lusk yer arm in that fashion!"

Rose glanced at the arm, still worn in a sling, and burst into a passion of tears. Hector drew her away into the hall, where Flora sat, perfectly calm and quiet. She had taxed her nerves to the utmost, and the reaction had left her exhausted and weary. The dimness of the hall was operating like an anodyne upon her senses.

Two hours after, the house was still, and every eye was closed in slumber except the lovers'. They sat alone, in the quiet, moon-lighted room, with clasped hands, and eyes that often ran over with excess of emotion; and Flora made him repeat, over and over again, his description of the noble woman who tended his sick bed—the angel to whose shadow on his pillow he had pressed his hot and feverish lips.

They live in a little home of their own, on the banks of the Solway; and Donald has renewed his peaceful occupation of gardening. Figuratively speaking, he has turned his sword into a ploughshare, and his spear into a pruning-hook. A stout Highlander, who, in the late war, stood six feet two inches high, in her majesty's regiment, performs the part of assistant gardener; for Donald's arm is yet too weak for heavy labor, and can only perform the lighter task of tying up the vines, and trimming the rare and odorous plants which are his care and delight.

From his garden—the most celebrated in the country—are daily sent the most perfect specimens of flowers and rich, flowering shrubs; and it was but last week that two magnificent bouquets, formed entirely of the rarest and most beautiful flowers, were sent to England, in boxes, hermetically sealed. One of these delicate gifts was for the queen, God bless her! and one for that other queen, God bless her, too! whose regal shadow on the pillow of the wounded soldier met such impassioned kisses.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballo's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discourses, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, at below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us right subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

LYNN, MASS.

We present on this and the next page a series of faithful pictures, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, illustrating some of the most striking features of the pleasant and prosperous city of Lynn, in this State. This place is one of great antiquity, its settlement dating back to 1629, only nine years after the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth. It was incorporated in 1630. The Indian name of the town, Saugus, was changed to Lynn in 1637. It became a city in 1850. It is nine miles from Boston, and occupies a pleasant situation. Its boundaries embrace a delightful variety of scenery, field, forest, pasture, cultivated land, rock, beach and bay, while the thickly settled portions abound in beautiful buildings, and exhibit every evidence of thrift and prosperity. From east to west, Lynn extends about six miles along the seashore, and from north to south, including the peninsula of Nahant, about eight miles. It contains fifteen churches, nine principal, six intermediate, and eighteen primary schools, a high school, an academy, and several private schools. The Natural History Society have a fine collection of specimens and a well-selected library. Two newspapers, the "Lynn News" and the "Bay State," are published here, and are well supported by the citizens. There are several good hotels in the city—the famous Lynn Hotel, the City Hotel and the Bay State, in what we may call Lynn proper, the Atlantic, Swampscot and Marshall Houses at Swampscot, the splendid Nahant Hotel, Whitney's Hotel, Rice's and Johnson's at Nahant. In a previous number of the Pictorial, we have described and delineated both Swampscot and Nahant. There is much travel through Lynn by way of old Eastern Road and the Salem turnpike, while about twenty trains pass daily on the Eastern Railroad, which intersects the city. The northwestern part of Lynn is a mountainous forest, the most thickly settled part being a plain between the hills and the sea. From the Lynn Directory, a reliable compendium, we obtain the following particulars: For the first century after the settlement of the towns in New England, there seems to have been no census taken, or, if the inhabitants were numbered, no record has been preserved. In 1638, when Boston was "a village containing 20 or 30 houses," it is certain that Lynn had more than 100 families. Being a farming town, including a territory six times larger than Boston, it naturally invited settlers; and after the opening of the iron-works, the number was greatly increased. But as many families afterwards moved away to form new settlements, the number of inhabitants at no time exceeded 2000. The first recorded census was taken in 1765, when the number was 2198. The following table exhibits the census as taken at eight periods: In 1765 it was 2198; 1790, 2291; 1800, 2837; 1810, 4087; 1820, 4515; 1830, 6138; 1840, 9367; 1850, 13,613. It will be seen that for twenty-five years, the increase was only 93. From 1790 to 1800, the increase was 546, or a fraction less than 25 per cent. From 1800 to 1810, after it had become decidedly a shoemaking town, the increase was 1250 or 44 per cent. Between the years 1810 and 1820, after Saugus, with its 748 inhabitants, had been separated from it, the increase was found to be 1176, or about 28 per cent. From 1820 to 1830, the increase was 1623, or 36 per cent. In 1830, the map and history of Lynn were printed, and being widely circulated and extensively noticed in public papers, perhaps they had some influence in giving a new impulse to the place, by calling attention to it; and the increase for the next ten years was 3229, or 51 per cent. For the last ten years, from 1840 to 1850, the increase has not been quite so rapid, being 4039, or 43 per cent. The particular census of the city, as taken for the Lynn Directory, gave a total of 13,613.

CENTRAL CHURCH, LYNN, MASS.

RAILROAD STATION, LYNN, MASS.

VIEW ON THE BEACH, LYNN, MASS.

Should the organization of the city government give a new start to the business and prosperity of the place, and the increase be as it was for ten years after 1830, the city, in 1860, or in ten years more, will number 20,000 inhabitants. The inhabitants of Lynn for the first century were mostly farmers, but gradually they gave their attention to the manufacture of women's shoes, and that is now the principal business. The stock for the shoes is cut in the larger buildings, called manufactories, by men termed clickers. The upper parts are then tied in packages and given to females, who reside at their own homes, to be bound. They are then returned to the manufactories, where they are put together in bundles with the soles, and distributed to the workmen, who make the shoes in small—quite too small—shops, usually at or near their own homes. The workmen are called cordwainers, or more properly cordovaniens; the word being derived from the Cordovan leather, originally manufactured at Cordova in Spain, from goat skins brought from Morocco in Africa. When the shoes are finished, they are packed at the manufactories, in wooden boxes, usually containing about sixty pairs, and sent to all places where there is a demand for them. A few of the nicer sort of shoes and buskins are packed in paper boxes of a smaller size. This branch of business was pursued, as we have seen, before the Revolution. The sales were then chiefly confined to New England, but since that period the business has been greatly extended, and shoes are now exported in large quantities to almost every part of the United States. It is estimated that at the present time there are about 150 manufactories in the city, giving employment to 10,000 persons, more than half of whom are females; and that 4,500,000 pairs of ladies and misses' shoes are annually made, amounting in value to about $3,500,000. From 400,000 to 500,000 pairs are also purchased from neighboring towns. Besides the above, there are manufactories of leather, morocco, cotton, prints, chocolate, glue, machinery, tinware, etc. Lynn has some vessels engaged in the whale fishery. In 1853, two ships arrived here, bringing 1656 barrels of sperm oil, 2120 barrels of whale oil, and 28,000 pounds of whalebone. The cod and mackerel fisheries are also carried on, and there is a considerable amount of coasting trade. There are two banks in Lynn, with a capital of $250,000, a Savings' Bank and two insurance offices. Our first engraving represents the Central or Fourth Congregational Church on Silsbee Street. It is a fine specimen of Gothic architecture, with a spire of 160 feet. In the foreground is the crossing of Silsbee Street over the Eastern Railroad. Our second view represents the Lynn Station on the Eastern Railroad, which intersects the city. It is a fine commodious brick building, and contains, besides the usual railroad offices, Kellogg's printing-office and a book-binding. Our next view is a picture of Lynn Beach, one of the finest beaches in this country, with the rare advantage of the water on both sides. This connects the city with Nahant. An excellent road has been built at a great expense, so that the driving is good at all tides. On pleasant summer evenings, with carriages and equestrians, it presents a most animated spectacle. Our next view is of the High School, a substantial and commodious structure erected at a cost of about $7000, under the superintendence of a building committee appointed by the town, March 16, 1850. It was dedicated January 8, 1851. An appropriate address was delivered by Rev. B. Sears, secretary of the Board of Education, and addresses were also made by Messrs. Hood, Shackford, and Jacob Batchelder, Jr. The house is warmed and ventilated in the best manner. It is thoroughly built; and though without any superfluous ornament, is in good taste, and provided with ample accommodations. The main school-room is about forty-six feet square and sixteen feet in height. The two recitation rooms are each twenty-two by twenty-five feet. These are furnished with settees, and the school room with Wales's patent desks and chairs. The whole cost of building, grading, fencing, seats, apparatus, etc., was about $9500. The appropriation by a vote of the town for this object was $12,000. It is intended that there shall be, at this school, a three years' course of study. In order to enter, pupils are required to pass a good examination in the elementary studies pursued at the grammar schools. And those pupils who complete the prescribed three years' course of study, shall be entitled to receive a diploma, signed by the teachers and also the school committee. At the present time, there are seats provided for one hundred and twenty scholars. This school has, since its opening, maintained the highest reputation, and it is, undoubtedly, an institution of which the city may boast, as one of the best in the State. The school is, we believe, under the instruction of one principal and two assistants. The pupils receive the best instruction, without money and without price. They are removed from the annoying presence of smaller students; and, in the commodious rooms provided for them, they can prepare themselves, by an extended course of mathematical, philo-sophical and classical studies, for the responsibilities of active life. The next erected a pagoda, seen in the view. A splendid view of Lynn, the bay, the ocean, Boston and the neighboring towns is obtained from the summit of High Rock. Our next view represents the Exchange Building, on no pretensions to architectural elegance, but it is spacious, and well adapted to its present purpose. The lower part is occupied by stores of various kinds, and there is a noble hall in the upper part. The last view delineates the South Common, so called. It is beautifully shaded by trees, and encloses a fine sheet of water. The church seen in the centre of the picture is the First Congregational, corner of South Common and Vine Streets. The Rev. Parsons Cooke is the pastor. The other church is the Second Universalist. Lynn is certainly a delightful and interesting place. Its history has been admirably written by Alonzo Lewis, the "Lynn bard," who has done his full share to enhance the prosperity of the town and city, in various ways.

HIGH SCHOOL, LYNN, MASS.

the Pacific and Indian Oceans, the women, as well as the men, tattoo a great variety of figures on the face, the lips, tongue, and the whole body. In New Holland they cut themselves with shells, and, keeping the wounds open a long time, form deep scars in the ## FEMALE BEAUTY.

The ladies of Arabia stain their fingers and toes red, their eyebrows black, and their lips blue. In Persia they paint a black streak around their eyes, and ornament their faces with various figures. The Japanese women gild their teeth, and those of the Indians paint them red. The pearl of the tooth must be dyed black to be beautiful in Gazur. The Hottentot women paint the entire body in compartments of red and black. In Greenland, the women color their faces with blue and yellow, and they frequently tattoo their bodies by saturating threads in soot, inserting them beneath the skin, and drawing them through. Hindoo families, when they wish to appear particularly lovely, smear themselves with a mixture of saffron, turmeric and grease. In nearly all the islands of

MOLL PITCHER'S HOUSE, LYNN.

picture presents a view of the house occupied formerly by the celebrated Moll Pitcher, the fortune-teller of Lynn, respecting whom so many romantic stories have been told, and who has figured in song, story and drama. Dr. Jones, of this city, made her the subject of a very effective piece, still played sometimes with great success, the incidents of which he afterwards worked up in the form of a novel-ette. The name of Moll Pitcher is almost as familiar as that of Norna of the Fitful Head, the fanciful prophetic of Scott's "Pirate." Had our Lynn sorceress flourished a little earlier, it is certain that her innocent impostures of fortune-telling by palmistry, the cards or coffee-grounds, would have consigned her to the tender mercies of the pious inquisitors of Cotton Mather's time, and probably that worthy divine would have assisted at an auto da fe of which Moll would have been the central figure. As it was, we believe she entirely escaped persecution. In the background is seen High Rock, a remarkable eminence on which the Hutchinsons (singers) built a cottage, and

EXCHANGE, LYNN, MASS.

VIEW ON THE COMMON, LYNN, MASS.

flesh, which they deem exceedingly ornamental, and practise extensively. In ancient Persia, an aquiline nose was often thought worthy of the crown; but in Sumatra, the mother very carefully flattens the nose of her daughter. Among some of the savage tribes of Oregon, and also in Sumatra and Arracan, continual pressure is applied to the skull in order to flatten it, and thus give it a new beauty. The modern Persians have a strong aversion to red hair; the Turks, on the contrary, are warm admirers of it. In China, small round eyes are liked; and the girls are continually plucking their eyebrows, that they may be thin and long. But the great beauty of a Chinese lady is in her feet, which, in childhood, are so compressed by bandages as effectually to prevent any further increase in size. The four smaller toes are bent under the foot, to the sole of which they firmly adhere; and the poor girl not only endures much pain, but becomes a cripple for life. Another mark of beauty consists in finger nails so long that casings of bamboo are necessary to preserve them.—Bee.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SONNET.

[On copying the original miniature of Napoleon Bonaparte, painted by Isabey, in 1812, formerly surrounded with the crown jewels, in possession of Josephine, but now in possession of a member of our family.]

BY BLANCHIE D'ARFOISE.

And this was thine, O Josephine, in pride,
When regal jewels glittered on its shrine?
Napoleon's miniature, exchanged for thine,
On me he smiles, as first on thee he smiled.

The hero, conqueror, emperor—thou, his bride!
That regal lip, glowing with life's high wine;
That eagle eye, untamed as love of thine;
That gorgeous robe, with half a kingdom filled!

I gaze on all, O Josephine, and sigh
To think how Fate, relentless, urged him on—Casting thee, love-eyed one—with wealth of love
A world might save—for mad ambition by!

Though exiled, taunted, crownless, overthrown—
Didst thou forget him in the realms above?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ORANGE AND GREEN.

A SKETCH OF IRELAND IN OTHER YEARS.

BY MRS. L. S. GOODWIN.

THE day had been one of signal glorying to the Orange party. From every portion of the sea-set emerald, men had thronged jubilant to "merry Bandon town," and there mingled, after the conceptions of the most demonstrative people on the globe, to celebrate their recent successes, and seal anew the compact of supremacy and opposition to their Greenmen foes.

Weary from the share he had taken in the festivities and excitement, Mikkel Moran quitted the scene, and returned to the peace of his humble home. He had removed the shoes from his feet and lain himself upon his bed for rest, when the latch was lifted and a man, dimly seen, entered, who, closing the door as suddenly as he had opened, threw his weight against it, panting audibly.

"An' sure what's it for ye've been rinnin' the breath out o' yer body, Jenmy, my son?" asked Mikkel, sitting up in his corner. "There's buttermilk in the can on the table," he continued; "drink it, boy, and away to yer sleep in the loft, that ye may live to see the likes o' this day again."

"Hide—hide me!" returned an unknown voice, in accents of terror. "Though my color be green, am I not a human brother? I was attacked in the vale below, passing alone and harmlessly on my way, and in defence of life and limb, slew an Orangeman. Hark! my pursuers approach; how murderously they shout! Save me, worthy stranger, and so Heaven be with you in peril, and prolong your own life."

The generous heart of the Orangeman, melted in pity to the Green, as he listened to his tale and witnessed his distress.

"Come with me," he said, springing forward and grasping the strange guest by an arm. "Dread niver at all the angry voices we hear; your life is safe this night, or I lose my own."

He led him through the kitchen into a small cellar room, excavated in the knoll which formed the back of the cottage, and had barely time to shut the door upon him and meet the infuriated crew at the outer threshold.

"Haste—haste, Mikkel Moran!" cried a hundred voices; "your own Jenmy lies dead among the stones in the hollow yonder. The assassin has fled by the plain this way. Haste—haste! join us, and we soon will overtake him."

Again yells of vengeance rent the air; the pursuers gathered freshly upon what they believed to be the trail of the offender, and rushed on, leaving the bereaved father agitated at the sad tidings. He neither made any movement nor seemed to breathe till the voices were faint from distance. Then with a step at first feeble as a little child's, but gaining firmness as he went, he crossed the apartment and presently stood before the stranger he had concealed.

"Arise," he said, calmly; "the danger is over awhile, but may return more terrible. Indade, you cannot be safe in the dwelling; so come with me to the cave in the thicket, where you can sleep securely as may you sleep the morrow night in your home."

He led him from the cell as he had led him into it; pausing in the outer room, he made him refresh himself with the draught which the son, for whom it had been placed, would never require; then guided on out of door, across a strip of pasture, over a stile, and turning at a right angle, plunged into a coppice overhung by a few aged trees. Pausing shortly, he listened; no sound to alarm disturbed the night.

"If you drop down the face of the rock here at our feet," Mikkel said, "you'll be finding yourself at the very mouth o' the little cave; an' sure, as I told ye, ye're secure in't while ye please."

The other, trembling both for himself and his preserver, made the leap, scarcely waiting till the last words were uttered. On touching the landing, he turned and looked upward, with a gasp of gratitude on his lips and in his heart; but Moran made a sign for him to be silent, and himself spoke:

"I had a son—only one—God be witness, never was my own life dearer to me than the life of my boy this day. Your hand, stranger of the green, has left me desolate; my own son it was that fell in that accursed strife. I gave my pledge that no harm should come to you, an' the pledge is kept! Peace be with you!"

At that moment, the moon parting the clouds with her silver rays, showed a dash of blood on the white, upturned brow of the transfixed listener. The father of murdered Jenmy heaved a groan at the sight, and before the other could recover speech or motion, was gone.

At once Mikkel repaired to the place where he expected to find the weltering body of his unfortunate son. But he found it not. While he groped, searching in the dimness, some wandered back from the vain pursuit. He ran forward at the sound of their voices, and meeting them, begged distractedly to have pointed out to him the precise spot on which Jenmy had fallen. It was not a spot the father had passed by—the tablet rock glistening white, with dark stains, yet moist, upon its surface.

"Here it was," they said; "an' has he been spirited away?"

A wild hope bounded in the father's heart. Had not young Jenmy been merely wounded and stunned, and afterwards recovering, dragged himself away to where he might be more secure? The idea was no sooner expressed, than his neighbors and friends felt obliged to check a delusion which in the end could but add disappointment to his bitter sorrow. They described the dreadful mutilation the body had suffered, till poor Mikkel wept aloud.

"Ah, no, no, Mikkel Moran! it's gone the boy is, though a grief it is to say it, and swate as was his voice, it will niver be heard again at all."

Thus saying, they joined the lamentation; but at every moment or two, one or another would interrupt himself with pouring maledictions on the head of the criminal escaped out of their reach, or to comfort the stricken father with praises of his son, and assurances concerning the large funeral he should have had—"the finer youth that Jenmy was of all the county, or the three kingdoms, for that matter." And so till the summer dawning, all between the cottage and the hollow, rose the voice of wailing and imprecation, intertongued with murmurs of gentler and purer feelings.

Subsequent efforts effected nothing in the discovery of poor Jenmy's remains. When the parish calmed into reflection, it was believed that there were Greenmen witnesses of the fray, who stole away the body, lest it should excite to the greater indignation against their culpable brother.

Years—twenty years had passed. In Wexford was repeated the exultant display at Bandon; just so all day had flags streamed to the breeze, and unremembered voices swelled peans of victory; but now the color was the green, and the many who marched to the music of fife and drum, loved to fancy their feet pressing the bowed necks of the conquered Orangemen.

Leaning against his low door-post, stood John Fitzmaurice, watching the gay ceremonies, from more intimate participation in which he felt himself by age disqualified. Suddenly, above the stirring clangor were heard shouts of rage and menace; the sea of human beings billowed in commotion round a common centre.

"An Orangeman! an Orangeman! Ha! ha! a penny for his odd bead! Trample him down like a pavin' stun!"

"Murder me, if ye will, then; dye these white hairs red in my heart's blood. In twenty years I have not laughed; ye shall not see me weep now. But I could tell a story would shame the dogs to own my murderers as their masters afterward."

Fitzmaurice's ear caught the shrill tones of that old man's voice; if he did not distinguish the words, he divined their import, and threw his defending arms around the form of the aged Orangeman.

"I'm here, friend indeed," he said, with gushing tears of pleasure and sad remembrance, "to pay the measure of your kindness."

Then, with impassioned earnestness, he rehearsed to all within hearing the tale of the night at Bandon.

"Alone was I among our enemies, as he is among ye; fainting and defeated, this man received and sheltered me; he broke not the pledge he had given to save me, though I had killed his son. Twenty years have taken the strength from the hands of us both; still ye see my heart set as a door before his heart, and the first ye must strike through, if ye would touch the last."

His words were taken up by the multitude, and repeated like echoes among the mountains, or like circles rising from some heavy body being thrown into a lake, that expand even to the shore. The warm Irish heart was touched; it needed no further appeal. Violence and hate were changed in a moment to enthusiasm as harmless as it was fervid. There were cheers for curses, and the pressure around the snow-bearded Orangeman was in order to wish him yet a long life and to assure him of the friendship of all now and eternally.

And now a stranger in the prime of life, who wore a foreign dress and spoke with a foreign accent, pressed eagerly through the dense crowd.

"It is my father's name they call," he kept repeating, agitatedly; and at length falling on the old man's bosom, he besought him: "Embrace your Jenmy!"

Well indeed might that father exclaim that one had risen from the dead, when he saw the handsome face of his lost stripling, joined to the figure, as handsome, of mature manhood. A score of years he had lived mourning; he felt he could in that moment die rejoicing.

Jenmy Moran had not, at the fray in the stony hollow, been fatally harmed, as to the excited mob it had appeared. Recovering his powers of volition when left by himself, though frenzied alike by his injuries and with loathing of the scene in which he was lately engaged, he secretly fled the place and vicinity. He entertained an incomplete design of finding a more peaceful and happy country, and of sending for his father to share with himself in its enjoyment.

But disasters befell; he was long deprived of liberty, and of all means of communicating with the parent ever affectionately remembered. A free man at last, in a far-off land, he succeeded in making friends with fortune, that had so oppressed him; and not a lifetime afterwards, Jenmy became a rich and honored man.

Meanwhile, his letters to his father continuing unanswered—for the best of reasons, namely, that none was ever received,—Jenmy concluded on a return to old Ireland, to seek there for any remaining trace of whatever was most dear.

The cottage where he was born he found razed to the ground by violent hands, and could learn only that his father, in his feeble old age, was living a wanderer and an outcast for opinion's sake. But soon he had the joy to greet him, as we have seen, and to know that he came not too late to comfort his declining years.

So much was not known that evening, for Jenmy was too deeply affected for talking soberly, as much as the others for listening; but afterwards there was time enough both for reconning and understanding all that, during the separation, had occurred to either father or son.

Enthusiastic to extravagance was the sympathy of the thronging spectators with the three whom a kind Providence thus brought together. Old Mikkel Moran, men raised on their shoulders, and making his friend precede him, and his son follow after, bore him triumphantly through the streets, while far and near rang as it were one mighty and continuous acclamation, and the banners that floated gaily on the breeze were mingled of orange and of green.

$1000!!

GRAND PRIZE OFFER.

EACH ONE TO BE PAID IN GOLD DOLLARS.

The unequalled and increasing circulation of our favorite illustrated weekly journal calls upon the proprietor for a corresponding liberality in his offers to the public, for the new year. He therefore offers as an inducement to postmasters, or any other individual, male or female, to obtain and send to us clubs of subscribers to our paper,

TWELVE PRIZES IN GOLD,

to be faithfully awarded according to the schedule below. These prizes to be divided among the individuals who shall forward us the twelve largest clubs of subscribers for the "Pictorial," between the first of December, 1856, and the first of February, 1857, being a period of about sixty days.

When it is remembered that the agent has to work with, not only the most attractive, but positively

THE CHEAPEST PAPER IN THE WORLD!

it will be realized by every one how easily a large club of subscribers can be procured anywhere.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION

is the only illustrated paper of its class in America, and is the pioneer of illustrated papers on this side the Atlantic. It is elegantly printed on the finest of satin surfaced paper, containing sixteen super royal pages in each number, with an average of twenty illustrations weekly. These engravings are large and artistic in execution, embracing every current topic of interest, including rural scenery, maritime matters, architecture, noted localities all over this country and Europe, likenesses of eminent characters, male and female, at home and abroad, processions, celebrations, natural history, battles, fortifications, and, in short, every theme of general interest, forming an elegant

ILLUSTRATED RECORD OF THE TIMES.

Besides the illustrations, it contains eight or more super royal pages of original sketches of adventure, tales, poems, biographies and choice miscellaneous reading, humorous sketches, a careful record of events (no advertisements will be admitted), altogether forming a delightful weekly visitor to the home circle, and making two elegant volumes each year for binding, of 416 pages, with about one thousand splendid engravings.

PRESENT CIRCULATION, 103,000 COPIES WEEKLY!

THE PRIZES.

|                                                                                   |          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------|
| To the person who sends us the first largest club we will present in gold.....    | $300 00 |
| To the person who sends us the second largest club we will present in gold.....   | 200 00   |
| To the person who sends us the third largest club we will present in gold.....    | 100 00   |
| To the person who sends us the fourth largest club we will present in gold.....   | 90 00    |
| To the person who sends us the fifth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 80 00    |
| To the person who sends us the sixth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 70 00    |
| To the person who sends us the seventh largest club we will present in gold.....  | 60 00    |
| To the person who sends us the eighth largest club we will present in gold.....   | 40 00    |
| To the person who sends us the ninth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 30 00    |
| To the person who sends us the tenth largest club we will present in gold.....    | 20 00    |
| To the person who sends us the eleventh largest club we will present in gold..... | 15 00    |
| To the person who sends us the twelfth largest club we will present in gold.....  | 10 00    |

These prizes will be paid in gold dollars, that there may be no question as to their value.

No person will be considered a competitor for the prizes who does not send us at least fifty subscribers.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                             |        |
|-----------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year..... | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " ".....     | 10 00  |
| 10 " " " ".....             | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis. Thus every thirteenth copy is clear profit to the getter-up of the club, except to those persons winning the first three prizes.

Any person sending us fifty subscribers, shall receive the eight volumes complete of our "Pictorial," elegantly and uniformly bound in gilt, with illustrated title-pages and indexes, containing nearly ten thousand fine illustrations.

It is very important that the names, accompanied by the money, should be sent to us as fast as they are obtained, that we may be able to print an ample number of papers to meet the demand. Therefore, as soon as ten or a dozen subscribers have been obtained, the person who has procured the club can forward them with the money, and he or she can then add to the club any number of names at the same rate, and they will be duly credited to the account of the person sending, until February 1, 1857.

It is not requisite that the entire club should be taken in one town; we will send the papers to any neighboring post-office, but all subscriptions must come through the same agent, in order to be counted to his or her credit. This prize offer cannot be applied to any regular wholesale agent of our paper. The clubs must be bona fide, and each name sent with the money.

The result will be duly published, and evidence of the receipt of each prize, by the successful parties, will be given.

Sample copies of the paper furnished gratis when desired.
M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

Ballou's Pictorial and The Flag of our Union are sent to one address for $4 per annum.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address, at the lowest club rate.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A LEAF FROM CAPT. BOBSTAY'S LOG.

BY FREDERICK W. BAUNDERS.

"Now, Jack, my boy," said my uncle Bob—a retired, but by no means retiring, sea-captain of the oldest kind of a school—"Now, Jack, you are about to take command of a large ship for the first time. I have told you how to manage, and how to conduct yourself in many emergencies, and have given you lots of tip-top advice, and if you don't benefit by the experience of one who has sailed eight of voyages and traversed no end of marine leagues, why, I won't leave you a dollar of my plunder; a dollar, no, not so much as a bungtown copper with a hole through it. Remember that, now. But aside from the management of a ship, a good many things occur in the course of a lifetime, which are altogether out of the common course of events; requiring prompt and decisive action, regardless of precedent. The commander of a ship should be self-reliant and decided in all he does; taking advice from no one whatever. He should strive to inspire all under his charge with confidence in his judgment. To do this he must always be right, or if he should err a little, he must make it appear that he was right at his risk. A sea captain, like a king, can do no wrong on board of his ship, and as he can shape everything to suit himself, and put whatever face he pleases upon matters, he is a fool if he ever acknowledges himself at fault. It was by preaching a little of this sort of thing, and making much of myself, that I gained—or rather extorted, the confidence of my owners and insurers at a very early age.

"A good many years ago, before I was out of my teens, or had fairly struck soundings on the coast of manhood, I was promoted to the berth of chief mate of the brig Salt Horse, of Boston. The second mate of the brig, who was several years older than myself, and didn't know more than half as much as he thought he did, was a sort of second hand cousin to one of my employers and gave himself airs accordingly; but so long as we were both subordinates, and he not subject to my orders, we got along very comfortably.

"The firm for which I sailed, traded to the West Indies, one of the partners—the second mate's cousin—residing permanently at Havana, the other at Boston. While laying at the former port, almost ready for sea, the captain of the Salt Horse was suddenly carried off by the yellow jack, when of course the command of the brig devolved upon myself as first officer, until I should be superseded by the owners.

"Having buried the captain, I repaired to the office of the resident partner for instructions, where I learned that, having resolved to return home in the brig, he had gone into the country on business, and would be on board the Salt Horse the following evening, when he expected her to be ready to put to sea without delay. In this posture of affairs I took the responsibility of doing precisely what I considered to be the most for the interest of the owners, as every officer ought; to wit, I transacted all the ship's business, effected an insurance and got out clearance papers with my own name as captain, and when, on the following evening, the owner made his appearance on board, the anchor was afloat, the sails hanging loose in the buntlines, and the brig all ready for a start.

"Mr. Smith—the owner—was naturally somewhat surprised at learning of the captain's death, and although he could not but justify my proceedings in the matter, he was not a little disappointed at my having appointed myself commander, it being his wish for his cousin, who was now my first mate, to take command. I of course expressed my willingness to relinquish all claim to the office which I had, as it were, inherited; but to make the necessary alterations in the brig's papers would have detained us another day, which was not to be thought of, and we accordingly hove up the anchor and stood out of the harbor.

"We had not been long at sea before it became apparent that, although I was the nominal captain, the owner and his cousin were disposed to divide the command between themselves. They were continually together, and as thick as five mice in a stocking. Nothing was attempted on board that the owner did not find fault with, or pester me with suggestions and directions; appealing to the mate in support of his views, and setting his judgment against mine, as though a ship was a republic, instead of what it is, and ought to be, an absolute monarchy of the most despotic character.

"I was not at all disposed to put up with this sort of thing, and gave them plainly to understand that, being captain of the brig, I intended to command her, in every sense of the word, and wished for no assistance. This led to a coolness between us, and from that time our intercourse was limited to something less than common civility. A good deal of plotting continued between the owner and the mate, which, however, I affected not to notice, and busied myself with navigating the vessel to the best of my ability. A little incident occurred shortly after, that gave me an opportunity of showing off my knowledge, my seamanship and my judgment to advantage, and I made the most of a lucky accident.

"When in the vicinity of the Island of Bahama, we were overtaken by a smart bit of a gale, which beat and banged us about at such a rate, that when the night came on, stormy and dark as a whole world full of Egypt, I was not altogether sure of my position, but keeping the craft under easy sail, I continued to jog along through the gloom with as much apparent confidence as though the broad ocean was before me. The owner and mate, aware of our proximity to land, although as ignorant as myself of its exact whereabouts, manifested no little alarm and indignation at my persisting in running the vessel, which they loudly declared would be ashore in less than an hour.

"My own judgment would have led me to heave the brig to, as by far the safest course, but as they had undertaken to dictate, I persisted in carrying sail nearly two hours longer than I otherwise would have done, and only laying the maintopail to the mast, when a sense of immediate danger overcame both my courage and my grit." Leaving the second mate in charge of the deck, with orders to call me if anything unusual transpired, I went to my state-room with every appearance of confidence, apparently to sleep, though in reality I was all eyes and ears, and far from easy as to the result. With the first glimpse of dawn, came a messenger to call me in great haste. Going upon deck, I found that we had passed, almost grazing, the island in the night, and the dangerous shore, lined with breakers, stretched away astern and to leeward of us.

"Good heavens, Captain Bobstay," said the owner, for the first time giving me my title, "what a miraculous escape we have had!"

"Not at all, Mr. Smith," I replied, coolly lighting my pipe, though I was actually trembling with a sense of the appalling danger we had so narrowly avoided. "Not at all, sir. Had I heaved the brig to, in the early part of the night, we should have gone ashore of course, but by carrying sail as I did, we shunned all danger and gained a safe position; and though by so doing I was forced to disregard your wishes in the matter, I hope you will overlook my seeming obstinacy in the happy result."

"My manner completely deceived him; no one suspected that chance or Providence had anything to do with it, and I gained a monstrous reputation, if not exactly for being able to see in the dark, at all events for superior knowledge of the coast, and it was no part of my plan to undeceive them.

"We made a very fair passage to the northward, considering the clumsy build and dull sailing qualities of the vessels at that period, and nothing occurred to disturb or increase the harmony of our relations on board until we were well up with the latitude of Boston, and scarcely two days' sail from that port, when we encountered a succession of head winds, with an average of two gales a week, each lasting three days and a half precisely, which effectually prevented our further progress. This was sufficiently annoying to all of us, but more particularly so to the owner, who was not only seasick and homesick, but excessively desirous of getting his cargo early into market. I think it was nearly a month before this provoking head wind blew itself out, winding up with a violent gale, which carried both of our royal-masts over the side, and otherwise damaged our top lumper.

"The next morning broke clear and cloudless, with a fine leading breeze, a gentle sea, and all appearances indicating as fair a day as is often seen out of doors. The owner was in ecstasies; the crew in high spirits and eagerly awaiting the expected order to make sail. No less exhilarated than others by the bright weather and the prospect of being alongside the wharf inside of two days, I was about leaving my state-room with the intention of crowding the ship with canvass, when my eyes rested upon a little instrument that lay at the foot of my berth, which caused me to pause in no little astonishment.

"At that time, the invaluable, and now indispensable, instrument, the barometer, was comparatively unknown; the majority of merchant captains had never heard, or knew the use of such a thing. I was more fortunate, having been in possession of an excellent and valuable instrument for several years, during which period I had learned to depend implicitly upon its timely warnings, and had never known it to deceive me upon a single occasion. Owing to the coolness that existed between the owner, the mate and myself, I had never spoken to them of the instrument or its virtues, and they were probably unaware of its existence.

"It was this unerring weather glass that caught my eye by the merest accident, for I had not thought of consulting it under such a bright and cloudless sky. To my surprise, the column of mercury was lower than I had ever known it before, even in the midst of a hurricane. I rubbed my eyes to make sure I was not deceived, and examined the instrument more carefully; but there was no mistake; the column was still sinking, and concave on the top. There was evidently something more than ordinary in store for us.

"Here's another excellent chance to glorify Captain Bobstay," I said to myself, as I went upon deck and surveyed the serene and peaceful aspect of all around us.

"Well, Captain Bobstay," said the owner, as he approached me, rubbing his hands with satisfaction, "I suppose we shall be in Boston by this time day after to-morrow."

"Scarcely so soon as that, sir," I replied, carelessly.

"Not so soon, why not, pray? We are not more than two hundred miles to the eastward of Race Point, and with this wind, what's to prevent us, I should like to know?"

"I do not consider it safe to make sail with this wind, sir; it's not going to hold."

"Not make sail!" he ejaculated, in an accent of horrified astonishment. "Not make sail, and such a day as this, with such a breeze! Really, Mr. Bobstay, you must be crazy!"

"I am sorry to differ with you, Mr. Smith," I replied, "but you certainly must allow me to be the more competent judge of the weather." Then turning to my second mate, "Mr. Johnson," I said, "let the men furl all sail except the close-reefed maintop-sail; send down the topgallant yards and masts; get up the preventer stays, and see everything snug, fore and aft, for heavy weather."

The second mate, who had been expecting a very different order, hesitated and looked at me with astonishment.

"Well, Mr. Johnson," I said, sharply, "how many times do you expect me to speak before I can have my commands obeyed?"

Thus admonished, he turned away with disappointed looks and repeated the order to the men, who slowly and reluctantly went about to their duty; while Mr. Smith dove down into the cabin to confer with the mate. Presently he returned on deck, and with a good deal of anger and determination, addressed me.

"Mr. Bobstay," he said, "I demand an explanation of this insane conduct! Why do you not make sail?"

"I have told you, sir, that I do not consider it either proper or safe to do so."

"Very well, sir," he returned, excitedly. "You are probably aware that the firm of which I am one, own this vessel and everything belonging to her, and being the representative of that firm, I have the power to appoint or discharge a master of any one of our ships that I may see fit."

"Yes, sir, I am aware of that fact."

"Then, sir, I have to inform you that you are no longer in our employ, and I call upon you to relinquish the command of this vessel into my hands."

"Mr. Smith," I returned, firmly and decidedly, "if we were in port, your request should be cheerfully complied with, but when I took charge of the brig at Havana, I agreed to take her safely to Boston, and I am responsible for her well being, and for the lives of all on board until she arrives there; it was with this consideration that the underwriters insured her, and I do not intend to desert my duty on the high seas. I alone am captain of this brig, and I intend to remain her captain until she reaches port. My authority here is superior to that of an owner or any other person except the commander of a ship of war, and I shall enforce my authority, with an eye to your own interest as well as to the safety of my own life and the lives of those under me."

"I call upon you," shouted the exasperated man, turning to the crew, "I call upon you to take the command out of the hands of this man; he is insane, a maniac, we shall never get into port."

"See here, Mr. Smith," I returned, confronting him somewhat fiercely. "You are merely a passenger on board my vessel, and unless you at once discontinue your ridiculous attempts to excite a mutiny, I shall be obliged to confine you to your state-room, or put you in irons; let me hear no more of it. As for you," I continued, turning towards the crew and displaying a formidable pair of double-barrelled pistols, "the first man that shows the slightest sign of insubordination shall receive the contents of one of these persnaders."

Mr. Smith, finding himself baffled, retired to the quarter deck and remained silent through the remainder of the day, while the crew sulky and sullen, grouped themselves upon the fore-castle and whispered their fears and suspicions to each other.

"As the forenoon wore away, the weather seemed even to improve upon that of the morning; never had I beheld a lovelier day. Ships that had been blown off the coast by the prevailing head winds, were passing us every hour, under a cloud of canvass, inward bound, while we lay like a log upon the water. Occasionally, vessels passing within a short distance and observing our apparently disabled condition, would run down towards us and ask if we needed any assistance. A sententious 'no,' was the answer, and they stood on their course, wondering, doubtless, at our inactivity.

"Noon passed without any appearance of a change, and so peaceful and bright was the warm summer afternoon that serious doubts entered my own mind as to whether I was indeed pursuing a proper course. A visit to my barometer, however, which showed the mercury sunk to a positively frightful point, reassured me, and I returned to the deck with renewed resolution. All through the long afternoon the sky remained serene and cloudless, with a fair wind blowing, while we rolled helplessly upon the waves. More than once I observed the men forward whispering together, shaking their heads ominously, and glancing at me with no very peaceful looks, and I am convinced that nothing but the fear of my pistols prevented an open mutiny.

"As evening approached, a change, sudden and appalling, came over the face of the great deep. Almost in an instant the heavens became shrouded in a lurid, ghastly pall, while the waves, as yet undisturbed by a breath of wind, leaped up into mountains, as if to assault the very heavens. And then burst over the ocean, and swept the coast of America, a storm such as never was seen before or since; a storm that strewn the coast with wrecks from Maine to Florida; a storm that fested on thousands of human lives, that demolished villages and produced disastrous floods; a storm that cannot be described; a historical storm, which is still spoken of with dread and wonder as the great September gale of 1815.

"For days we were hurled about on the mad, boiling ocean like a weed. No one ventured, or could have existed an instant on the tempest-swept deck; the boldest and stoutest hearted among us were appalled in the presence of such a fearful manifestation of the awful power of Him 'who holdeth the sea in the hollow of his hand.' Death seemed but the natural result of such a war of the elements, but our time had not yet come. A good barometer, a kind Providence, and ample sea room proved our salvation, and we lived to fight another day.

"Do you see that, Mr. Smith?" I said, pointing to a long line of wrecks that strewn the shore of Cape Cod, as we were running in for Boston light. "These are the ships that passed us so gallantly on that pleasant day; had we stood in with them and caught that gale in the bay, with the land on three sides of us, we should have been in the same situation. But here comes the pilot to take us in, so now, Mr. Smith, I resign the brig into your hands as you requested me to the other day."

"Captain Bobstay," returned the owner, with much emotion, "you are a sailor, every inch of you, while I am a lands-man, and a very foolish one at that; forget my absurd and idiotic conduct on board the brig, and while I own a timber head in a ship, you shall command it."

"And I did command, Jack," continued my uncle. "I always commanded in every sense of the word; and now that you have got the charge of a ship yourself, never forget while you are captain to be captain all over, from the highest hair on the top of your head to the lowest heel-tap on your boots; if you do, I won't own you. So now clear out and get aboard your ship, and let me hear a good account of you, or you'll get none of my plunder, mind that."

HON. ERASTUS BROOKS,

EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK EXPRESS.

The portrait on this page was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, from a fine ambrotype by that eminent and successful artist and operator, Brady of New York, and is consequently, a reliable likeness. The career of Mr. Brooks affords an encouraging and praiseworthy example of ability and resolution struggling successfully with adverse circumstances. Erastus Brooks was born in Portland, Maine, January 31, 1815. His ancestors were all New England men, and several members of his family were engaged in our revolutionary battles. In the war of 1812-15 his father, a man of bravery, skill, and patriotism, distinguished himself as commander of the "Yankee," which was lost while engaged in the public service, towards the close of the year 1814. His mother being left in straitened circumstances, young Brooks had to begin his struggles with the world when only eight years of age. He came to Boston and entered a store, at first, but afterwards learned the noble art of printing, and rose gradually to the position of printer, publisher and proprietor of a paper at Wiscasset, entitled the "Yankee," a name suggestive of its character, and a memento of his father's services. In the meantime, he had studied diligently, and acquired a valuable stock of information. He worked hard on his paper, setting the types, working the press, with the aid of a boy, and acting as carrier to his subscribers. To these duties he soon added that of editor. He afterwards prepared himself for college, paying his expenses while engaged in his classical studies, by setting type and teaching school, alternately. Entering Brown University at Providence, he had nearly completed his course with great credit, when the want of money and the necessity of providing for those dependent on him, compelled him to leave college. We find him subsequently the principal of a grammar school at Haverhill, Mass., and the editor and part proprietor of the "Haverhill Gazette." This position he relinquished in 1836, and repaired to Washington, D. C., where he corresponded with New England and New York journals, and where he enjoyed the personal confidence of such men as Clay, Webster, Adams and Fillmore. In the same year he obtained an interest in the New York Express, of which paper he still continues one of the editors and proprietor. During the session of Congress, he resides at Washington, attending to the correspondence and reports for his journal. In 1843 he visited Europe, and travelled very extensively on the continent, making, besides the "grand tour," visits to Norway and the heart of Russia. His copious letters from Europe during this journey, abound with spirited descriptions and shrewd observations, and are highly graphic and readable. In 1853, Mr. Brooks was elected to the Senate of the State of New York, as an exponent of the principles of the American party, and acted there a very conspicuous part. He was re-elected to the Senate by a majority of over 4000, an increase of 7000 over the vote at his first election. At the recent election he was the gubernatorial candidate of the American State Convention. Though defeated, Mr. Brooks led the American ticket in every county in the State. During the late presidential canvass, he travelled extensively, addressing large audiences in various sections of the country. He is a forcible, zealous and vigorous partizan speaker. As the Pictorial entirely ignores politics, we cannot, of course, comment on the political career and the political speeches of the subject of our sketch. They have been abundantly discussed pro and con by the political presses. But it affords us satisfaction to point out the energy and steadiness of purpose which have guided Mr. Brooks from early boyhood, and which have given him prominence and success, with no aids but those created by his own exertions. Born neither to fortune nor influence, he has attained a competence and secured powerful friends by his own industry, and by his own personal qualities. As an editor, he has made an honorable position for his journal in a city where great talent and vast capital are embarked in newspaper enterprise, and where a publication that does not possess robust stamina is sure to go to the wall. As a writer, Mr. Brooks is fluent and forcible, and his articles have that point and practical bearing which are generally characteristic of the productions of the self-taught and self-made man.

ERASTUS BROOKS, OF NEW YORK.

BOURNE'S RIVER STEAM TRAIN.

Interested as we Americans are in navigation, inland and oceanic, any new contrivance, either complete in itself or suggestive, is sure to receive consideration. We have, accordingly, placed on this page a representation of a steamer proposed by Mr. Bourne, an English engineer, to operate on the shallow and curving rivers of the East Indies, and which might possibly be brought to bear on some of the water-courses of South America. It is represented as voyaging down an India stream, and contrasts curiously with the native boats which are grouped in the right of our picture, and to which we have made more particular reference in our illustrated article on boats in the present number. Mr. Bourne's steamer, instead of being formed like a common vessel, more nearly resembles a floating railway train. It consists of a series of barges, articulated to one another like a hinge, so as to be able to bend, if necessary, in passing curves in the river, and to be exempt from straining if it gets aground upon an uneven surface. These barges are built of sheet iron, in the manner of pontoons, so as to float upon very little water; and, upon the deck of each, a wooden house of light construction is built, either for the accommodation of passengers or for carrying cargo. In the first of these barges, which is made larger than the rest, is placed the steam engine, which, by means of paddle-wheels, gives motion to the train. The length of the train can be increased or diminished at pleasure by putting on or taking off some of its constituent barges, and the length of the train will be varied with the quantity of merchandise required to be carried, and also, probably, with the physical peculiarities of the river which is to be ascended; but, on the larger rivers, Mr. Bourne computes that the train may be made sufficiently long to carry 250 tons, the average depth of water not being more than twelve or fifteen inches with this load. It is quite obvious, that, as the first boat may be made very sharp, and as the draft of water is so very inconsiderable, the train will be propelled with a less force than is necessary for ordinary steamers carrying the same load; and it is not difficult to understand how, with a power of 300 or 350 horses, a speed of fifteen miles an hour is maintained. The engine, for various obvious reasons, is of the high-pressure description, to which, in this case, there is no more objection than in the case of a railway locomotive, since the passengers are at one end of the train while the engine is at the other, and with several goods barges between them. It is an easy thing to determine the draft of water of a vessel when her weight and dimensions are known, as the vessel will always displace a weight of water equal to her own weight; so that, when the weight is given, the draft will be proportionate to her displacing dimensions. In the case of a flat-bottomed barge 36 feet wide, it will require a ton weight per foot in the length of the barge (including the weight of the barge itself) to sink it one foot in the water, since 36 cubic feet of water weigh one ton very nearly. If, then, from this total weight the weight of the barge be deducted, the difference will be the weight of cargo that can be carried upon one foot draft of water. Mr. Bourne reckons that his train will float upon six inches of water without any cargo, so that, upon a 12 inches draft, the weight of cargo carried will be about the same as the weight of the train itself. It will be obvious from the foregoing exposition, that a high speed with large carrying power and a large draft of water are attainable by the means Mr. Bourne proposes; but these qualities, though important, do not of themselves afford the solution of the problem involved in the navigation of Indian rivers with that certainty and expedition which give steam locomotion most of its value. The shoalest part of the shoalest of the rivers it is proposed to navigate, is not less than two feet in the channel, in the driest time of the year; but, as the channel is continually shifting, so that there is no assurance that a steamer can always keep it, and as she will consequently have sometimes to pass over shoals on which there is less than two feet of water, it is necessary to provide means for the accomplishment of this object in an effectual and satisfactory manner. Mr. Bourne has accordingly furnished his barges with wheels, which, when the train grounds, may be depressed by appropriate screw gear until they rest upon the bottom of the river; and upon these wheels the train is carried off or over the shoal, in the same manner as if it were a train of railway wagons. Each barge is provided with a pair of these wheels, of a sufficient number of feet in width of tire to prevent it from sinking into moderately hard ground to an inconvenient extent; and the periphery of this wheel, or drum, is serrated, to enable it to bite the ground, whereby, when the wheel is turned round by appropriate gearing, the train is propelled. If the bottom be very soft, or if it consists of quicksand, the train will be able to force its way through without the necessity of resorting to the wheels; whereas, if the bottom be hard, so that the train cannot pass through the deposit, then the wheels will necessarily have a sustaining power which will enable the train to pass over the shoal like a train of wagons over a slight eminence upon the land. There is, obviously, no difficulty in giving the sustaining wheels the same amount of bearing surface per ton of weight as is given to the wheels of the common carts employed for agricultural purposes; and if these carts are able to pass through a river, or along a sea-beach, in a foot depth of water, it is clear that any other kind of vehicle, with an equal amount of bearing surface per ton upon the wheels, must have the same capability. To obviate any straining of the barges, when resting in the middle on the wheels, instead of resting equally upon the water, a suitable trussing is applied, like the ropes of a suspension-bridge, which accomplishes the object without adding much to the weight. With these explanatory remarks, we believe the view we have given of the steam train ascending one of the rivers of India will be readily understood. In the paddle-wheel, the flat-boards are placed somewhat spirally upon the periphery, so as to make the action upon hard ground continuous, instead of consisting of a succession of lifts. In some cases, depending partly upon the size of the train, and partly on the nature of the soil, the paddle-wheels are made the sustaining and dragging wheels for carrying the steamer over otherwise impassable shallow places.

BOURNE'S RIVER STEAM TRAIN.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

... During the past year, buildings valued at $1,600,000 have been erected at DuBuque, Iowa.

YELLOW FEVER.—It is said that this terrible disease may be cured by submitting the patient to a freezing temperature, which destroys the virus.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Wirth, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; R. A. Duncan, 162 Viue Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roys, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE HUMAN HEART.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

As when by storms is lashed the mighty ocean
With elemental din,
So, ruled and swayed by every new emotion,
The heart hath ever been.

It is a cloister, in whose dim recesses
Our purposes and aims
Are consecrated by the fond caresses
Of hope's undying flames.

A nursery, where lofty aspirations,
Expanding every hour,
Are shielded from all weakening frustrations,
To bloom the perfect flower.

And, as of old, sweet strains of music flowing,
From Memnon's statue came—
The heart, with glorious thoughts and fancies glowing,
Can utter sounds of fame.

We are not beasts—within this frail creation
A living spirit reigns:
To angels holds its close affiliation,
And until death remains.

THE MOON.

The Moon was pallid, but not faint,
And beautiful as some fair saint,
Serenely moving on her way,
In hours of trial and dismay:
As if she heard the voice of God,
Unarmed with naked feet she trod
Upon the hot and burning stars,
As on the glowing coals and bars,
That were to prove her strength and try
Her holiness and her purity.—LONGFELLOW.

HAPPINESS.

There are in this rude, stunning tide
Of human care and strife,
With whom the melodies abide
Of the everlasting chime,
Who carry music in their heart,
Through dusty lanes and wrangling mart,
Plying their daily toil with busier feet,
Because their secret souls a holy strain repeat.—KEELE.

FRIENDSHIP.

Small service is true service while it lasts;
Of friends, however humble, scorn not one!
The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun.—WORDSWORTH.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

We sadly regret to learn of the continued illness of Saxe, the poet. Probably he will never recover from the serious illness that afflicts him. He traces it to the severe attack of fever and ague which he incurred while lecturing in the West, and which seems to have undermined his constitution. . . . One of the most graceful and effective speakers we know of, is Col. Greene, of the Boston Post. He speaks to the point, is always good-natured, happy in his wit, and never bitter against any one. We don't care a fig for politics, but speak entirely in a personal sense. . . . None of our readers who will be advised by us, will fail to read Dr. Kane's account of his late Arctic expedition. The work is surpassingly interesting, and is an invaluable addition to American literature. It is difficult to understand how human beings could suffer what these adventurous men did, and still survive. Not a page of the two volumes is dull in a single line. . . . In this progressive age, we observe that cows are being pressed into the service of the farmer in a new capacity. In California, they are very generally used for plowing; and one who writes understandingly upon the subject, in a paper now before us, says that with good care, and easy driving, they do as well, if not better, with some work, than those of their kind left to feed and ruminate only. The cows thus used give as much milk as they did previously. . . . Punch, the inimitable, the daring wag, and not unfrequently the sage philosopher, throws off now and then, amid the steady flow of his wit and exuberant hilarity, a sparkling pearl of wisdom and beauty. He says:—"Happiness is a perfume that one cannot shed over another without a few drops falling on one's self." True as holy writ. . . . It may be of interest to the lady readers of "Ballou's Pictorial," to know that small bonnets, lately all the rage in Paris, are in fact going out of fashion, and that more reasonable dimensions are being adopted. . . . The late Rev. Ephraim Peabody, D.D., who was pastor of King's Chapel, in this city, was much beloved and respected. He was but forty-nine years of age, a devout Christian, and a truly good man. It is refreshing to hear a man so spoken of by those who knew him best, now that he is gone. . . . One of the most positive evidences of progress and civilization, is the freedom of the press. We can in this country and our day, hardly conceive of the opposite condition. Charles X. warred against the liberty of the press, and was dethroned. Louis Philippe did the same, and met a similar fate. Louis Napoleon should take warning by their example; his myrmidons are now busy in playing the spy for him upon every daily issue. . . . The citizens of New York talk of tunneling the East River at its narrowest point between the city and Brooklyn. The plan has been pronounced entirely feasible by a board of engineers. It will be a great bore while building, of course. . . . Major Ben: Perley Poore, with his jovial look and cordial grip of the hand, has just looked in upon us. That wheelbarrow load of apples, wheeled over thirty miles by the major, in the honest payment of his debt, has put his name in every mouth from Maine to California. . . . A little kitten has been playing about the floor of our sanctum for a fortnight past, affording amusement for an occasional leisure moment. Who has not watched the exquisitely graceful movements of these little creatures at play? So natural, so innocent—what a picture of artlessness! It is only a few weeks old, and yet a little care will draw out so much apparent intelligence in its habits; but its kittenhood will soon be gone, and then kitty goes, too. . . . We like to chronicle the fact, that a new high school-house has just been erected and dedicated on Academy Hill, Nantucket. Multiply the school-houses—they are stronger bulwarks than ships of war, or battalions of soldiers. . . . Childhood is often most happily delivered of thought. A gentleman asked a little girl what it was that made a person feel so when another tickled him. "I suppose it is the laugh creeping over him," was the instant reply. . . . It is confidently expected that by the Fourth of July next, we shall be in direct communication with England by means of the submarine telegraph. This once successfully accomplished, what may we not expect next? . . . A friend writing us from Atlanta, Ga., says:—"We really feel indebted to you for the delightful reading matter with which you freight 'Ballou's Pictorial' each week." Now, if our kind subscriber did but know it, he should rather thank us for what we do not publish. An editor often deserves more credit for what he leaves out, than what he puts into his paper. . . . It is a fact, which perhaps few of our readers are aware of, that bees were not originally natives of New England; they were introduced into Boston by the English, in 1670, and have since spread over the continent. We feel a little indignant at their not being indigenous here, but it can't be helped. . . . The gas stove in our sanctum warms the apartment like magic. A flash of a match kindles our fire, and a turn of the valve puts it out again; no funnel, no dirt—indeed, it is quite the thing. . . . The practice was universal in the first ages for mankind to sleep upon the skins of beasts. Straw was used in the royal chambers of England as late as the fifteenth century. It was those luxurious dogs, the Romans, who first used feathers. . . . "How full of briars is this working-day world!" In a single copy of a late New York daily paper, now before us, we count two suicides, one murder, one large incendiary fire, a girl shot and nearly fatally wounded in the street, in broad day; two heavy business failures, and one ascertained death by starvation, not to mention others unknown who died of hunger! . . . There are on our exchange list some fifteen excellent agricultural weekly papers, giving tokens of the rapidly increasing importance of this department of industry in the United States. Lord Chatham said, that trade increased the glory and wealth of a country, but its real strength and stamina are to be looked for among the cultivators of the land. . . . One cannot read the statistical facts brought to light by the late presidential message, and the reports from the various heads of departments, without experiencing a little pride in realizing the rapid increase in wealth and national importance of our beloved country, "America, half brother of the world!" . . . A brief notice appeared in a contemporary print of this city, a few days since, relating the sad pecuniary want of a widowed mother struggling to sustain her family of four young children, nearly starving and thinly clad. A small sum of money for immediate relief had been supplied at once by the Christian hand of the publisher referred to, but ere another Saturday night had passed, one hundred and thirty dollars, besides bountiful gifts of clothing, had been placed in the poor woman's own hands, by anonymous contributors, who carried or sent to her humble abode. Many kind hearts and open hands there are in this city—but alas! how much of misery there is unseen and unrecorded! . . . The wood-sawyers of Albany are getting up an annual ball. Well, why not? If we were axed, and saw no objection, we would certainly attend. . . . We met Mr. Denton at table, lately; he is hale and hearty, numbering some seventy years. His present lecturing tour of our eastern cities has been very successful, and "Old Bullion" expresses himself with entire satisfaction as it regards his visit to Yankee land. . . . A friend, lately from Washington city, tells us that he was shown in the post-office department, a small folio ledger of not more than three quires of paper, upon which Franklin, when postmaster-general, kept all his accounts relating to the department for two years! At present three thousand largest-sized ledgers are required to keep the accounts of the department. . . . Mr. George Vandenhoff, of whom we gave an excellent portrait in "Ballou's Pictorial," lately, in teaching elocution in this city to a very large class, and lecturing with marked success in our environs. . . . We lately met with a curious fact recorded relative to the lace which is manufactured in Belgium—the finest kind being made in cellars, and kept there, lest exposure to the air should render it liable to break. This thread sells for 1800 francs a pound, and has been known to bring the sum of 10,000 francs! . . . A native of Kentucky, with a railway imagination, wishes to know how long it will be before they open the equinoctial line. . . . Carlyle says, "Make yourself an honest man, and then you may be sure that there is one rascal less in the world." Not very flattering, but very true. . . . An eccentric gentleman of fortune, named Saunders, has taken a fancy to build a house, in the neighborhood of London, with stone from the fortifications of Sebastopol. He has gone out in a little vessel of his own for the purpose of obtaining them. There is no accounting for tastes; now we would quite as willingly have Malone sandstone. . . . A word once spoken, a coach with four horses cannot overtake it and bring it back. It will no do harm to remember this saying. . . . A subscriber in Attica, New York, asks how the name of blue-stocking came applied to a certain class of the gentler sex. In looking up the matter, we find that this term applied to literary ladies, was originally conferred on a society of literary persons of both sexes, in 1760. One of the most active promoters of the society was Benjamin Stillingfleet, the distinguished naturalist and miscellaneous writer, who always wore blue worsted stockings; and hence, from such a trifle, arose the name. . . . Speaking of Stillingfleet, we once saw in a private library, in New York, an exceedingly rare little book, entitled "Calendar of Flora," an original edition by him, published in London some time in 1760. . . . Edwin Forrest looked in upon us a day or two since, as genial and manly as ever. He exhibits, physically, just our idea of masculine perfection, with a countenance sternly handsome. Mr. Forrest has no equal upon the stage, either in Europe or America. . . . A religious fanatic, in New Orleans, lately undertook to fast forty days and forty nights, but made a most ridiculous failure of it, dying on the sixth evening. If he could only have held out for a fortnight, it would have been quite a respectable suicide; but to die inside of a week—faugh! it was perfectly disgusting. . . . How few persons who make use of the exclamation boh! to startle little children, are aware of its origin. Boh was a fierce barbarian general, who flourished just before the Christian era. The exclamation of his name terrified his enemies, and is used to this day to frighten children! . . . We chanced to see a bouquet thrown to a danseuse at one of our city theatres, a few night since, doubtless intended to fall at the fair one's feet; but it unfortunately alighted full in her face, the stems even drawing blood from her cheek. We would not advise the young lady to continue such a procedure again. . . . A gentleman belonging to the United States Navy assures us that this branch of our national defence was never in a better condition than at the present moment. Though our ships and steamers are not numerous, they are of the most efficient character, and, in many respects, superior to those of any other nation. Especially is this the case with the late addition of six steamships, the batteries of which are marvels of fearful power, and entirely new and American in their plan and completion. To be prepared for all emergencies often prevents their occurrence. . . . Major March (a nom de plume), of the United States Army, called upon us a few days since. He is the pleasant author of "Facts, an Army Memoir," and "Shoepce Recollections," which have been noticed in our columns. He is under orders for Florida, to have a brush perhaps with the Indians. We shouldn't mind breathing the air of Florida about these cold dates of a New England winter. God speed the major! May he come back to write another agreeable book of army life. . . . Have we omitted to mention that the Grand Duke Constantine proposes to visit this country next spring? He contemplates coming over for a brief season with a Russian fleet, and expresses great admiration and friendship for the United States. Let him come—his welcome. . . . The American reader gets his weekly and daily papers very cheap—comparatively speaking, wonderfully so. The London Times, daily, costs its subscribers about $24 a year—weekly issues in like proportion.

The impulse which directs to right conduct, and deters from crime, is not only older than the ages of nations and cities, but evel with that Divine Being who sees and rules both heaven and earth.—Cicero.

If thou must needs have thy revenge of thine enemy, with a soft tongue break his bones, heap coals of fire on his head, forgive him and enjoy it.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Choice Miscellany.

GREEK WEDDING CUSTOMS.

The bride was arrayed "in gleam of satin and glimmer of pearl," with a white wreath and veil, the Frankish ideal of simplicity and splendor. Her coronation with an artificial chaplet constitutes, as in Sweden, the climax of the marriage ritual. Among the poorer classes there are variations of ceremony. "The more important preparations for the wedding uniformly commence on Thursday evening. Toward dusk, the young men who have been invited bring the wood necessary for cooking purposes; while the young women meet to sift the coarse flour that is to be employed. On Friday they again assemble to cleanse the wheat, and to grind it in the hand-mill. The flour thus obtained is used that very evening, when the maidens gather round the kneading-trough to fashion several kinds of cakes. One of the girls—who, according to ancient custom, must have both her parents living—begins the kneading, while the others, standing around, throw in various coins, and sing ditties, which are mostly quite unintelligible, but have been handed down traditionally from dame to daughter for generations. The cakes made of this dough are sent to all the friends of the parties, as invitations to attend the wedding. Another large cake is prepared at the same time, to be cut on Sunday evening at the house of the bridegroom, as a signal for the termination of the festivities."—Baird's Modern Greece.

THE RUINS OF NINEVEH.

The steamship "Soho" recently arrived at London, with the last consignment of Assyrian antiquities from the ancient Nineveh. They consist of about fifty cases of the most artistic sculptures yet discovered in this earliest postdiluvian city, representing the queen of Assyria feasting under the shadow of the vine, the king engaged in a lion-chase, and after, in the act of pouring forth a libation. There is also a splendid and almost unbroken hunting series, comprising not only lions, but wild asses caught in a noose or lasso; also a procession of the sportsmen bearing away birds, hares, etc., but still more interesting than these treasures of antiquity are the slabs bearing the famous inscription on the winged bull at the entrance to the palace of Sennacherib, recording his memorable expedition against Hezekiah, in which 180,000 of his warriors, "unsundered by the sword," in a single night, "melted like snow in the glacial of the Lord."—Boston Journal.

AFRICAN ABSOLUTISM.

The king of Dahomey is one of the most absolute tyrants in the world; and being regarded as a denized by his own subjects, his actions are never questioned. No person ever approaches him, not even his favorite chiefs, without prostrating themselves at full length on the ground, and covering their faces and heads with earth. It is a grave offence to suppose that the king eats, drinks, sleeps, or performs any of the ordinary functions of nature. His meals are always taken to a secret place, and any man that has the misfortune or temerity to cast his eyes upon him in the act is put to death. If the king drinks in public—which is done on some extraordinary occasions—his person is concealed by having a curtain held up before him, during which time the people prostrate themselves, and afterwards shout and cheer at the very top of their voices.—Wilson's Western Africa.

GOING AHEAD.

Before the year 1800, there was not a single steamboat in existence, and the application of steam to machinery was unknown. Fulton launched the first steamboat in 1804; now there are 3000 steamboats traversing the waters of America, and the time saved in travel is equal to 70 per cent. In 1800, there was not a single railroad in the world. In the United States there are now 8797 miles of railroad, costing $286,000,000 to build, and about 22,000 miles of railroad in England and America. The locomotive will now travel in as many hours a distance which required, in 1800, as many days to accomplish. In 1800, it took weeks to convey intelligence between Philadelphia and New Orleans; now it can be accomplished in minutes by the electric telegraph, which only had its beginning in 1843.—Portland Transcript.

New Publications.

A PHYSICIAN'S VACATION: OR, A SUMMER IN EUROPE. By WALTER CHANNING. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1856. 8vo. pp. 564.

England, Russia, France, Spain and Germany are the countries our traveler passed over rapidly, but not unobservantly. On the contrary, we are surprised at the mass of facts he has accumulated in his pleasant journal, and the excellent use he made of his time. His book is one that will be read and re-read with pleasure.

THE YOUNG YACHERS. By Captain MAYNE REED. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1857. pp. 328.

Captain Reed's vivid and graphic style is well adapted to the delineation of stirring hunting adventures in South Africa, which form the staple of this book. It is addressed to young people, and will be devoured by them with an appetite we envy. The book is handsomely illustrated by Harvey.

THE YOUNG DEBATER. Boston: Crosby, Nichols & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 69.

This little work contains Sheridan Knowles's debate on the character of Cæsar, illustrated fully the mode of discussing a question, and affording admirable passages for declamation. The introductory illustrations are sound and practical.

THE TORCHLIGHT: OR, THROUGH THE WOOD. By HARRIET A. ALCOCK. New York: Derby & Jackson. 12mo. pp. 447.

Like its predecessor, "Isaiah's Child," this book has the quality of enlivening the interest of the reader, and holding it to the close—perhaps the best test of a novel. Its vividness and naturalness will secure it universal favor. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

MASSEY'S EXHIBITION RECITER AND DRAWING-ROOM ENTERTAINMENTS. By CHAS. MASSEY. New York: Samuel French, 121 Nassau Street. 18mo. pp. 186.

A very capital collection of pieces for recitation in prose and verse, embracing little comedies for school or parlor exhibition. Parents and teachers who know how hard it is to "find pieces to speak," will welcome this work. The author is a professed elocutionist. For sale by Sanborn, Carter & Babin.

THE LIFE OF MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS. From the French of De Marles. Boston: Alex. Moore, 2 City Hall Avenue. 1856. 12mo. pp. 391.

The life of the beautiful and unfortunate Mary, though often treated, is always interesting. De Marles, who continued Dr. Lingard's history, presents the story from a somewhat unfamiliar point of view. The present edition of his celebrated work is a neat one, and embraces fifteen of Mary's own letters.

THE MEMOIRS OF FALCONBRIDGE (JONATHAN F. KELLEY). Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson. 12mo. pp. 431.

This handsomely printed and liberally illustrated volume, embracing humorous sketches and stories from the pen of J. F. Kelley, one of the most popular writers of his time, and appreciated from Maine to California. His mirth-provoking stories are now published for the benefit of his widow and orphan children, and we trust they will have a most extensive sale. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

LITTLE DORRIT. By CHARLES DICKENS. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson. 12mo. Illustrated.

Mr. Peterson deserves the highest credit for the elegant style in which he is getting out Dickens's entire works. Beautifully printed in large type on fine paper, with excellent engravings, strong bindings, and withal portable, these volumes are a necessity to every family that has a bookshelf. "Little Dorrit" is a charming book, and some of the characters are equal to any the author ever conceived. For sale by Phillips, Sampson & Co., and A. Williams & Co.

THE EMPRESS EUGENIE PHEASANT SHOOTING AT COMPIEGNE.

[For description, see page 29.]

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. | Vol. XII., No. 3.—Whole No. 279.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

NEW IRON STEAMSHIP "VOYAGEUR DE LA MER."

We present on this page a picture, drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Hill, delineating the new iron steamship "Voyageur de la Mer (Ocean Traveller)", built at East Boston for the pacha of Egypt. It is a splendid and substantial vessel, and is the first ship of large size ever constructed, in this country, of iron. She is thus a sort of maritime wonder, and will carry abroad the fame of our mechanics and reputation of our resources. It is a singular and suggestive fact, that to a pacha of Egypt belongs the credit of developing a new branch of shipbuilding in this country, and that to Boston belongs the honor of first employing iron on a large scale in the construction of a vessel. The contract for building her was given to Mr. George A. Stone, a young man of this city, who made the acquaintance of the pacha at Alexandria. The model and details of the ship were furnished by S. H. Pook, our distinguished naval architect, and he has won fresh laurels by the elegance of his design. The vessel is 1300 tons burthen, 216 feet long, 37 feet broad, and 22 feet deep. She is built of the best quality of hard-rolled American iron, made by Messrs William Schell and James Hoven, of Norristown, and Messrs. Verree & Mitchell, of Philadelphia, Pa. Messrs. Holden & Gallagher, of East Boston, moulded and rivetted the frame and plates. The weight of iron used was 881,000 pounds, and it required 300,000 rivets. The main boilers, four in number, were designed by James Montgomery, Esq., and built by O. S. Underhill, of the dry-dock works, New York. The two oscillating engines, of about 800 horses power each, were built at the Atlantic Works, East Boston. Mr. Augustus Sampson has executed the wood-work in a superior manner. Captain Frank O. Eldredge, who has had the general supervision of the work, will command her on her first voyage. The "Voyageur" has a full ship rig, the rigging and sails, and in fact all the material used in her construction, being of the growth, produce and manufacture of the United States. She has a single propeller. She has long, sharp ends, slightly concave water-lines, and a semi-circular stern. The iron-work of her outside varies from three-fourths to three-eighths of an inch in thickness, but inside the wood-work is still open. Her frames are of iron. From the bilge to the rail, she is, inside, more thoroughly built than any wooden ship of her size, notwithstanding she has the usual strength of an iron ship outside. The filling in makes her very solid, and must be proof against vibration, when under steam. She has five water-tight bulkheads, and each compartment is so arranged that it may be filled or pumped out at pleasure, independently of the others. She has two flush decks, consequently her machinery and boilers are below the water-line. Her armament will be very heavy, and will all be on the upper deck, leaving the deck below for the accommodation of her officers and crew. We sincerely trust that this noble specimen of American genius, skill and material will safely reach her destination, and that she will long ride the waters in triumph. She is destined to be the pioneer of a vast fleet of American ships built in the same manner, and in after years, her construction, and all the circumstances attending her, will be matter of history. It affords us great pleasure to place her on the record as a sample of our progress.

THE NEW IRON STEAMER, VOYAGEUR DE LA MER, BUILT FOR THE PACHA OF EGYPT.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCHIDE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER VII.—[CONTINUED.]

Juniata recounted in a few words the dangers which she had escaped, thanks to Juan. During the recital, the young Moor gazed at Juan; then striking him on the shoulder, he said to him, in a voice that went to his heart:

"It is well, my child; continue, and thou wilt become an honest man."

Juan trembled with joy. It was the first time any one had said to him: "Courage; it is well!" He looked at the young man steadily, as he said:

"Ah, if I had always been told that! But when you are gone, what will become of the unhappy beggars?"

"Thou wilt not be a mendicant; there are Spaniards who beg. But then," he continued, writing some words on a tablet which he gave Juan, "thou wilt find me where that indicates, and thou wilt learn from us how to ask and become an honest man; but above all, my brother, take this purse, and remember me."

Juan seized the young man's hand and kissed it, and the young Moor then turned to Juniata, and told her that he had business which demanded his immediate presence, and that he would take her uncle and herself—himself before him and her uncle behind his servant Hassan. He felt sorry that he could not take Juan, but it was impossible.

"You, my fine fellow, can, without danger, leave the wood. Do not forget the tablets. In eight days I shall expect you. Adieu, brother!" And he accompanied these words with a smile so gracious, a gesture so elegant, that Juan felt won, and vowed himself, body and soul, to the young stranger. Then giving reins to his horse, he disappeared, followed by Hassan, bearing Gongarello behind him. Juan, remaining alone in the middle of the forest, followed with his eyes the unknown, who soon disappeared from his sight, and the sound of whose voices still filled his heart with pride, and whose words still rang in his ears.

After an hour's riding, Yezid, Juniata and Gongarello arrived without accident at the village of Arnedo. Placing the two in safety and ease, Yezid and his companion set out again, though it was the middle of the night. A little longer, and another arrival came to the hotel. It was a regiment of the queen, commanded by Fernand d'Albayda, Don d'Aguilar's nephew. To him Gongarello repeated his story, and the recital raised a cry of anger and defiance from the soldiers. Gaining all the details he could from the barber and his niece, Fernand ordered his men to mount, and they set forth at a rapid trot for the castle of Buen-Socorro, to raise a siege and rout the bandits.

We will precede them, and return to Socorro for a few minutes. After the greatest efforts, the robbers succeeded in breaking open the cellar door. The troop rushed to the spot from whence the noise proceeded, and by the light of the torches, a horrible sight met their eyes. The lieutenant and captain lay still fighting, bloody and torn, upon the floor. As soon as the light came, the two combatants, uttering a cry of surprise, stopped in their wild fight.

"You!" exclaimed the captain, with fury,—"you, Caralo, who dare to lay your hand upon me!"

"You, captain!" replied the lieutenant,—"you, who were attempting to strangle me! For whom did you take me?"

"For our guests. How is it that you slept in the chamber of honor, which was not destined for you?"

The lieutenant tried to remember the events of the preceding day, but he could remember nothing.

"The barber and his niece!" cried the captain, more furious than ever, because he understood nothing.

They all started now in search of them, towards the red chamber; no one. They searched in all the other rooms in the house; no one—no trace.

"What does this mean?" asked the captain, in the greatest rage.

"I will tell you," replied the lieutenant, gravely, advancing into the middle of the circle. "That Moor was, like all his race, a heretic and a sorcerer; he has disappeared like all other sorcerers—disappeared with his niece in the air."

"But Juan—where is he? It was he who led the Moor to the red chamber; he alone can tell us the truth."

They mounted to Juan's chamber. The door was closed, but they broke it open; no one. An hour they spent in vainly searching. At last beginning to believe that Caralo was right in his suspicions, they were preparing to go to bed again, when some one knocked loudly at the gate.

"More sorcery," murmured Caralo.

"Impossible," replied the captain; and approaching a loop-hole, he demanded who was there.

A young, proud voice replied—the voice of Fernand d'Albayda: "The queen's regiment."

Hastily giving his lieutenant orders to collect their valuables, and be ready to leave by the back gate, he began a parley with the young officer.

"You travel while it is cool; that is wise."

"What is wiser still, is to rid the way of all the scoundrels who infest it, and to commence with you, senior host."

"I think, sir knight, that you are mistaken. You will be convinced of it, if you will deign, you and your men, to accept my hospitality."

"That costs too dear," replied the young officer. "You will charge us the same as the barber Gongarello, your guest last night. Where is he?"

"I did not know the barber was your friend," said Josef Baptista, with a sneer.

"He was. Open this instant; you are my prisoners; yes, open. I am not accustomed to bawdy words with a robber. Open without resistance, for you cannot escape us. I, Fernand d'Albayda, officer of this regiment, command you to open in the name of the queen."

"A thousand pardons, Senor Fernand d'Albayda, officer of the queen's regiment, for having made you wait so long. Your lordship, without doubt, is tired. You do me great honor to ask my answer; hear it."

And he fired upon the young officer. The ball grazed the plume of his hat, and wounded the shoulder of Pidalgo d'Estremos, who was very dear to Don Fernand.

"Fire," he said, to his men,—"fire, and give no quarter!"

At the same time, some of his men scaled the slight wall of the court. The assault commenced with vigor, and the men of Buen Socorro soon found they were attacked from all sides. After a short but fierce struggle, the queen's soldiers were victorious, and such of the robbers as were not killed escaped into the wood.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE CAPTAIN AND HIS VICTIM.

We will now return to Juan, who remained alone in the deep forest. He thought of his new friend, the young Moor, so handsome and elegant, who had said to him, "My brother!" and who, touching him on the shoulder, had said several times, "It is well; thou wilt become an honest man." Pedralvi had been a friend, a comrade; the unknown seemed to him something more—a superior being, a divinity. He thought of his precious tablets. True, he did not know how to read, but he would learn, and he would go to the stranger when he left the forest. At last overwhelmed by fatigue, holding in his hands his treasure, he laid his head on his arm and fell sound asleep upon the grass, with the trees gently waving above him.

Suddenly he was aroused by feeling himself grasped by a strong arm, and opening his eyes, he saw before him his demon, his evil spirit,—he saw, while a cold shudder ran through his veins, Captain Josef Baptista Balseiro. He was in frightful disorder, covered with blood, blackened with powder and his clothes torn. He held in his hand the purse and precious tablets he had taken from Juan while asleep, and he now stood looking at him with a ferocious laugh.

"You thought to escape me; you thought I was already dead; you have learned quickly how to betray those who have nourished you, to denounce them, like a spy, like an algaizil! Well, well, we will now settle our account, as the barber said. Sent by thee, guided by thy instructions, the queen's soldiers surrounded my house and set fire to it, to my property. The Moor predicted that I should be burned, and it was not your fault that the prediction was not fulfilled. The soldiers of the queen think I am killed, but I escaped with a few others, and I shall not be hung, either; it is you, Juan, though, who shall be this instant, and by my hand."

"I am not guilty; I swear it to you!" cried Juan, trembling.

"I swear that Don Fernand and his incendiaries shall be killed, and all my enemies, and I will commence with you."

And holding Juan still with his powerful left hand, he with the right bent down a flexible branch of a large, isolated tree which stood where four roads met.

"This will be a fine place, my dear little friend; for when any of your friends pass along, you will know that you have the pleasure of showing them what it is to rouse the anger and hatred of Captain Josef Baptista."

So saying, the worthy captain threw Juan upon the ground and knelt upon him, while he prepared the noose to be passed around his throat. Hearing a slight noise, and fearing still some of his enemies, the captain raised a little to listen, and Juan, by a sudden effort, threw him over, and before he could recover his balance, Juan was some steps behind him, and grasping firmly the branch which was to have served for his gallows, and with a violent spring he rose, and the branch carried him twenty feet in the air. His only reason, if he had taken time to reason, for doing this was that in his high and slender seat, the ponderous frame of the captain could not reach him, and he was safe for a time, at least.

The captain, almost beside himself with rage, walked round and round the base of the tree like an angry tiger, while his little victim, clinging with desperate strength to the slender branches which swayed violently to and fro by the high wind that swept through the forest, watched with dilated eyes every movement of his formidable enemy.

"Descend, little rascal!" he cried, as he drew a long pistol from his belt; "descend and I will pardon you; if you don't, I'll fire."

Juan knew the captain too well to place any faith in his promises of pardon, and the new danger which menaced him seemed to him less frightful than that which he had escaped. The captain, walking round the tree, urged upon the little fellow to come down, or else stay and be shot, and Juan, losing not a single movement of the captain's, followed every gesture with his eyes. Taking a stand a few paces from the tree, the captain watched eagerly for the time when the branches, shaken by the wind, should part and give him a fair shot at the boy. The moment arrived; he pulled the trigger; a cry filled the air; Juan fell, and Josef Baptista rushed forward like a tiger on his prey.

It was with the laugh of a hyena that he went to seize his prey; but that prey the captain sought for vainly. The ball had struck and broken the branch on which Juan was seated, and he fell, but was caught by some others a few feet below him, and there he remained unwounded and in safety, suspended fifteen feet above the earth. At the cry of joy that the captain had uttered, Juan, giving way in his turn to a feeling of rage, answered with an accent of exultation which seemed prophetic:

"Josef Baptista, you had no pity for a poor child, and that child, when he becomes a man, will be one day without pity for you. Go; it is useless to wait any longer for me. I shall not fall again into your hands. This evening, to-morrow, perhaps, travellers will come along here, and I will call on them to deliver me. You, assassin, you, robber and villain as well as coward, who would struggle with a child, will be conquered by him."

"Ah, war—war!" cried Josef, his laugh resounding through the forest; "you declare war, do you? Ah, well, we accept the challenge. It is you who will pay for the struggle. I have already this purse, which contains many doubloons, and these elegant tablets," said he, opening them and reading the name; "that without doubt is a protector who offers you power and aid. By Jove! you have not chosen badly: one of the richest proprietors in all Spain. I am happy to know that he protected you. For him and for all his people, it will be a signal of death."

Juan uttered a cry of despair at hearing these words.

"You are powerless to save them, child. You have chosen this tree for your last asylum. Perhaps I will grant it to you, but you shall never descend from it alive; I have sworn it. You did not wish it to be your gallows; it shall be your funeral pile."

Juan did not understand at first what the bandit meant, but he soon saw the explanation.

"You declared war with me, and you shall soon have it right warm," and Josef Baptista laughed another infernal laugh, which seemed to wake all the echoes in the forest.

While Juan watched with an anxious eye, he saw the captain bring heaps of dried leaves and dead wood, and place around the tree till it reached nearly as high as his head. Then, with an unutterably wicked smile, he drew from his pocket a tinder-box, and striking a light, set fire to the pile of dry fagots at the foot of the tree. For a long time the green tree resisted the effects of the flames which ascended in spiral columns; but the captain watched the fire attentively, diligently working and bringing fresh fuel, and each moment the flame ascended higher, and burnt with a fiercer glare. The silence of the forest remained unbroken, save by the crackling of the burning branches, and even the eagerly-attentive ears of the captain could detect no groan from the poor child, perched upon a branch but a few feet above the flames.

"Dead!" said the captain, calmly, "or if not dead, he will be soon; the fire will soon reach him, little villain!"

He looked again at the fire, added fresh wood, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing the trunk of the oak taking fire, and burn fiercely. He saw that Juan could not descend without being severely burned, if not wholly killed. The captain was alone, but he had the well-filled purse he had taken from Juan, and giving one more armful of wood to the flames and one long look at the burning tree, he set forth upon the road.

While the tree burned, Juan had ascended branch by branch, keeping free enough from the flames to prevent being burned, but he had now gone as high as he could; above him the limbs were too slender to bear his weight, and the fire now gained on him. The birds, inhabitants of the tree, had flown far into the forest. Alas! he could not follow them; he must remain on his green funeral pile, to die a lingering death. He saw his enemy disappear among the trees. All the lower branches of the tree were on fire, and seen from above, looked like a great furnace. The poor child, looking around him and seeing his death certain, inevitable, wept bitterly.

"Great God—great God!" said he, "to die so young, when life opened before me, when this night I had such sweet dreams. My God, let me live to do one good action to redeem the past."

The flames still crept upwards.

"You have denied me everything, O my God,—even the love and tears of a mother! a poor child abandoned by her, a beggar and vagabond, having the street for a country and pavements for a home, and working for bread, and forced to receive it from a robber. If I have been guilty of evil, if I have helped to commit crimes, give me time to repent; let me live; pity, my God, pity me!"

The flames still crept upwards.

"O my God! Ah, if you will permit me to escape the danger which threatens me, if you will stop the flames which have almost reached me, I will believe in you, my God, and serve you. I will become an honest man. I will employ my days for all men; my arms shall be ready to serve and save them; I swear it, O my God,—I swear it; receive my oath."

The flames still ascended.

But the prayer of the poor child ascended higher still. God heard it. The heavens were darkened, lightnings flashed and the thunder rolled, and in an instant, as if the heavens were opened, the rain fell in torrents, and in a short space of time, the flames were completely extinguished.

"God has heard me. God wills that I become an honest, brave man." And Juan actually wept for joy.

For the hour that the storm continued with unabated violence, Juan remained in the tree. The rain ceased, and the boy was just descending from the tree, when he saw a man approaching, carrying a double-barrelled rifle in his hand. Nearly fainting with fatigue, he leaned against the trunk of the tree in which Juan sat, and wiping the sweat and rain from his brow, he raised his hat, while he swore a terrible oath. That voice Juan remembered too well, the voice of Caralo the bandit. "Caralo, his deadly enemy, had escaped.

The unhappy captive, to whom the hope of life and liberty had but just returned, remained immovable, stricken dumb with despair and terror, his heart already filling with doubts of God's goodness and mercy.

The robber remained motionless against the tree, which Juan did not understand, but he found a reason soon in the appearance of a carriage, drawn by four powerful horses, the head one being ridden by a youthful postilion, and containing an old man and two young girls. Juan saw that the carriage must pass directly under the tree where he was, and he determined to cry out. Caralo, with a single glance of his eye, saw that the youthful but powerful postilion was the only one to be feared. He waited, and as the carriage came, seized the head horse and knocked the postilion with the stock of his rifle, stunned on the ground, then levelling his carbine at the head of the old man, cried out:

"Your money and the ladies' jewels and purses, or I fire!"

The carriage door opened, and the old man, with white hair, drawing a sword, advanced boldly to his enemy.

"Give up your arms."

"Never!" cried the old man, proudly.

"Resistance is useless; your purse and arms, or I fire."

"Fire, if you wish. Don Juan d'Aguilar never gives up his arms to such as you."

Caralo's finger was on the trigger, his carbine levelled at the old don's head, when a crashing of branches above him was heard, and a mass fell upon the head of the robber, bearing him to the earth. It was Juan, who, watching the affair below him, had thrown himself from the tree upon Caralo's head just as he was about to fire. He was unhurt by his fall, and roned himself almost immediately, crying: "Save thyself—save thyself!"

But as he uttered this cry, Caralo sprang up and threw Juan to the earth, uttering an exclamation of rage and surprise:

"It is he—it is that wretch! This time he shall not escape me."

And holding his weak, trembling enemy down with his feet, he was about knocking him on the head with the butt of his rifle, when the old man, with a quick, vigorous stroke, plunged the sword into the back of his enemy, who sprang up with a piercing shriek and fell dead. Then raising poor Juan, he led him to the carriage, saying:

"Here, my children, Carmina and Alitea, welcome your father's saviour, a child scarcely older than yourself."

He placed him by his side in the carriage, and bade the postilion, who had recovered his senses, to mount and drive on. As they rode along, the old man made Juan tell his name, all his life, and it was with horror he and his two lovely daughters listened to the recital, while the old knight felt his heart warm towards the brave child. He actually shuddered as Juan described his situation in the burning tree, while he smilingly said:

"The habitation seemed to me in a bad state, and thou shouldst make a better choice. But I offer you another, another with me, at Pampluna, if you will come with me."

Joy flashed in the eyes of Juan, and for his only answer, he seized the don's hand and kissed it. The two girls looked at him with gentle smiles, and Juan closed his eyes, with joy and surprise, when he ventured to ask where he was going, and received for answer: "To the palace of the viceroys."

CHAPTER IX.

THE MOOR'S PALACE.

DURING the two years Juan had been obliged to keep company with Josef Baptista and his lawless associates, other events had been taking place in Spain. Philip II. had bequeathed to his son, Philip III., the war against England, and the Count de Lerma, wishing to signalize the first days of his ministry by a striking success, had fitted out a fleet of fifty vessels, and commanded Martin Padilla to try a descent into England. The fleet of the Count de Lerma was not more fortunate than the famous Armada. The vessels were dispersed by a storm, and forced to put back into Spanish ports, without having met the enemy. Ireland revolted against Elizabeth, and under the pretext of bearing aid to the insurgents, the new minister resolved to conquer the island. The old councillors of Philip II., among whom was Don Juan d'Aguilar, whom they sent on the expedition, declared that six thousand men were not sufficient to take Ireland. At that, the Count de Lerma answered that Spain could furnish a larger army even than that, and if Don d'Aguilar feared to undertake the expedition, there were plenty of others proud and willing to defend the honor of Spanish arms.

D'Aguilar accepted the post, and only stipulated that in place of the commander, Martin Padilla, his mortal enemy, he might have his friend, Don Juan Guevara. The Count de Lerma, who did not doubt the success of the arms, was already dreaming that Ireland belonged to Spain, when news was received of a revolt, and the consequent defeat of the army. The Spaniards, fighting with their accustomed bravery, sustained the contest for a long time, and rendered the victory uncertain, but abandoned by Tyrone and the Irish, d'Aguilar was obliged to retreat. Instead of coming to his aid, the Irishmen were struck with terror, and became submissive to Elizabeth, without any anxiety for the allies who came to aid them. D'Aguilar wished at last to preserve for the king the army, whose safety the world thought hopeless. Attacked on the land by the viceroy and all his army, and the coast guarded by an English fleet, the Spanish general declared to Lord Montjoy, who was surrounded by the ruins of Kinsale and Baltimore, that if those two cities were lost to Spain, they were equally so to England. Lord Montjoy, whose heart was noble and generous, responded to this courageous declaration of d'Aguilar's, by offering to him a capitulation which he should himself dictate; which granted to the troops all the honors of war.

All this had been granted him, and yet d'Aguilar was accused of cowardice and treason. Accused by the Count de Lerma, who hated him, d'Aguilar was thrown into prison, there to await his trial and execution, for well he knew that the count, the king's favorite and prime minister, would find ways and means to condemn him to death.

Philip III. had married Margaret, the youngest daughter of the Archduke Charles of Austria, and the cities had celebrated the nuptials by fetes, tournaments and rejoicings. This had happened only since Juan had been confined in Castle Socorro; and yet Margaret had felt that she had a master in the Count de Lerma, the erasing favorite of her husband, the king. Young and romantic, she had loved the weak king, and believed he loved her, but she had scarcely been married six months, when she learned, to her utter disgust and dismay, that Philip II. had chosen her for his son's wife, and the Count de Lerma had prevailed upon him to fulfil the wishes of his father. All her sweet dreams were dissipated, and Margaret became cold and haughty.

Philip III. went to perform his nine days' devotion at the church of Saint James de Compostella, and the queen set out to spend the time at Yuejar. On her way there, she came in sight of the beautiful palace belonging to Don Delascar d'Alberique. The bells of the cows and sheep sounded through the quiet valley, and accompanied by the chant of the shepherds, made a soft melody entirely new to the young queen. She inquired who was the proprietor of the peaceful valley, and upon being told, she expressed a desire to alight and pass the night there. The chamberlain told her it was impossible. Margaret haughtily demanded why.

"They expect your majesty at Tujar, this evening. Besides, it is impossible, for Don Delascar is a Moor."

"Are not the Moors our subjects as well as the other inhabitants of Spain?" asked the queen, with increasing indignation.

"Yes, madame," replied the chamberlain; "but I am sure his excellency, the Count de Lerma, would formally oppose your stopping there."

The queen cast upon him a scornful glance, and her whole air expressed indignation. Then turning to one of the noblemen in her suite, she ordered him to go to Don Delascar, and ask him if he would receive for that night the queen of Spain.

The count left, and turning to the chamberlain, she said:

"I will not oblige you, senor marquis, to brave the rage of the king, or still more the anger of the Count de Lerma, by following us into this house. You may return to the city."

She had hardly finished speaking, when an old man, mounted upon a snow-white horse, approached, and dismounting, knelt before her.

"I did not think so great an honor was reserved for myself and family; but your majesty wishes to commence her reign by making them happy, and in this house, where she condescends to enter, each day her name will be repeated with respect and gratitude." Then rising, with a look which recalled the majesty of the Moorish kings, he added: "Others would offer you the keys of their cities or their fortresses. All that I have is not worthy of your acceptance; but it is said that the benediction of an old man brings happiness. Permit me to call Heaven's blessing upon you. Thou shalt be blessed, O queen. Let thy sceptre be light. May all thy days be happy!"

It was the first time, since Margaret had been in Spain, that she had heard words that went to her heart, and it was with tears in her bright eyes that, holding out her hand to him, she said:

"Son of the Abencerrages, we will partake of the hospitality of a Moor. Let us enter."

The first courtyard was surrounded with light arcades, formed by light trellis-work beautifully wrought, and sustained by slender columns of white marble. The air was filled with the fragrance of flowers, and the garden was brilliant with blossoms of the cactus, aloe and eaper-tree. On the left of the court, a richly-ornamented gateway served for the principal entrance into the inner court, paved with white marble, where young girls, in Moorish costume, waited to throw before the queen new and foreign flowers which she had never seen. Margaret regarded everything with an astonishment and childish pleasure she did not attempt to conceal or disguise. The halls through which she passed were filled with beautiful flowers, statues and tapestry.

During the evening, Margaret conversed with Don Delascar, and he spoke, not of the conquests of his ancestors, but of those which enriched Spain. When Margaret slept, she dreamed of Yornide, who was put to death by a jealous spouse for a crime which Margaret would have pardoned—that of having been loved too well.

The queen woke at daybreak, and rose to examine her chamber. All in the house were asleep, except herself. She threw a light mantle over her shoulders, already covered by her very beautiful golden hair, and was gazing at a beautiful statue, when she heard a slight noise, and turning, she saw a young man entering quickly, and going to the alcove, where stood her bed, cried out:

"My father—my father, awake! It is me. I have just arrived, and I must speak to you instantly." So speaking, he raised the curtains which hung before the bed, and to his surprise, found it deserted. "Left already!" he cried; and turning to leave the room, was struck speechless with astonishment on seeing a beautiful young girl in morning toilet standing before him, blushing, while she lowered her eyes.

"Are you a child of the prophet, a houri, a fairy?" asked he, tremblingly.

"No," replied Margaret, with dignity, "but I am thy queen—thy queen to whom thy father has extended his hospitality for this night."

Yezid fell on his knees before her.

"Pardon, madame, pardon!" he cried.

The queen made him a sign with her hand to rise, and approaching him, asked how he came to enter that apartment at that hour.

"I have journeyed all the night. I have just arrived from Cadiz, and as all the world was asleep, I entered this, my father's chamber, by a secret passage, known only to myself and him."

"What passage?" asked the queen.

The young man hesitated a moment, then seeing truth and candor in the eyes of the queen, he said:

"It is a secret belonging to my family. My father has said: 'Disclose it only to God and his angels.'" He looked at the queen with respect and admiration, and added: "I can tell you, I think, my queen."

Margaret was pleased, and asked to be shown the passage. Yezid told her that the passage led to a chamber containing the treasures of his fathers, treasures which were bequeathed to him by them.

"No one knows their existence. These treasures we constantly increase by our work, that in time of persecution we may be able to help our brothers and ourselves. God will not punish me for having had confidence in my sovereign."

"You are right," said Margaret; "thy father and thyself were alone possessors of the secret; we will be three now; no others." Then raising her hand, she exclaimed: "I swear that the king, my husband, or any of his ministers, shall never know of it."

Then bidding Yezid show the way, she followed him closely through the secret door into the narrow, dimly-lighted passage leading to the cave beneath the palace. One part of the passage was so dark that the queen was obliged to lean upon her companion's arm, whose heart beat wildly to think that the beautiful Margaret, the queen of Spain, deigned to lean upon the arm of him, a Moor. The remembrance of these few moments never left him.

At last the long passage was ended, and opening a door, Yezid led the queen into a spacious chamber, lighted by many silver lamps. The roof of the hall was supported by eight black marble pillars ornamented with gold and precious stones. In marble vases, placed between the pillars, were countless pieces of gold and silver, bearing the images of the califs of Cordova, or the kings of Granada. In chests of wood and iron, were placed jewels and precious stones, while the outside were ornamented with rubies and pearls. Here and there stood crystal cups filled with diamonds, emeralds and rubies.

The queen looked at all these things in perfect silence, not daring to walk, or even speak, fearing that the sound of her voice would break the dream, which so charmed her that she wished to prolong it. She seated herself upon a chair, and pensive, continued silent. Yezid knelt respectfully before her.

"Will your majesty grant to her faithful servant the greatest of all requests?"

"Speak, Yezid."

"I shall never forget this day, the sweetest and most glorious in my life, and nothing will be wanting to add to it, if your majesty will deign to accept a souvenir of it."

"I promise it, Yezid."

Hearing these words, Yezid took up one of the crystal cups, and emptied it in the queen's lap.

Margaret looked severe, but she saw only respect in Yezid's eyes; and looking at the precious stones in her lap, she selected what she deemed the least valuable—a turquoise, on which were engraven some strange cyphers, and said to him, as she took it:

"You see I pardon you."

Yezid trembled with joy.

"But it must not be said that the queen of Spain received it from the Moor Yezid without giving him anything. What can I do for you?"

Yezid remained silent.

"Art thou so happy that there is nothing thy sovereign can do for thee?"

"Nothing for myself, but perhaps for a friend."

"Speak, then."

"A friend of my father's, a noble and brave gentleman, who cares for nothing, save his honor."

"What shall I do?"

"I ask justice for him."

"And thou shalt have it; I swear it to you. Speak, Yezid, speak."

And Yezid recounted the history of Don Juan d'Aguilar, with which we are acquainted already, who could not defend himself, nor convey the proofs of his innocence to his king. The queen told him to give them to him, for she would see that his innocence was established. Joyfully Yezid handed them to her, and she placed them in her bosom. Again the queen asked to aid him, but he asked nothing for himself, but liberty for the friend of his youth, Fernand d'Albayda, who had been thrown into prison for defending his uncle, Don d'Aguilar. The queen smiled brightly, and promised all. Looking at the turquoise, she asked the meaning of the signs engraven on it. Yezid told her it signified always. She turned, and together they left the chamber, and gained the upper world. Just as they were leaving the subterranean chamber, the queen stooped and picked up a pomegranate flower, which she placed in her girdle.

In the morning, when the queen appeared, Delascar presented to her all those who worked in his manufactories. The masters of the establishments presented the queen and ladies with pieces of rich stuff and precious tissues. Then Delascar, taking his son's hand, presented the handsome Yezid to his queen. The hour for departure came, and the carriages were ready. Turning graciously to Don d'Alberique, she said:

"I hope that Don Delascar d'Alberique will come and visit us in our palace, wherever we may be, and let us return the hospitality we have received from him. But before I leave his roof, I pray my host to ask something of me."

Delascar looked at his son, who whispered one word in Arabic to him. The queen wore the pomegranate blossom in her belt.

"I ask of your majesty only the flower she wears in her girdle." The queen, astonished, hesitated a moment, then with a trembling hand, detached the flower and handed it to the old man. An instant afterwards, the six Arabian coursers bore the queen of Spain into the midst of the rich pleasures of the kingdom of Valencia.

A few days afterwards, faithful to her promise to Yezid, the queen obtained not only the release of Don d'Agnilar and his nephew, but his appointment of viceroys of Navarre, and Fernand d'Albayda, captain of the queen's regiment. All these things happened while Juan was with the bandits.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE GRAND DUKE AND GRAND DUCHESS OF BADEN.

As we desire to keep our readers informed of whatever is considered noteworthy in all parts of the world, we have presented them, on this page, with portraits of "His Serene Highness," as he is styled by his loyal lieges, the Grand Duke of Baden, and his bride, the Grand Duchess Louisa, daughter of the Prince of Prussia. They are not particularly distinguished by anything but rank, yet their nuptials, which were recently solemnized at Berlin, made the talk of Europe for a long time. It is curious to contrast the simplicity of our manners with the pomp and parade attendant upon aristocratic societies; and as, moreover, the narrative of any wedding is readable, we make no apology for inserting a condensed account of the doings at the nuptials of these high and mighty personages, reserving the privilege of a quiet smile at the pomposity of the proceedings. At the appointed hour, six o'clock in the evening, the nobility invited to attend the ceremony arrived at the palace, and some time after, the royal and illustrious personages entered the Electoral Chamber. At the same time the royal crown was brought in, and placed by the queen on the head of the royal bride. The king then gave orders for the ceremony to begin, and the master of the ceremonies, Baron von Stillfried, led the parties to the places appointed for them in the procession, which passed through the Rittersaal, the Picture Gallery, the White Chamber, to the new chapel, where their serene highnesses were received by the court chaplain, Dr. Strauss, and the clergy attached to the court, and led to the altar, where the bridegroom placed himself to the right of the bride, and the royal and illustrious company formed a semi-circle around them. When all had taken their places, Dr. Strauss performed the marriage ceremony, and at the moment when the bride and bridegroom exchanged rings, on a signal given by the adjutant, a salvo of thirty-six guns was fired. After the blessing had been pronounced, the king, queen, and the rest of the company, retired in the same order in which they entered, to the Crimson-velvet Chamber, where the illustrious pair received congratulations. After the ceremonies, supper was announced, where the viands for the Royal table were served by Lieutenants-General Brese and Von Mollendorf. After supper, the torch dance was performed. As soon as the king and queen, and the bride and bridegroom, had taken their stations under the canopy of the throne, and the royal princesses had placed themselves on the left, and the royal princes on the right, the king ordered the grand marshal to begin the ceremony. He approached the new-married pair, and invited them to begin the dance, which was performed in the following order: The grand marshal, with his staff, and twelve ministers of state, bearing white wax torches, two by two, followed by the bride and bridegroom. After making a tour of the hall, the bride approached the king, and, bowing to him, invited him to dance, and a fresh tour of the hall was made. In like manner, the bride danced with all the princes, and the bridegroom with the queen and princesses. When the dance was finished, the ministers accompanied the royal pair, and the princes and princesses, to the queen's apartments, where the torches were delivered to twelve pages ready to receive them, who lighted the newly-married pair to their own apartments. Here the crown was delivered to the keeper of the crown jewels, and after the garter of the bride had been distributed by the first lady in waiting, the company departed. The three following days were given up to festivities. After divine service on the Sunday, a grand déjeuner à la fourchette, and card parties in the evening. On the next day, the festivities were held in the Rittersaal and the Picture Gallery, and galopade in the evening; on the following day, a family dinner at the Prince of Prussia's, and concert in the evening, brought the festivities to a close. Their serene highnesses returned to Baden. In all the places through which they passed, they were received with every demonstration of joy. In every town and village on their road, Prussian and Baden colors waved from the houses, ornamented with flowers and garlands. Numerous loving couples deferred their crowning joy till that day; and when the moment at which the troth was plighted was made known by the telegraph from Berlin, the churches throughout the land sent forth a merry peal. In the evening, the houses in the principal towns of Baden were illuminated, and huge bonfires shot forth their flames from the tops of the mountains in the Oden and Schwartz walds. The grand duchy of Baden is known to all the world for the fashion of its watering places. Baden-Baden is a brilliant resort in summer, and the revelries of the grand duke are swelled by the enormous taxes paid into his treasury by the gaming tables.

A PHYSICIAN ON DANCING.

That beautiful, graceful accomplishment of dancing, so perverted by late hours and the indecency of fashionable attire, has outraged many sensible people, and led them to deprive the young of one of the most simple and healthful enjoyments, because it has been abused. For myself, I can testify not only to its healthful, but to its recuperative power. The fortieth, nay, the fiftieth year of my age, found me enjoying this life-cheering exercise. It should be one of the earliest amusements of children, and care should be taken by parents that it is understood as an amusement. While I am on this topic, I will mention a case that occurred in my practice. A thoughtful, anxious mother, who had lost three children, brought to me her only remaining child—a daughter; her temperament nervous bilious—the nervous fearfully predominant, with great irritability of the system—peevish, passionate, dyspeptic, sleepless—of course exacting, arbitrary, and uncomfortable; the poor child looked sad, old, morbid, and miserable. She had been to school because her parents thought it an amusement for her to be with other children. After critically examining her physiognomy, I said to her mother, "What is the temperament of your husband?" "The same as my own," she replied. "Then the child is doubly stamped," I continued, "and very vigorous measures must be used, if you expect to restore her health. Divorce her immediately from anything mental, so far as memorizing is concerned; then send her to a dancing school, that she may combine exercise with order and melody, and thus some of her rough edges may be rounded." The child—her large eyes wide open with wonder and delight—interrupted with, "Dancing school? O, how I've longed to go! but mother says it's wrong, and leads to wickedness." What a dilemma for a physician—what a dilemma for a child! "Did you ever intend your daughter to play the piano, guitar, or other musical instrument?" said I, to the mother. "O, yes," was the answer. "Why," I continued,—"why show such partiality to the upper extremities? The hands are rendered happy as a medium of melody; the feet are rendered equally happy in the same way." A nice afternoon school received the little girl, who grew in health and harmony every month as she followed the hygienic rules prescribed for her. Dancing is a healthful, beautiful, graceful recreation, and is not responsible for the abuses luxury has thrown around it. The vulgarism and excitements of the ball room have no more to do with the simple enjoyment of the dance, than the rich fare of the gourmand, with the temperate repasts that satisfy natural wants.

—Dr. Harriot K. Hunt.

SERVANTS' MARKET, IN MOSCOW, RUSSIA.

The two pictures on the next page transport us into the midst of a very strange scene in a very strange country—the Market for Servants in the Kitai Yard of the city of Moscow, Russia. The first picture shows the interior, with a singular collection of specimens of humanity in peculiar costumes. We have an itinerant pedler of trinkets on one side; on the other, a liquor dealer, dispensing his steaming beverage. A couple of Russian wood-sawyers are in the centre. Hats and caps of various patterns meet the eye, with here and there the helmet of a soldier, and the fur head-gear of a Tartar. Pretty girls and dismal-looking loafers, seeking situations, arrest the attention. The second picture is an exterior view of the market, with its throngs of people. Outside of the groups, here and there, a street pedlar has established his little portable table. In the foreground, and elsewhere, are groups squatted on the ground; in the distance, rise the domes and spires of the great city, which has, viewed from a distance, a strange oriental aspect. This market for servants is a peculiar institution of Moscow. The business of the Moscow market is thus transacted: Each servant who arrives in the town, after having obtained permission from his or her master to try the fortune of the market, pays an annual fee (called a brock); perhaps, after a certain number of years' service, they save sufficient money, and they buy their freedom, which is regulated according to ability. Count Cheremetieff, however, is said to possess about forty thousand serfs, but he will not give any of them their liberty, though many of them are worth millions of rubles. The market is situated just outside the ancient boundary wall (the Kitai Yard) of Moscow. Here all servants are engaged. It is a large plot of ground, with a shed erected in the centre for protection from bad weather. The market is held every day throughout the year. The most busy day is Sunday. The bargain is as follows: A person wanting a servant

GRAND DUKE OF BADEN AND HIS BRIDE, PRINCESS LOUISA OF PRUSSIA.

INTOXICATION OF THE EAR.

During the hallucination produced by taking the Indian hemp (Cannabis Indica), the intensity of the sense of sound is most striking. The celebrated Theodore Gualtier related to Dr. Moreau, in poetic language which it is hopeless to attempt to translate, so as to give an idea of the style of this imaginative author, the sensation produced. He says that his "sense of hearing was prodigiously developed. I actually heard the noise of colors—green, red, blue and yellow sounds reached me in waves perfectly distinct. A glass overturned, the creaking of a footstool, a word pronounced low, vibrated and shook me like peals of thunder; my own voice appeared to me so loud that I dared not speak for fear of shattering the walls around me, or of making me burst like an explosive shell; more than five hundred clocks sang out the hour with a harmonious, silver sound; every sonorous object sounded like the note of a harmonica or the æolian harp. I swam or floated in an ocean of sound." Such is the exaggerated language which has been employed by an individual whose taste and enjoyment of music have rendered his criticism on that art so much sought after, and it serves to indicate how highly the mental faculties may become excited.—Journal of Psychological Medicine.

INTERIOR SHED, MARKET FOR SERVANTS AT MOSCOW.

states what service he requires and the amount of wages he feels disposed to give. Thus, all description of laborers—carpenters and joiners, girls for factories, etc., are engaged. Soldiers who have served a certain number of years can obtain a billet for six years; they generally get places as watchmen, the government not liking them to go into dangerous employment for fear of injury. When you engage a man-servant, you take his passport; and on the day he commences work, his name is entered in the police-books; every day you miss getting this entry made, you are subject to a fine of sixty kopeks. On the day the servant is discharged, you must also get the name erased from the police-books. If a servant has a complaint to make, he or she must go to the police-station, where, if the servant is found to be in the wrong, a good whipping is inflicted; but the master, with the aid of a few roubles a day, is always in the right, as a matter of course.

THE OPEN MARKET FOR SERVANTS, AT MOSCOW.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

FORGIVE HER, NOW SHE'S DEAD!

BY BELL BRAMBLE.

They've called thee strong as Death, O, Love!
But mightier far thou art.—J. D. B.

"'Twas past, and she was dying—yet from her broken heart
She thus poured forth her latest prayer before she must depart:
"Go to my husband! bear this ring—the ring with which he wed—
I feel he won't refuse the pledge when told that I am dead."

"Ask him to wear it for the sake of days ere love grew cold—
In memory of the fond heart then, now throbbing faint and cold:
O, could he weigh its yearning love, or know how it has bled,
I think he could forgive me when told that I am dead."

"And pray him not to think of me as sunk in guilt and shame:
Tell him that only in my prayers I breathed my husband's name—
Tell him how fated was my cheek long ere my spirit fled,
And beg him to forgive my fault when told that I am dead."

"O, pray him to forgive my fault—the guilt by which I fell:
I ever loved my husband—his friend I loved too well!
Could he but know the penitence of guilty tears I've shed,
I think he could forgive my sin when told that I am dead."

"I knew that Jesus said the stone should first by such be cast
As led a sinless life themselves, nor risked the fearful cost—
The cost of many a sorrow and sin that's on my head:
And yet Christ will forgive me, I feel, when I am dead."

"He knows how gentle was my heart, and loving from my birth;
And he knows that the fondest ones suffer most on earth:
And I feel that when Frank knows I'm gone—the suffering spirit fled,
In his heart he'll keep my memory, and love me when I'm dead."

A hushed and holy calm reigned there—that struggle was the last;
The ransomed spirit soared above—life's fitful dream was past.
With tearful eyes I left the couch to bear, with hurrying tread,
The penitent's last earthly prayer—forgive her, now she's dead!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE FOURTH POINT.

BY FRANCIS W. BUTTMANN.

"GOOD-BY, Onora! Adio, Leonora!" "Di noello tutto par bello!" You'll not be so gay twenty-four hours hence, I'll warrant!" sung gay voices from the Italian garden on the cliffs above the little felucca that swung round in the blue bay below.

"Hooray," replied a sweet voice ringing from the deck, "non, non, mio nido e bello sempre!" and Leonora, kissing her hand to the friends above, as the craft separated the waters with a sharp keel, was soon beyond speaking distance.

Taking a seat on deck, she overlooked the sea, enjoying the brilliant scene, while a damp wind filled her streaming ringlets with foam, and loosened the airy folds of amber-hued gauze and crape which adorned her figure. The voyage was to be but a short one—a little over a hundred miles, to one of the Levantine islands, where dwelt an aunt of Leonora's—and darkness set in, with a gently increasing wind, ere they had made much progress. By night, the wind swelling and whistling hoarsely in the shrouds, filled the young passenger's heart with a vague dread, and ere morning a wild hurricane had compelled the sheets to be furled, while they drove along beneath it. But sunrise, as is frequently the case in those vehement squalls of the Mediterranean, brought a counter movement, and after several tacks about, the ship swung loosely to and fro in a dead calm. Wrapping a mantle about her, Leonora went on deck. Here and there, plunging on the yet heaving bosom of the deep, masts, keel and rudder told of disasters which might have happened to them, but no human being was to be seen.

"Who can have been wrecked?" said she, turning to the master of the felucca.

"God send," returned he, "that it may have been Timour the Tartar, as is scouring these seas. St. Peter himself would not save such a pirate as he!"

"Pirate! Tamerlane a pirate?"

"Ah, my lady! True, he conquers by land, but just now, to serve his own purposes, he conquers by sea. Had it not been that the felucca dips her beak into the waters like a bird, we had been where many another crew are. As soon wreck a stormy-petrel; she's too small for the waves to get a purchase of her."

"There, look there, signor! is it not one of the wrecked? Is it not a man swimming with a spar? Hark, a breeze springs up! Put about, and save him!"

"Not I!" cried the captain, in horror; "he may be one of the very pirates."

"No?" returned Leonora, with flashing eyes. "Not save a drowning fellow-creature! But, signor, you shall! Obey me, or by Heaven you lose your ship to-morrow!"

Crossing himself piously, time and again, trembling under her glance, and muttering execrations and ejaculations, he proceeded to comply. Meanwhile, the swimmer, making rapid advances, was now near enough to be quite plainly discerned. A red scarf, one end still half entangled round his head by something that looked like a band of jewels, hung down and was twisted round the upper part of his body; one shoulder only was bare and flashing white, as dripping with water it met the level beams of sunrise; his hair was long and black, and dipped in and out of the water like curling snakes. The strokes with which he parted the waves were vigorous and muscular. Springing half out of the sea, with now and then a quick gesture of throwing aside the hair drifting across his sight, till catching the rope thrown him, he coiled it swiftly up with one hand, and deserting his spar, leaped lightly upon deck, from whence, according to Leonora's previous directions, he was immediately conducted to change his garments. In a moment or two, his dripping, flowing robes lost in an Italian suit of white, tight-fitting clothing, but the red scarf wrung out and placed again carelessly round his temples, with the long ends flowing in the quickening breeze, he ran lightly up the ladder and joined Leonora. There was a commanding ease in his gait, a free, bold motion of the limbs, that betokened a strength and nerve and spirit never found in the common Italian now, and seldom then, in the fourteenth century. His face, too, was Eastern in its characteristics, and very singular. At first sight you saw nothing but the eyes below very fine, long, narrow, and highly-arched black eyebrows. They were large, and impressed you as by far the largest portion of his face. They were black, blacker far than his jetty hair; they were bright, sparkling with greater brilliancy than the gems that confined his scarf; coals of fire, constantly fanned by a strong breath behind thinnest vapor, could not have burned so brightly as those eyes. His face, at first sight, was repellent; one did not care, one preferred not to look again, but if courage came with an afterthought and a second glance, you perceived the thick, black rays of lashes in which these eyes were set, the low, long, white forehead, the dilating nostrils, the sudden crimson high upon the cheek, so sudden and with such contrast, that one would have pronounced it artificial did it not come and go, as it were, with every inhalation and respiration; one saw the lips, thin, red and chiselled so finely that the corners were lost in a delicate line, and one saw small, white teeth flashing under the dark hair that trimmed the haughtily curled upper lip. But all this was not seen at once, for the eyes might have withered you to ashes with their flames, had you dared persist. All this Leonora felt; but partially fortified by gazing at him while swimming, and by the glimpse she obtained when on deck, her own eyes, nevertheless, sought the ground.

"They tell me, lady," said he, addressing her in a voice like silver wires vibrating in a hot wind, low and musical, yet rather painful at first from its intensity, "that I owe my escape to you. That fearing I belonged to that villainous Tamerlane, and would bring all the magic of his crew with me to annihilate this little float, I should have been abandoned to my fate but for your decision. Accept my thanks. Perhaps it may never be in the stranger's power to return such favor, but let his will answer till it is."

At the mention of the word "magic," all within hearing had recoiled, and Leonora, raising her eyes slowly but determinedly, answered:

"Do not thank me, signor, nor yet depreciate an ignorant people for their pardonable superstition."

"Pardonable, madam, since I owe your interference to it. Nay, lady," as she half turned her face away, "why veil yourself? Here in my Italian dress, speaking to an unveiled lady, I feel as if I were born on European shores, listening to endless nightingales, and had never heard the roar of lions when half buried in Asiatic sands. Pray, do not destroy the illusion!"

Rather annoyed, she sank on the seat, wishing that might signify him to leave her; to her amazement, he took a similar place beside her, resuming:

"Though had I you there in my native land, so closely veiled would I keep that beauty, so darkly swathed in linen bulwarks, that even the anorous winds should never breathe on your heavenly radiance, lest they tell it to others and I lose so invaluable a treasure! Ah, Leonora!"

She looked up, angrily.

"The signor forgets," she said, proudly, "that he is not in the centre of a harem of Asian odalisques. Retire!"

But coolly as he had taken it, the stranger retained his seat.

"I have watched you in Italy, in your bowers and your dances," said he. "I saw you embark; my sails hovered on a not distant horizon. I wrecked my ship that you might rescue me. I have boarded this in order only to capture your heart. I do not doubt but that ere we reach Corfu, worse adventures than I can have anticipated, will befall me, but fail in this I will not. By the Eternal! Leonora, I will win your love as madly as I've given mine to you."

"You take a singular method. My heart is not a city, to be stormed, nor a fortress, to be carried by assault."

The stranger smiled, a fascinating smile, as Leonora confessed to herself, what time she dared to think at all, for it seemed as if he read her very thoughts with that searching eye.

"Let us at least begin," said he, frankly, "as friends."

"No, signor; you speak to me as no lady suffers herself to be addressed. We cannot be friends."

"Ah? Let me see. A friend comprehends far more than a lover. I am your lover. I ask you to be my friend. Behold the confidence I repose in you; I trust you, and entreat of your generosity far more than I give. I think we can compass it."

"But, signor, your confidence, in yourself at least, is imposing. Consider a moment. If you know me, you are quite aware of my rank. You will excuse me, signor; you are an adventurer, a stranger, I know nothing of you. From your manners, I am led to infer you do not believe in marriage other than as exhibited in Mohammedan seraglios. Think of such an alliance! Pardon me, signor, it is absurd."

"The lady will believe me, I speak truth. I aver, that in mere worldly rank I am far superior to her; that where one is her slave, thousands are mine;" returned the stranger, leaning forward and looking at her steadfastly, while resting his elbow on his knee and his head on his hand. "As for my wealth, it is boundless. I believe in one marriage with one wife, the light, life and blessing of home; no harems, Leonora. As for my name—call me Marhene, for you found me in the sea. I rose upon you like Venus. I brought love with me, dripping from me as water from the goddess. For my real name, when you promise to be my wife you shall know it. Pray, do not let curiosity stimulate you. Lady, there are thousands of Asian women who faint, dazzled at my words of love. I do not want a slave, however beautiful, but a wife, virtuous, chaste, intelligent, such, in short, as I can find in Europe alone. I wish myself to win love and not surroundings. Therefore I am striving for your love, and I shall have it!"

"Well, signor," replied Leonora, carelessly, "when I love you I will tell you. You speak Italian too well."

"I speak all languages. Will you do me a favor?" said he.

"I have already done one too many."

"Let me pray you to wear this ring lest I lose you."

Her contemptuous, impatient "No!" had no effect, for snatching her hand, he had thrust on her finger a small, close ring, with a diamond star around a costly ruby for a facet. Ere she could tear it in indignation away, a sudden whisper and murmur of voices rung around and arrested her attention, while all eyes were bent in one direction; and forgetting all else, Leonora looked too. Not far distant, a suspicious-looking craft, with a long, black hull and high bulwarks on the stern, was driving down upon them.

"Timour, Timour!" ejaculated the captain. "We are irretrievably lost! Where were ye, fools, that I saw nothing, when we might yet have been saved!" and he flung himself on the deck, as if he already felt the knife of the pirate at his throat.

"It is not too late," said the voice of Marhene, compelling the captain to rise, fascinated and spell-bound. "Let your men, at least such as are not paralyzed by fear, obey me."

Instantly the crew were at his command, and almost as soon, the sails were backed and hanging limp, while the ship drifted idly down the current. The voice of the stranger, in quick, vehement commands, was heard above the rattling cordage, and manœuvre followed manœuvre with surprising skill, so that the pirate, completely mystified, and at first filled with surprise at what he had deemed an easy prize, began now to exhibit considerable anxiety.

"You will deliver us into the cursed Tartar's hands. By my soul, I believe you are here for that!" moaned the captain, as they were running down almost foul of the enemy, for the sixth time.

"Silence, thou knave!" said Marhene, in his first musical tones, and like showers of sparks sent off in parabolic curves, from some dark, central body, were the light, darting movements of the small vessel, aided by one or two sails, and the wonderful tactics, never before seen, of her new commander, as she at last described, by the most extraordinary steps, half a circle round the pirate.

Within a hundred yards of the latter, whose massive bulk was not so easily commanded, she started as the pirate presumed, upon another curve from which she would descend upon his opposite side. Anxious to foil her in this, he proceeded rather clumsily to turn around, and looking up, when the tiny war-boat had gained the usual distance, he saw every inch of linen upon her two masts stretched and filled, and with arrowy speed she was clearing the sea, and vanishing like a little cloud. Lumbering along, the pirate soon hugged the shore, and hid his bulky head within some one of the inlets that communicated with the inner sea. Meantime, Marhene, returning the trumpet to its owner, said:

"Signor il capitaine, I resign my command!" and resumed his seat by Leonora, who had been perfectly composed.

"A race of European cowards," he muttered.

"Nay, signor—"

"Marhene, if you please."

"You must excuse—"

"Marhene," persisted he.

"Well, Signor Marhene—"

"Drop the signor."

"I do not wish to," she replied.

"I insist upon it. I shall hear nothing without that prefix. What were you about to say, commencing with 'Nay, Marhene?'"

"Nay, Marhene, the pirates came from the East, and through your nonsense my remark has lost its flavor."

"One point gained, Leonora; and I always keep what is once obtained."

"Signor—"

"Marhene, Leonora. I like my new name. You were about to ask a favor; I shall grant it but on that address."

"Leave me, Marhene."

"Leonora, your slave obeys if commanded to spring into the sea. Yet first, read him his character."

"You are an impostor. And do not think because you can force all these men to do as you please, that, therefore, I am in your power."

"At least I can manage a ship well," said he, disregarding her last clause.

"You can manage a ship well, and we owe you cold thanks for our safety. Take them and leave me."

Rising, with a bow, he complied. She was angry at such insolence, and yet, she knew not why, half sorry he was gone. She could not tell what it was about him that so commanded her soul, and half against her will she turned her head to look at him.

Never, she must confess, had she seen so noble a gait; she hesitated—was he lame? impossible; that springing step, that light motion of the limbs, flung out nervously, that elasticity which seemed to spurn the earth, no one but envy impersonated could have turned into a halt, and so she acknowledged; but he never once turned his head, and she saw him mingle, in a certain gay and unapproachable familiarity, with the common sailors, till weary of jesting, he hung over the taffrail and gazed into the sea.

They were now nearly through the straits; on either side were high walls of rock, and beyond, the waters of the inner bay were calm and placid. They emerged slowly from the narrow chasm. Suddenly a wild cry rose from the felucca, and looking round, they found themselves close under the lee of a great ship, that reared its black bulwarks high above, bristling with spears, implements, and fiendish grins of their enemy who exultingly had so overreached them. A fierce shout from the pirates, at their cunning circumspection, arose, and in countless numbers they leaped upon the deck, making the felucca shake and groan with the shocks. In the midst of the affray that ensued, notwithstanding Leonora saw a dreadful fate impending, while she shuddered and trembled, she nevertheless found herself watching with considerable interest the action of Marlene, who, having snatched a sabre, he performed dreadful execution on the invaders. He was not by any means the tallest there, but nevertheless was by far the most prominent of all, as if some invisible force surrounded and magnified him, and compelled the most indifferent observer to single him from the ferocious tumult. All at once, he seemed to be alone, for no blows seconded his, and he met scores. His sabre was broken; he fell back, fighting every inch of the way, till quite near Leonora, seized a marine's pike, thrust it with stunning strength at his nearest opponent, twined his arm round her and sprang into the sea.

"How your heart beats," he said, as they rose at a great distance. "Did you think that although they possessed themselves of all your treasures on board, they should obtain my treasure?"

"I hardly know which were worse."

"Cool!"

"No. I acknowledge you have twice saved my life and placed me under infinite obligation."

"Not at all. If you will look at it in that light, I am but repaying my debt to you."

She clung round his neck, and he swam on in silence, now and then looking round, but no one followed. They were within a rod of the shore, when suddenly a boat darted from the cleft of a rock, and with powerful strokes nearly reached them. Marlene dived as swiftly, and came up at a distance; the boat started in pursuit, and again Marlene disappeared. Several times, thus fruitlessly the boat chased him, then quite at random as to his whereabouts, rowed hither and thither, but never quite in the right spot. At last, when he dived they rowed forward, to their exultation, he appeared at arm's length; it was not the work of an instant to deal him a savage blow on the head, and for strong, powerful grasps to tear the fainting Leonora from Marlene, who sank lifeless down through the dark waters; but it was not a burlesque that clung to the keel of that boat, and swam with it to the other shore.

Three days after, Leonora woke as from a trance, and found herself well nursed in a luxurious apartment, and in a week, half veiled in snowy gossamer, and robed in costly white muslin, she stood exposed for sale in the slave-market of Bagdad. Once or twice she saw a figure pass her, familiar, though apparently disguised and somewhat lame (and it is a singular historical fact that the lameness of this individual was never recognized in his own person, but only when he assumed the identity of another); a figure who gazed down the line as if seeking some one. Was it—could it be Marlene? No, she had seen him sink through the sea, and she remembered it with a sudden pang. Not that in the interval he had never crossed her mind; on the contrary, she seemed to have undergone a revulsion of feeling, and far from her former anger and contempt, she wondered, was interested, saddened and all but loved. Should she acknowledge her heart conquered by this utter stranger? He would never know it, he was dead; and alas! what use to love the dead. Yet it might not be; and half to obtain a better view, she cautiously parted a fold of lace with the hand where gleamed the ring thrust thereon by Marlene. In a moment the half-recognized figure stood before her.

"Thank me now," said he, "that I forced the ring on you."

"Thank you."

"You fetch a fine price, I hear; they hoped the Sultan Bajazet would see you. Which would you prefer for a master, he or I?"

She was silent.

"A second point gained, Leonora. A week ago you would have said Bajazet, now you are silent."

She felt it, and remained silent. The slave merchant now joined them. "Ten thousand pieces of gold," said he.

Marlene had respected her, and not, with a customer's privilege, raised her veil, or he would have seen the painful crimson that suffused her cheeks at being thus an object of barter. She, but a week since, possessed of vast wealth, countless vassals, high rank and freedom, now sold to a harem. The yellow metal glistened in the meshes of Marlene's purse, and the slave merchant had drawn out his tablets, when two plainly-dressed citizens entered the bazaar. The merchant deliberately replaced his tablets.

"Put up thy purse," said he, "the girl is not thine; yonder behold the sultan!"

"In disguise, then!" exclaimed Marlene.

"By Allah!" exclaimed one of the new-comers, "here among all this chaff is at least one grain of wheat. Behold, lord! Saw ever such symmetry? Look at the rich love-locks rolling under the veil! that exquisitely moulded hand—an houri descended to earth to reward your devotions at prayers, great Seigneur!" and with rudeness he approached Leonora, still discussing her person, and withdrew her veil.

Although European, and never having worn a veil, now, thus placed in the position of a woman where modesty required the use of one, there was something too insulting in this, and with thickening color and sparkling eyes, she shrunk back.

"Ah, what voluptuous blushes!" said one of the purchasers. "What a skin! Wells with stars in them do not equal the eyes! The price?"

"Fifteen thousand pieces of gold," answered the merchant, and that sum was speedily paid out.

While the three were counting the money, Marlene flitted back. "Folded, folded, folded!" said he, bitterly. "Do not therefore despair; I never was wholly overcome, I will not be now!" and he vanished.

A few moments had elapsed when a herald fell prone at the feet of the disguised sultan.

"Ah, sire! ah, light of the moon and offspring of the sun! Pardon, pardon. Damascus has revolted!"

The old monarch, quite frightened out of his proprieties, started up, and contrary to all Mohammedan allowances, indulged himself in quite a quantity of oaths. At last, slightly calmed, he said:

"What must be must be. I'll march on with the army. Timour the Tartar, may he halt forever! has been in this revolt, as in everything else! Mahmoud, don't follow with the harem and this new slave; we will encamp outside the walls. Speedily will this little affair be crushed," and with his kaftan streaming behind him, Bajazet left the market, followed by the vizier and the Italian.

Another week had passed, and amidst the quick vicissitudes of a hitherto happy life, one morning Leonora found herself, with other inmates of the royal seraglio, splendidly lodged in a temporary pavilion outside the gates of the besieged city, earnestly hoping that the order of attack would drive her from the sultan's memory, which was not, however, by any means the case. Every day till now, by most cunningly obtained opportunities, had Marlene presented himself before her, and been indulged with a short altercation, in turn rewarding her with hope of freedom. The siege was proceeding rapidly, as in those days sieges could, and Bajazet was rubbing his hands exultingly over his success.

"The hounds!" said he. "They dared, when I asked who was their master, to shout, with a voice like a tempest, Tamerlane! I'll teach them. By the way, Mahmoud, where is the lovely Italian?" and he leered frightfully.

"In the pavilion, seigneur," was the response.

"What is all this forbidden revelry and merriment without?" asked the sultan.

"It is a juggler," returned one, "that the soldiers have picked up, and he is the source of their laughter."

"A juggler," screamed the amazed potentate, "dare to enter the camp of Bajazet! Off with his head!"

But as some one suggested that his jokes might enliven the soldiery, who it is true, were rather flagging, his highness reversed the order, and commanded he should be brought in that he might see he was no spy of that filthy Tartar, as he dared term the king, who had added to his own paternal dominions four-fifths of Bajazet's, torn from him by the iron gauntlet of war, and the juggler entered. A man, past the prime, apparently, with sharp eyes under shaggy brows, in turn under a torn, green turban, whose color, green, sacred to a sacred race, would have been sufficient in itself to ensure his life. A short, red frock, girded by a golden belt, and rather tattered, with high buskins, completed his attire. He wore a tawny beard, covering half his face and breast, was undersized and stooping (though he might have been tall had he been able to carry himself upright), with a hump on his back, and walked with a cane, and one foot lamended. In the other arm he held his tools and toys. The sultan tapped his hump and satisfied himself from its hardness that it was real; trod on his foot and believed it sore because the man winced; pulled his beard, and believed it natural because it did not come off, and ordered him to proceed with his feats. They were in the court of the pavilion, and the females were separated by a golden lattice alone from the place, through which they looked down upon the scene, and as the juggler entered, Leonora floated forward and sat down before the grating. The juggler took a cylinder of solid iron, which he gave the sultan to look at, and after him the other courtiers, that they might satisfy themselves there was no flaw in it. Holding this outstretched in one hand, horizontally, he selected a sword of the finest temper of Damascus, swayed it several times in the air, while it bent and writhed from the strength of the strokes, like a whip lash, then coiling it up like a ribbon in a roll, he tossed it high up the lofty dome. The spectators beheld the quivering weapon straighten at the topmost instant of its flight, and recoiled, lest it should fall and sever them, but the juggler, while standing with his head bent forward, never once glanced up.

"If it should fall upon his neck," murmured Bajazet, "kill him and serve him right!"

But straight as a bolt, with flashing precision, the thin, wonderful weapon dropped, with a papery rustle, upon the iron cylinder, which fell on the ground parted in two portions by the electrical blow, while the sword hung trembling in the hand of the juggler. All the courtiers drew a long breath, and Leonora above, whose suspicions were at work, could have screamed from relief. Still in perfect silence, the juggler approached one of the courtiers and pulled a single fine thread from his garment. Planting the sword upright upon the ground, he broke off a portion of this thread and, with the lightest breath, wafted it against the edge of the blade. The thread shared the fate of the cylinder, and fell divided.

"I believe if I look at that sword much longer," muttered the superstitious Bajazet, "I, also, should fall severed in two pieces."

"Not thou," said the juggler, in a deep, half-inaudible tone, "but thy kingdom!"

The sultan trembled, and utterly in his power as the juggler was, felt the superior force inherent in the latter, as Leonora had felt it before him, and was, moreover, controlled by something uncanny, which the Easterns always attribute to the deformed. A dozen golden balls were now taken by the juggler, and for a short time, altogether, kept dancing aloft with one hand, while with the other, the sword flashed in and out between the mazes they described. There were twelve balls rising and falling as from a golden fountain playing in the air; suddenly twenty-four pieces fell at once to the ground, while as if a hundred swords were flashing and curling and interlacing on high, like a pond of aerial fishes, that one sword kept up its wonderful vibrations and involutions over their heads, while the swift motions of the lame juggler seemed to envelope him in a misty haze, through which you could hardly descry his true form. Murmurs of admiration went up from all the assembly and mingled with singular murmurs swelling outside the pavilion, but at last the latter predominated and the startling exclamation:

"The Tartars! O, the hordes! To arms, to arms!" struck on the bewildered ears within, till streaming through arch and door, all rushed out and left the juggler alone. The females, also, were flocking behind the golden lattice to the other part of the pavilion above, to behold the confusion, and Leonora still retained her position. Continuing to twirl his sword above, though frequently its dazzling point too near made her shrink, the juggler drew near her.

"Come down," said he, authoritatively.

"I cannot. The eunuchs would see me," she said.

"You would like to?"

"Certainly."

"A third point gained, Leonora; and there are but four points to the compass!"

"Well, the fourth lies before you."

"How?"

"By going on your own route."

"Thank you. I know in what direction my route lies, and at present am busy gaining the fourth point. Before noon I think it will be mine, as well as the battle almost beginning yonder. You told me the other day I was an extraordinary character, a mysterious being; to-day you have given me a larger space of thought than usual, with what conclusion, may I ask?"

"That, I will tell Marlene when he has gained the fourth point."

"You think it probable that I succeed?"

Leonora was silent a moment, then murmured:

"I imagine who you are. Ought I to love such a being?"

"You consider, then, the possibility of it, you are tempted. Let your wishes answer your question. Ah, I said I never failed! I half believe my work is done. For what did I keep this sword dazzling your eyes as it smote the yellow wires? The lattice is pierced for your exit in a thousand contiguous places. Tear it away and come down. Come down, Leonora, and watch the battle. Marlene goes out to conquer!"

Meanwhile, Bajazet and his snite running out, had beheld the plains darkened with hordes of his enemy, pouring down the hills, while more distant specks on the level horizon betokened yet larger squadrons in reserve. Palpitating with fear, the horses were caparisoned, the spears selected, the turbans refolded, and faint order restored there to meet the hostile force. But Bajazet's force was not to be laughed at, it was truly immense. From a corner of the pavilion, down into the shade of a garden of myrtles, a form, enveloped in cashmeres, glided unobserved, and out among the perturbed soldiery, with his balls and cylinders, crawled the juggler.

The armies were within speaking distance, and suddenly reining up, the Tartars confronted the Turks. Exactly opposite the central group of the latter, where stood Bajazet and his body guard, between two well-mounted leaders of the foe, was a gigantic black horse without a rider, and decked only in a white saddle-cloth fringed with gold, and a bridle of blazing gems. The juggler, advancing half way between the two armies, turned to the Turks.

"Ah, my Lord Bajazet!" said he, "I have seen your numbers, learned your tactics, counted your weapons and felt of your hearts. What is to hinder Tamerlane from victory? Take my beard, it is at your service; but thou shalt feel my sword!" And brandishing the blade in air, he flung turban and robe at his feet, and bounded on the back of the steed, who, with a neigh of delight, rushed out to meet his rider.

Taking the red scarf from a lieutenant, he bound it under his coronet by one end, and swinging his Damascus blade over his head, the whole band, to a low gush of wild, sweet music, fell back several rods, and then with a shout, swept down as an eagle would, and caught the myriads of Bajazet in their talons. Timour the Tartar conquered. Bajazet, and all the power of the Turk, were his. The gates of Damascus opened joyously to receive the victor. But first, calm as if from a feast, he sought the garden of myrtles.

"You are free, lady," said he, "if freedom is to be desired," he added, as Leonora rose. "Am I to have that wife who values me for myself and not for my crown?" he resumed, "or will you continue your journey to your aunt in Corfu?"

Leonora gazed at the superb face, once so repellent, and which now drew her as by a magnet. "Signor, I once said hearts were not carried by assault. I acknowledge my error."

"Marlene has won what Tamerlane the Tartar shall crown!" was the exulting reply of the lover, who embraced her; and as side by side they rode into the gates of this, his greatest and last conquest, he whispered: "And now the Fourth Point is gained!"

ONE DOLLAR!

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of BalloU's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. BalloU, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

We present on this and the next page, a series of views, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, with his usual spirit and literal fidelity, and representing some of the prominent features of the wealthy and flourishing city of Cincinnati. These were all drawn on the spot during Mr. Kilburn's recent western tour, undertaken solely for the purpose of making original drawings for the "Pictorial." Cincinnati, the "Queen City of the West," is one of the most populous and enterprising of the Western cities. It is located on the north bank of the Ohio River, opposite the mouth of the Licking. The city is near the eastern extremity of a beautiful valley, about twelve miles in circumference, and surrounded by hills. It is laid out with great regularity, the streets, some of which are sixty feet wide, intersecting each other at right angles. They are well paved, and extensively shaded with trees, and the houses are ornamented with shrubbery. The shore of the river called the "Public Landing," is substantially paved to low water mark; and the wharf boats or floating wharves, adapted to the rise and fall of the river, render the landing and shipping of goods at all times convenient. The early history of Cincinnati is full of events "stranger than fiction." We will devote a portion of our space to one of those incidents, which shows what mighty results are produced by apparently trifling causes. In the days of the pioneers, there was a deal of rivalry as to where the great city of the Miami country should find a habitation and a name; and those who measured lances, were the respective friends of "Cincinnati," "Columbia," and "North Bend." For a time the victory hovered over the one, and then over the other, till finally a fair and black-eyed Helen decided the fate of the Queen City. For the protection of the Miami pioneers, a detachment of troops had been stationed at North Bend; and the former, desirous of having their ploughshares protected by the sword, gathered round the men of war. This came near determining the much-vexed question and giving to North Bend the preference, by the influx of those who felt safe in the vicinity of the troops. As the following summer was waning, Major Doughty arrived at Cincinnati, and laid the foundation of Fort Washington; but in the meantime, the commander at North Bend had most unceremoniously taken French leave, without any excuse for his departure. The settlers of the Bend were thus left to the mercy of their savage foes, and one by one followed the troops to Cincinnati, till at last the place was almost deserted. Some time afterward, the whispers of those who knew began to tell the tale of the mysterious removal. There was a black-eyed matron at the Bend, who had inspired the commander with such admiration, that when she removed to Cincinnati, the officer followed with his entire command, being convinced, after a short preliminary visit, that Cincinnati possessed peculiar advantages as a military post. That movement, produced by a cause whimsical and apparently trivial in itself, was attended by results of incalculable importance. It settled the question whether North Bend or Cincinnati was to be the great commercial town of the Miami country. Our first view in Cincinnati represents the Woodbridge High School, a fine, substantial building, recently erected. It is in the Gothic style of architecture. Cincinnati is noted for its educational facilities, and the establishment of this school will add materially to the well-established reputation of the city. The next picture exhibits the new Court House, on Main Street, a magnificent building, not yet completed, we believe, but destined to win admiration by its architectural beauty. The new Custom House, at the corner of 4th and Vine Streets, is a fine building, in a very striking style of architecture. It will be occupied by the officers of the customs, and the post-office. Immediately in the rear, our artist has shown a portion of the Burnet House, of which we gave, in a former number, a representation on a large scale. The remaining view of the series is a picture of the Mechanics' Institute. It is situated at the corner of Sixth and Vine Street. Our view gives a good idea of its appearance. It is 75 by 90 feet, and about 100 feet in height. The location is in a very pleasant part of the city, and extremely central. The lower part is occupied by stores, the upper stories as lecture room, reading room, library and hall. The Ohio Mechanics' Institute was chartered by the State, in 1828, and commenced with courses of lectures on scientific subjects. An effort was made to procure a suitable building, and the old Baptist Church on Walnut Street was purchased, but it was found impossible to raise funds to pay for the ground and erect a suitable building. Unsuccessful applications were made to the city authorities and the State; but $3000 was finally raised, with which the bazaar erected by the notorious Mrs. Trollope was purchased and fitted up. The Institute fluctuated some time with more or less success and changes of location, until the present building was erected, which has placed the association on a permanent basis. Cincinnati abounds with features of interest, and evidences of remarkable wealth, prosperity and public spirit. It is the fifth in size and importance among all the cities of the Union; and, when we remember that it was settled only in 1788, its magnitude is truly astonishing. Its population in 1853, was 160,186, and is rapidly increasing. Its railway and water communication give it the command of a most extensive trade. Some idea of its activity may be found from a few statistics. In 1853, the number of steamboat arrivals was 4058, comprising 314 different boats with an aggregate of 120,399 tons. The shipping of the district, June 30, 1854, amounted to an aggregate of 23,843 tons, enrolled and licensed. The value of imports for 1853-54, amounted to the sum of $65,730,029, and of exports, $45,432,780. The receipts for hops for the year was $9,331,583. The custom house receipts in 1852-53, were $1,390,541. Cincinnati has very extensive and important manufactures to balance its important commerce. An idea of their extent may be formed from the fact that more than 200 steam engines are employed at the various manufacturing establishments. In 1851, the manufactured productions amounted to $55,000,000. The water used by the inhabitants of the city is obtained from the Ohio River by means of steam engines, which raise it to a reservoir holding about 5,000,000 gallons. The climate of Cincinnati is favorable to the grape, and an immense tract in the neighborhood of the city is devoted to vineyards. The largest grape cultivator in this region is Nicholas Longworth, Esq., whose successful experiments have raised him to a high rank among horticulturists. The annual product of the grape vines in the environs is estimated at above two hundred thousand gallons.

WOODBRIDGE HIGH SCHOOL, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

NEW COURT HOUSE, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

NEW CUSTOM HOUSE AND POST-OFFICE, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TO THE UNKNOWN,

WHOM I MET AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, NEW YORK.

BY ARTHUR MORTON.
AUTHOR OF THE "DUCAL CORONET."

We never spoke—but, as a star
That shines unconscious from the sky,
Thy peerless beauty from afar
Dawned on my wondering eye.
I did not hear Lagrange that night,
Though weaving spells of melody—
In all the throng of beauties bright,
My eye saw only thee.

Tiaras blazed on many a brow,
And gems on many a rising breast;
Ermine on shoulders white—but thou
In black wert simply drest.
Madonna-like, with braided hair
And folded hands, like saint in prayer
Low kneeling at a sacred shrine:
The glance of many a roving eye,
Unheeded, passed thy beauty by—
Not so did mine.

No thought of passion born of earth
Mixed with my admiration pure—
An image thou of radiant worth,
And I an honest wooer,
Seeking no token and no sign,
Not even a word or glance of thine,
Only the privilege to gaze
And carry to my latest days,
Deep in my reverent heart,
Thy image as a perfect type
Of sacred Virtue, Beauty ripe,
Niche'd in my memory like a saint
Sculptors might carve, and limners paint,
Yet far above their art.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE BACHELOR OF GOTTINGEN.

BY ESTELLE GRAY.

THE last rays of the sun gilded the arrow upon the principal church of Gottingen, when Doctor Fornarius, after dismissing his crowd of scholars, entered his study. A stove, placed in the centre, diffused a mild heat throughout the apartment, as it was December, and the sedentary life of the good doctor had rendered him very sensitive to the cold. A thick bed of snow covered the streets, which began to be deserted, and the north wind whistled in at the windows of the Gothic houses.

The habitation of Doctor Fornarius was situated at the extremity of a suburb, and entirely separated from the neighboring houses. A high wall which surrounded it, enclosed the little garden, shaded with green trees. His windows, besides, were constantly closed and defended from the curious looks of those who tried to penetrate into the interior of the dwelling of the sage, and the gate rarely opened unless to admit a few of the elect. This mysterious existence, added to the extreme austerity of his manners, had contributed, not less than the diversity and real depth of his knowledge, to spread to a great distance the reputation of the learned Fornarius. He was, above all, versed in the occult sciences, and initiated in all the secrets of the cabalistic doctrines. He had but just seated himself, with a feeling of pleasure, in his large, old leather arm-chair, when a light rap was heard at the door of his study.

"Come in," cried Fornarius, evidently vexed. "Ah, is it you, Frank!" added he, in a milder tone, as he saw a young man, who timidly advanced. "Sit down there first, and warm your cold hands," said Fornarius, pointing to a seat near his own chair; "you shall afterwards tell me what has brought you."

The young man, after taking off his hat and cloak, whitened by the snow, seated himself with an embarrassed air, in the place designed for him. Fornarius for some time cast upon him a scrutinizing look, softened by affection. He was a young man, with an open physiognomy, surrounded by the falling locks of his light hair, and a high forehead, full of intellect. His habitually thoughtful eyes sometimes sparkled with ardent fire. Fornarius loved him the best of all his scholars, on account of his wonderful aptitude and zeal for study.

"Master," said he, suddenly, with a timid look, "your lesson to-day has very much interested me. Your learned inquiries upon effects and causes show a subtle and superior mind, which nothing escapes, which knows equally to trace back to the first principles concealed in all things, and to distinguish the invisible bond which connects one with the other."

"My son," interrupted Fornarius, with modest gravity, "there is, without doubt, at the bottom of these philosophical investigations, a powerful attraction, and an aim worthy of a noble ambition. Yes, I believe that there exists, under the superficial envelope of everything, a particle of eternal truth, and a detached ray of supreme science. But they are infinitely rare, those to whom it has been given to fathom them. May God preserve me from the foolish pride of believing myself of the number of those fortunate spirits!"

"O, master!" cried Frank, with enthusiasm, "you have said it; it is truly a noble aim. To seek truth, that is life. To know, that is its end. And I also burn to know. Dear master," added he, suddenly, lowering his voice as if for some important confidence, "let me open my heart to you."

"Speak, my friend," said Fornarius with eagerness, "speak with confidence."

"I will confess," replied Frank, hesitating, "that of all the advantages your owe to your deep studies, the most admirable and the most precious in my eyes, is to be able to predict and explain the future."

"It is true, my son, that I have sometimes succeeded in reading the book of destiny; but believe me, ignorance is often better than knowledge, and there are some terrible compensations for the satisfaction of this rash desire."

"Whatever are these compensations, my father, since you deign to authorize me to give them this name, I accept them, and yield myself beforehand, if you are willing to initiate me into the mysteries of necromancy—reveal to me the different chances that fate has in reserve for me. Do you believe that my gratitude—"

At these words, Fornarius fixed his piercing eyes upon Frank, who could not refrain from blushing as an imperceptible smile played upon the lips of the doctor.

"I should rather wish to make you renounce this project," replied he; "but since I cannot succeed, I ought to forewarn you that my science deals only with events and facts, and not with sentiments and thoughts. Thus necromancy tells me that you will, by my precaution, come into possession of a large fortune, but if, when obtained, you do not remember the poor Fornarius—ah, this is what I cannot avert."

"O, my good, my excellent master!" cried Frank, "can you believe that I shall ever forget the service you have rendered me?"

"Do you wish it?" replied Fornarius. "Ah well! I consent. But it is already late. Our operations and researches have been prolonged very far into the night, and I would not consent for anything in the world, to expose you to the danger of going alone to your dwelling in the middle of the night, at this season. Accept the hospitality I offer you with all my heart. To-morrow morning you shall be free to go and resume your daily occupations."

"I willingly accept, my dear master, your obliging proposition. If you will permit me, I will stay in this chamber until the day dawns."

"Not so, if you please. You are young; you need rest. One whole night without sleep, would be right neither for your age nor constitution. As for me, I am accustomed to these night studies, and it will neither change my habit nor my health. With your permission, you will spend the night in my bed-chamber, while I await here the return of light."

Without allowing his guest time to reply, Fornarius pulled the bell-rope to summon his old housekeeper.

"Martha," said the doctor, "make a good fire in my bed-chamber, and put some clean linen upon the bed; Frank will take my place there to-night; but first go and look for me in the press, here is the key, for one of those long-necked bottles, sealed with red, which are upon the second shelf."

Martha brought what he wished.

"Very well," said the doctor; "now leave us, and be ready to come again when I shall call you. Here," said he, presenting a glass to Frank, and cutting the cords which confined the cork to the bottle, "this will keep us awake, and fortify us against fatigue. I drink to your success, my dear neophyte, and wish that at your first appearance in the path of honor, you may soon obtain the degree of doctor, the object of your ambition."

The glasses clicked. Frank, in order to do justice to the wine of Fornarius, as well as to his cordial hospitality, swallowed at a single draught, the sparkling liquid which he had poured out. At this moment, a violent knock at the door of the study made Frank start from his seat.

"Who is there?" said Fornarius, in an angry tone. "Has Martha forgotten the order I gave her? What can any one want of me at this hour?"

An old man, that Frank at once recognized as the faithful servant of his uncle, hastily entered.

"Master Frank," said he, "hasten to return home. Your uncle is dying."

"Can it be possible?" cried Frank.

"Alas! the gout, from which he has so cruelly suffered for several days, has risen to his breast, and his physician assures me that he has but a few hours longer to live."

"Such a worthy man, and so good a relation," murmured Fornarius, much affected. "I regret, undoubtedly, the interruption of our interview, my dear Frank. But go, you have not a moment to lose."

"Go then," said Frank, turning to the messenger. "I shall be there presently. I see how it is," said he, looking at the astonished Fornarius, "it is one of the attacks to which the health of my uncle, a little injured by excess, is subject. The attack may have been more violent this time, but there is no serious danger. Let us continue our interview, for I am impatient to know."

Fornarius, more and more surprised, was just commencing, when a second messenger entered, groaning:

"O, my God! what misfortune! My good, my excellent master!"

"Ah, well!" asked Frank, quickly.

"He is dead!"

"Dead, dost thou say? Art thou sure of it?"

"Alas, sir! he died in my arms, after asking in vain for you several times."

"My uncle, my dear uncle," cried Frank, hiding his face in his hands, "that I still see! Let us run."

"Stop, my friend," said Fornarius; "trouble has deprived you of reason. After neglecting to soothe the last moments of a relation who loved you, and whose inheritance is secured to you, do you not fear that this tardy eagerness will be attributed to the base suggestion of personal interest?"

"Do you wish to have me abandon my uncle's house to the rapacity of hired people, and to the pillage of strangers? Who, then, if not I, will undertake to pay the funeral honors to him who was my second father? No, no; do not try to detain me, nothing would prevent me from accomplishing so sacred a duty."

"Depart, then," said Fornarius, "and may Heaven protect so worthy a son."

Several days after, Frank, dressed in the deepest mourning, entered the study of Fornarius.

"My uncle," said he to the doctor, "has appointed me his heir. I am rich, and I wish to be deprived neither of the lessons you have promised me, nor the counsels of your experience. I have conceived some vast projects with which I shall make you further acquainted. Follow me, if you are truly attached to me; we will no longer be separated; leave this house, and give up your place. We will live together, and my fortune shall be at your disposal."

"It will doubtless cost me some effort to change my habits. I am too old to begin a new kind of life. But it is of no importance. It shall not be said that Fornarius will refuse anything to his friend Frank. I will go immediately and attend to the sale of my house."

"I will purchase it of you, my worthy Fornarius; and from this moment if you wish it, you can regard me as your debtor for the sum of twenty-five thousand florins."

"Well, it is agreeable to me. With that, it will be permitted me, by means of a little revenue, to reward the long services of my old housekeeper."

"Just as you please."

Fornarius followed his pupil. Soon, thanks to his lessons, and also to the credit which he enjoyed with some influential members of the university, Frank obtained, after a public examination, the diploma of doctor. This title, which made him the equal of his master, according to rank but not according to merit, altered a little, I confess, the marks of deference and respect which he had formerly accorded to him. But Fornarius, who attached importance only to real emotions, perceived little of the change. Frank was rich enough to do without help from the public, but his ambition had increased with his fortune. The death of his uncle left vacant the place of professor in one of the faculties of Gottingen. Frank coveted this second inheritance, and after the lapse of a year, Fornarius succeeded, by invoking the memory of the uncle, in having the nephew appointed as his successor.

The desire of distinguishing himself stimulated the natural taste of Frank for work. Fornarius served to direct him in his studies, and as a living repository of human knowledge. His merit burned the brighter because so unlike those around him. His lessons were followed by a numerous and select audience, and his name began to be known in the literary world.

Meanwhile, Fornarius had passed by a rapid transition, from the character of master to that of rival and friend, and finally from the latter to that of private counsellor. Frank, in the intoxication of his success, only remembered his old master when he could use for his advantage his knowledge and his credit. The pre-occupations of science and ambition had even swept away the remembrance of the twenty-five thousand florins, promised in exchange for the house of Fornarius, and for which the honest doctor had no other guarantee than the word of the purchaser. One day, after many struggles with himself, Fornarius ventured to present the subject with an humble request to the new doctor.

"Mr. Frank," said he, timidly (for he had contracted, a long time since, the habit of preceding the name of his old pupil with this respectful appellation), "it is five years to-day that I have had the honor of aiding you with my counsels, and I can testify that they have not been quite useless to you."

"Do you mean that I have failed in what I owe to you?" haughtily replied Frank.

"I did not say that, exactly, Mr. Frank."

"Are you not treated in my house as my equal?"

"I appreciate, as I ought the honor of such a condition."

"Of what, then, do you complain? And why recall the date, and the importance of the services you have rendered me?"

"Because it is precisely five years since I left my little house."

"And of what importance is it?"

"Because," added Fornarius, with embarrassment, "poor Martha waits yet the first quarter of the pension that I ought to pay her upon the twenty-five thousand you promised me."

"Do you believe me capable of breaking my word? and was it personal interest only that induced you to follow me? It is a good time to think of such a trifle when I am wholly occupied with your future and our common fortune. Listen to me, Fornarius. There is at this moment at Vienna, a vacant chair; it is an important post, and needs an able man. You are esteemed by the minister upon whom this nomination depends. Ask for me this favor, and it will be granted on your recommendation, I am sure. Let us go there together; and I shall finally be able to acquit myself towards you with some nobility."

The reputation of Frank had even extended to the capital of Austria. His nomination to the chair which he solicited, was not delayed, and as soon as it was announced he set out for Vienna in company with Fornarius. The knowledge which he displayed in this eminent sphere of the professorship, gave a new degree of celebrity to his merit, and in a short time the whole of Germany cited with admiration the immense knowledge and eloquence of Doctor Frank. His fortune increased with his fame. He was successively named to several remunerative honors, which were only proofs of the particular esteem of the government. Finally, the dean of the council belonging to the university, having retired on account of his great age, Frank was nominated to fill his place. Fornarius, judging that now the ambition of his old pupil would be satisfied, and that his counsels henceforth would be useless to him, seriously thought of taking leave of the new dignity, for he had mourned in secret a long time at the increasing indifference and the haughty manner of Frank, towards him.

"Mr. Frank," murmured Fornarius, trembling with emotion, and perhaps with regret, "you are rich and loaded with honors. As for me, I am old, my devotion will be of no avail to you. I think it is time for me to retire."

"I certainly shall not permit it for anything in the world. I will not consent to be deprived of your experience and your services, honest Fornarius."

"But I am too old to remain in an uncertain situation."

"Ungrateful one! Do you dare to call the independent and honorable position you occupy in my house uncertain?"

"If only," added Fornarius, with a supplicating air, "you would deign to remember the twenty-five thousand florins!"

"What then? Shall I never find you but an eager creditor? and do you believe me an insolvent debtor? I shall not be inclined, to-day, to put into your hands a sum which would perhaps confirm you in the foolish thought of separating yourself from me."

"But," replied Fornarius, with tears in his eyes, "you ought not at least to refuse it for old Martha."

"This woman again. Truly it is a strange thing, the obstinacy of some people to mingle useless things with the most important interests, and to wish to constrain persons in high life to share their mean pre-occupations. I am sorry, my worthy Fornarius, that you give me credit for so little justice. Yet a little more patience and effort, and I shall reach my aim, and mount the last ladder step of power. Do you hear that, my aged scholar? The first minister," added he, lowering his voice, "is worn out with age and hardship. He esteems you, doctor; it is necessary to advise him to rest. He has some affection for me. The emperor, they say, places some value upon my talents. Let us each in our turn, exert ourselves to influence your friend to decide thus, and when the time arrives, to gain his majesty in my favor."

From this day, Fornarius frequently visited his illustrious friend, who loved his simple and honest character as much as he esteemed his great learning. The minister often consulted him upon his private state affairs as well as upon the questions of public interest, and Fornarius served at once the ambition of Frank and the health of the minister, and determined the latter to agree with the emperor to his dismissal, and the renomination of his protégé. The last wish of Frank was at length accomplished. Fortune had led him by the hand to the height of honor. He bade adieu, forever, to the professorship, and left his citizen's dwelling to inhabit one of the most magnificent palaces in Vienna.

The crowd of courtiers, of solicitors, and persons of all ranks, which crowded the ante-chambers during the first days of his installation, made it impossible for Fornarius to approach the new minister. At length, the doors were opened to his urgent supplications, and it was with a respectful fear that the good doctor ascended the rich staircase of this place of grandeur, where he had himself facilitated the entrance of Frank. Just as the officer of the door announced Doctor Fornarius, his excellency made a sign to two secretaries, who were writing at his dictation, to retire.

"Ah, my lord," cried Fornarius, when they had departed, "have pity on your old professor—can I not say your friend?"

"What do you wish of me?" coldly asked the minister.

"That you would give me hospitality. Since you left me alone in your last house, which has been sold by your orders, and I am absolutely without an asylum and without resources."

"Your exigencies have wearied my generosity. My bounties have alone encouraged the new freak of which you are this moment guilty. I think that you should at least have learned the duties which devolve upon me, and the high functions with which I am invested, and the distance they put between you and me."

"May Heaven preserve me from failing in the respect that I owe to your highness. But your excellency should consider that I am a stranger in this city."

"And who thinks of keeping you here?"

Fornarius, at this cruel remark, vainly endeavored to conceal a tear, which, falling in the deep wrinkles of his cheek, was lost in the grey tufts of his long beard.

"My lord," replied he, falling on the knees of the minister, "I have left all to follow you. I have abandoned, at your request, my place of professor, and the occupations which were my resource and my only pleasure. There is nothing remaining for me, to-day, wherewith to return to Gottingen. I have no longer any hope but in you."

"Am I, then, your cashier?"

"Meanwhile, my lord, the twenty-five thousand florins for which you have given me your word."

"Insolence! If I had the weakness to make this promise to a miserable neer-do-well, have you flattered yourself that the minister would ratify the engagements contracted by the inexperience of youth? Depart, unfortunate one, to your house, and your diabolical occupations."

"My lord, have pity for my old age. It is late; the night is dark; snow covers the streets."

"Go, I tell you, or I will call my people."

"It is unnecessary," replied Fornarius, haughtily, rising and gazing upon the minister with his two little piercing eyes, "since your excellency has refused me a shelter in his palace, I shall do well, I see, to remain in my little house at Gottingen."

And saying this, he pulled the bell-rope. Frank looked around him amazed, and soon perceived that he was in the study of Doctor Fornarius.

"Martha," cried the doctor to the old housekeeper, who entered, "reconduict Master Frank to the street door. I am not fool enough to give up my chamber and my bed to a simple bachelor of Gottingen."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial]

WHY I AM AN OLD MAID.

BY ANNE HANNAH.

I AM an old woman now, an old maid of seventy years; but this wrinkled brow was once as fair as marble, and this glass reflected in its steel a bright, sunny, laughing face, with rich chestnut curls laughing in wild confusion around it. Yes, wrinkled and withered as I am, I had once the fatal gift of beauty—beauty which made me vain, frivolous and heartless in my youth, and in my age unrequited and alone.

I was the only daughter of a prosperous farmer in the flourishing village of B—, and was the pride of the village and of my parents, and indeed, many a city belle might have envied the rustic beauty of Rose Danvers. I had been destined by my parents, at an early age, for the son of a neighboring farmer, should our childish intimacy ripen into a mutual attachment. It did so, and the fondest hopes of our parents were consummated, and for a time the course of true love ran as smoothly as they could wish. William Carlton was a fine, noble, generous fellow, alas! too noble, for the weak creature he had designed to love. Just beyond the village stood a fine, old-fashioned mansion, which served as a country seat during the summer months, for a wealthy family from the city. Lucy Edgell, the eldest daughter, was of my own age, and we were constant companions, I being the only villager whom she honored with her friendship. They entertained hosts of friends from town, and Lucy was never happy unless I made part of their household. Among the guests, there was a young elegant, whose person and manners could not have failed to make him a hero among the fair sex of our time.

I was not long in discovering that attention from Frank Archer was considered distinction enough for my girl, and how was my foolish vanity fed when I saw myself the marked object of that attention; when I saw my fair hostess neglected for the country beauty! I felt vain of the power of this beauty, which I was not satisfied with exercising over one alone, and flattered by this distinction, vanity led me on, though my heart remained untouched, and still true to my betrothed. But ah! the subtle insinuations of my fancied admirer! ere I had passed a week in his society, I found myself passionately, hopelessly in love with Frank Archer. I felt that I had never loved before, and loathed the thought of becoming the wife of William.

Still, much as I saw Frank, he had never spoken to me of love, though I felt that I could read it in his voice, his deep look of devotion and tenderness as he bent over me, regardless of the presence of others; and I believed that all he desired was the opportunity, "the time, the place, the hour," for declaring his passion. And William was forgotten. Little did he dream of the change in me; he was too noble and true himself to distrust others, and I kept up the deception so artfully that not by a word or look did I betray the real state of my heart. And yet how hard was the struggle! How I suffered when I met him, with loathing in my heart and a lie on my lips, and told him that I loved him alone. But the crisis was at hand which was to decide my fate, and dash from me the cup of happiness already within my grasp, and leave me as I am.

One evening, on my return home, after spending a week with Lucy, I received a hurried note from Frank, begging me to meet him the next day in the glen where William and I had so often strolled by moonlight. My heart bounded with joy and expectation. "This place," thought I, "he has chosen for the avowal of his love; there, alone and undisturbed, we can declare our mutual passion." What must I do! how should I act? Could I go forth to meet him, hear his confession, when I was bound, tied to another? No. I would write first to William, tell him all, beg of him to release me, confess that I loved another, and then go free, unfettered, and give my heart to the only one I ever loved. I wrote—received a calm answer, which freed me from my bonds, and then, with a heart full of guilty emotion, stole forth to the glen, only to return a wretched, broken-hearted thing.

I arrived first at the rendezvous. I sat me down upon a rock, and soon I heard footsteps approaching nearer and nearer; my whole frame quivered with anxiety. Ah! widely different from my wild dreams, my foolish expectations, was the desire, the result, of this interview! One moment more, and Frank was beside me; but how did he meet me! not with the ardor of a lover, gaining a secret interview. His eyes looked none of that devotion which they had ever till now expressed; his step was firm, his look calm and dignified. He took respectfully my extended hand, and then releasing it, began:

"Miss Danvers, I have requested this interview that I may implore your pardon for the great injustice I have done you. I do not flatter myself that you care for me, but I feel that I have disgraced myself in making you the innocent instrument of my schemes, and have desired to meet you that I may make the only reparation in my power—that of confessing to you my injustice, and begging your forgiveness. Know then, that I love your friend, Lucy Edgell. She has, at times, bid me to hope that it was returned with equal ardor, and again treated me with indifference, and even scorn. To revenge myself for one of these caprices, I vowed to excite her jealousy by lavishing my attentions upon any one whom I could make a tool for this revenge. I attempted a desperate game, and made you my victim, and rashly, selfishly led on by the impetuosity of my passion, regardless of the injustice and baseness of my conduct towards you, till I was warned of the danger I was incurring, and I awoke from my delusion, ah! I trust not too late to obtain your forgiveness ere I bid you farewell."

He paused; trembling with de-pair, I had heard him to the end.

I attempted to speak—my voice failed me; not for worlds would I have humiliated myself in betraying my love for him. I made a second desperate effort.

"Go!" said I, "you are forgiven; it is but my just reward for the wrong I have done another."

He attempted to assist my trembling form, but I bade him leave me. I sank upon a seat, and thus we parted. On arriving home, I learned that William had visited my parents during my absence, to bid them adieu; he was to take passage the next day in a vessel bound for Australia. He had explained to them the cause of this sudden departure, but had uttered no word of reproach against me. I will pass over the grief and disappointment of my parents at the unexpected and sad termination of their dearest hopes. They had looked forward with pride to the day when they could call William their son-in-law, and this was a sad blow to them. From that fatal day I have lived a life of seclusion.

$1000!!

GRAND PRIZE OFFER.

EACH ONE TO BE PAID IN GOLD DOLLARS.

The unequalled and increasing circulation of our favorite illustrated weekly Journal calls upon the proprietor for a corresponding liberality in his offers to the public, for the new year. He therefore offers as an inducement to postmasters, or any other individual, male or female, to obtain and send to us clubs of subscribers to our paper,

TWELVE PRIZES IN GOLD,

to be faithfully awarded according to the schedule below. These prizes to be divided among the individuals who shall forward us the twelve largest clubs of subscribers for the "Pictorial," between the first of December, 1866, and the first of February, 1867, being a period of about sixty days.

When it is remembered that the agent has to work with, not only the most attractive, but positively

THE CHEAPEST PAPER IN THE WORLD!

It will be realized by every one how easily a large club of subscribers can be procured anywhere.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION

Is the only illustrated paper of its class in America, and it is the pioneer of illustrated papers on this side the Atlantic. It is elegantly printed on the finest of satin surface paper, containing sixteen super royal pages in each number, with an average of twenty illustrations weekly! These engravings are large and artistic in execution, embracing every current topic of interest, including rural scenery, maritime matters, architecture, noted localities all over this country and Europe, likenesses of eminent characters, male and female, at home and abroad, processions, celebrations, natural history, battles, fortifications, and, in short, every theme of general interest, forming an elegant

ILLUSTRATED RECORD OF THE TIMES.

Besides the illustrations, it contains eight or more super royal pages of original sketches of adventure, tales, poems, biographies and choice miscellaneous reading, humorous sketches, a careful record of events (no advertisements will be admitted), altogether forming a delightful weekly visitor to the home circle, and making two elegant volumes each year for binding, of 416 pages, with about one thousand splendid engravings.

PRESENT CIRCULATION, 103,000 COPIES WEEKLY!

THE PRIZES.

To the person who sends us the first largest club we will present in gold..... $30 00
To the person who sends us the second largest club we will present in gold..... 20 00
To the person who sends us the third largest club we will present in gold..... 15 00
To the person who sends us the fourth largest club we will present in gold..... 10 00
To the person who sends us the fifth largest club we will present in gold..... 8 00
To the person who sends us the sixth largest club we will present in gold..... 7 00
To the person who sends us the seventh largest club we will present in gold..... 6 00
To the person who sends us the eighth largest club we will present in gold..... 4 00
To the person who sends us the ninth largest club we will present in gold..... 3 00
To the person who sends us the tenth largest club we will present in gold..... 2 00
To the person who sends us the eleventh largest club we will present in gold..... 15 00
To the person who sends us the twelfth largest club we will present in gold..... 10 00
These prizes will be paid in gold dollars, that there may be no question as to their value.

No person will be considered a competitor for the prizes who does not send us at least fifty subscribers.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $3 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 10 00
10 " " " "..... 20 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirtieth and copy gratis. Thus every thirty subscribers is clear profit to the getter-up of the club, except to those persons winning the first three prizes. Any person sending us fifty subscribers, shall receive the eight volumes complete of our "Pictorial," elegantly and uniformly bound in gilt, with illustrated title pages and indexes, containing nearly ten thousand fine illustrations.

It is very important that the names, accompanied by the money, should be sent to us as fast as they are obtained, that we may be able to print an ample number of papers to meet the demand. Therefore, as soon as ten or a dozen subscribers have been obtained, the person who has procured the club can forward them with the money, and he or she can then add to the club any number of names at the same rate, and they will be duly credited to the account of the person sending, until February 1, 1867.

It is not requisite that the entire club, however taken in one town; we will send the papers to any neighboring post-office, but all subscriptions must come through the same agent, in order to be counted to his or her credit. This prize offer cannot be applied to any regular wholesale agent of our paper. The clubs must be bona fide, and each name sent with the money.

The result will be duly published, and evidence of the receipt of each prize, by the successful parties, will be given.

Sample copies of the paper furnished gratis when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

BalloU's Pictorial and The King of our Union are sent to one address for $4 per annum.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address, at the lowest club rate.

WILLIAM H. (SEDLLEY) SMITH.

The accompanying likeness of this popular performer, was drawn expressly for our paper by Barry, from a photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee and Case. William H. Sedley was born in Wales, in the year 1806, and left home when a boy to try his fortune in the great world. Assuming the name of Smith, from a disinclination to associate his family name with an untried career, he began life as a "call boy" at the Shrewsbury Theatre, then under the management of Mr. Crisp. He occasionally personated some minor characters, and by degrees worked his way into the position of a regular actor. In 1820 we find him engaged as "walking gentleman" at the Theatre Royal, Lancaster. In 1824 he was engaged for light comedy and juvenile tragedy by Edward Seymour, manager of the Theatre Royal, Glasgow. In 1827, he had risen to the rank of a "star," and obtained extensive popularity in a wide provincial circuit. Having received a liberal offer from Messrs. Simpson and Cowell, he sailed for this country May 16, 1827, being engaged to play in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. He made his first appearance in this country at the Walnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia, as Jeremy Diddler, in "Raising the Wind," and Lothair, in the "Miller and his Men." His success was unequivocal, and he immediately became popular both before and behind the curtain. Mr. Cowell, four weeks afterwards, appointed him stage manager, a post for which he was eminently qualified. In 1828, he first appeared before a Boston audience, at the Tremont Theatre, as Rolando, in the "Honey Moon," and was received with enthusiasm. At the Tremont he played light and juvenile tragedy. The following year he assumed the duties of stage manager of the Tremont, and remained connected with that establishment until 1836, when he was engaged by Mr. Pelby as stage manager of the National. He was as popular at this house as he had been at the other, nor did he enjoy a merely professional popularity. He was warmly welcome in private circles for his refined manners, his social disposition and his elegant accomplishments. In 1840 he went to Philadelphia, and was connected with the Arch Street Theatre in a managerial capacity. In 1842, Mr. Moses Kimball, having determined to introduce dramatic entertainments at the Boston Museum, then occupying the building at the corner of Tremont and Bromfield Streets, recently our publishing house, tendered Mr. Smith the appointment of stage manager, which he accepted, and immediately entered on the discharge of his duties. We well remember the little experimental stage and its appointments. It was a successful plan, from Mr. Kimball's liberality and taste in getting up pieces, and from the thorough manner in which Mr. Smith trained the little corps of performers. His instructions and vigilance made the company effective. Then came the great moral play of "The Drunkard," which was a prodigious success, and which won over to Mr. Kimball's support the prominent leaders of the great reform movement of the day—temperance lecturers, clergymen, active philanthropists. Afterwards, spectacles were attempted, and Lehr's magic coloring and perspective made you forget the narrow limits of the stage. In the present Boston Museum, Mr. Smith, who had been associated with and contributed to all Mr. Kimball's dramatic triumphs, had a fairer field for the display of his managerial abilities, and he has labored energetically in seconding the views and in rendering effective the liberality of the manager. Few persons unacquainted with the penetralia of the play-house can appreciate the importance and the severity of the stage-manager's labor. The public can estimate the exertions of a tragedian or a dancer—they are witnesses of the efforts they make—but they are not aware of the incessant toil and vigilance on the part of the stage manager, which produce the effects that enchant and excite them. The order of processions, the regularity of marches, the brilliancy of groupings, a thousand elements of dramatic success, are all the work of the stage manager. Mr. Smith has remodelled and improved many of the pieces presented at the Museum, and written many of the most popular songs in the Museum spectacles. As an actor, he has of late assumed a line of characters new to him, such as Sir Anthony Absolute, Admiral Franklin, Col. Hardy, Sir Robert Bramble, Sir George Thunder and Sir Oliver Surface. He is quite as much at home in these characters as in the airy and sprightly gentlemen, the Charles Surfaces, the Mercutios and the Mirabells, which he used to perform so admirably. In his genteel comedy portraits, whether he personates the sexagenarian or the youth of twenty-one, Mr. Smith always exhibits the characteristics of the gentleman. He is never chargeable with any solecism of manner. His stage gentlemen are gentlemen that would not disgrace drawing-rooms. For being self-educated Mr. Smith is none the less a well educated man. His literary taste has led him to pursue an extensive course of reading, embracing the best English authors, and with these he is thoroughly familiar. He is equally well versed in the literature and the tradition of his profession. He has had ample opportunities of critically observing the great masters of the histrionic art in the various branches, and has a happy faculty of rendering the knowledge thus acquired available to others. He is known to have acquired also many accomplishments, to be a fine musician and a complete master of arms. Of late years he has been induced to give instructions to those who have determined to make the stage their profession. Among those whom he has thus prepared, we may instance Mrs. Senter, whose brilliant impersonations reflect the highest credit on her teacher. We understand that three or four young ladies, of great promise, are now qualifying themselves for the profession under Mr. Smith's tuition. The subject of our brief sketch has attained his present position through the steady and persevering cultivation of his own talents, without the aid of friends or fortune at the outset of his career. He selected his profession when a boy, and fairly fought his way to the eminence he finally attained. He has now, in his matured manhood, secured an enviable position—he has made warm and devoted friends in private, and is a favorite in public; he is understood to have secured a competence that will render his future comfortable—is the owner of a pleasant farm and homestead, and when the period for rest and recreation comes, will probably settle down into a contented and philosophic country gentleman, fairly entitled to the comforts he will then enjoy.

W. H. SMITH, OF THE BOSTON MUSEUM.

STERLING, MASS.

We present herewith, a very pleasing landscape view, drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Kilburn, and representing faithfully the central part of the town of Sterling, Mass. Among the many interior towns in Massachusetts, Sterling, in pleasantness of location and quiet, rural appearance, compares favorably with the surrounding villages. It is located in Worcester county, at about an equal distance (twelve miles) from the two great centres of that county, Worcester and Fitchburg, with which it is connected by railroad. Sterling is mostly an agricultural town, although manufacturing, particularly chair-making, is carried on to a considerable extent. The village, a part of which we present in our picture, is nestled between high hills. Upon Meeting-house Hill are the remains of a relic of olden times, a powder-house building, a feature once common in all country towns, but now seldom existing. From Kendall's Hill a fine view of Wachusett Mountain, in Princetown and the adjacent country, is obtained. Sterling contains the Washakom ponds, as fine and picturesque sheets of water as one would wish to see. Our view was taken from the hotel, and embraces the centre of the village. On the left is the Unitarian Church, beyond, nearly hidden by the trees, is the Baptist Church. On the right is the Orthodox Church, and nearer the spectator, the town house. The advent of railroads, annihilating the old-fashioned stage-coach, and bringing distant towns near in point of time, at least, to the great centres of trade, has made and is still making a great change in the rural towns of the State, and the difference of country life and city life is daily becoming less. The extravagance and luxuries of the cities become disseminated through the country, and are fast destroying the charming simplicity of a country residence. But on the other hand, much is to be said in favor of this blending of town and country, and the engrafting of refinement and elegance on rusticity and plainness.

VIEW IN STERLING CENTRE, MASSACHUSETTS.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DURIYAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

H. S. W.—It is a snail, always observed in good society, never to introduce one person to another without knowing that it is agreeable to both. Gentlemen are to be introduced to ladies—not ladies to gentlemen.

B. C. L.—Paper is not a modern invention, but was known and made in China before the Christian era.

M. T.—The mark 3 is simply a monogram of P. 3.—that is, the Spanish word, peace, which signifies dollar.

M. A.—It is an Italian usage, and signifies "Beautiful."

M. B. A.—Industry will accomplish your purposes. "Get thy spindle and distaff ready, and God will send flax."

H. Y. Z.—The nights and days are equal on March 21th.

M. N. S.—The first deposit of California gold was made at the United States Mint, Dec. 8, 1848. Cannot say by whom.

M. D.—We will send you three volumes of "Hulton's Pictorial," elegantly bound, of the three last numbers.

D. C.—You should not offer to shake hands on meeting a lady, that is her privilege; also, in bowing in the street, wait for the lady to recognize first.

T. A. C. S.—Vermont derives its name from verd, green, and mont, mountain, referring to its green mountains.

E. G. R. S.—Queen Victoria was born May 24, 1819.

C. H.—We answer—an apple orchard. Apples are the most reliable crop, and pay best by the acre, they are the most valuable.

W. A. F.—If you will refer to last week's notice to correspondents, you will find your question plainly answered.

W. I. A. P.—The first printing in this country was done at Cambridge, Mass., when a sermon was printed and published, in 1639.

W. L. T.—You are entirely mistaken; the best dressed gentlemen wear the least jewelry. Leave these things to Indiana and South Sea Islanders.

E. A. S.—You are right when you say that the best poets are the best novelists have been written by men in middle or advanced life; the best poems by young men.

P. Q.—Congreve rockets were invented by Sir Wm. Congreve, an English military engineer, who died in 1828. The Wm. Congreve you refer to, was an English dramatist, and died in 1729.

J. J.—Any noxious exhalation is called mephitic. Mephitus was the name of a Latin godhead invoked by the Romans to protect them against pestilence.

I. N. Q. S.—What we call manna is a saccharine substance that exudes from some species of the ash-tree.

C. V. A. R.—You have won. Gen. Philip Schuyler, of the American Revolutionary army, was a native of New York.

Q. U. A. T.—Bede, usually called the "Venerable Bede," was an English monk, born in 672, at Wearmouth, near the mouth of the Tyne. King Alfred translated his "Ecclesiastical History" into Saxon.

A. G.—The term, Madonna, applied by Italians to the Virgin Mary, means, literally, "my lady."

G. D.—Count Bathany, the famous Hungarian revolutionist, is not living, as you suppose. He died very poor, at Paris, July 12, 1854.

.... The stage route across the isthmus of Tehuantepec will be opened for travel about the first of February.

.... Singing birds raised among the Hartz mountains in Germany, are imported to this country for the New York market.

.... Mrs. Dr. Hunt has issued her usual annual protest against her tax-bill. It is short and spicy.

.... The cultivation of the Chinese potato in this country promises great results. There is a large plantation at Flushing, L. I.

.... The culture of silk cotton introduced from Mexico has been commenced successfully in the State of Texas.

.... The Emperor Nero was the first to use an opera glass. His was made of an emerald. Rather green!

.... Emile de Girardin has sold his interest in the Paris "Presse" for one hundred and ninety thousand dollars cash.

.... Mr. Keach, of the Museum, during a late illness, was reported dead, and funeral garlands were sent to his house.

.... Max Maretzek has offered to take the Academy of Music, New York, for a year, at twenty thousand dollars.

.... Have you read "The Hunchback: or, the Hindoo Princess," in Ballou's Dollar Monthly? Written by M. M. Ballou.

.... The U. S. government purchased the old Brick Church property in New York for four hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

.... Lieut. General Scott renews the suggestion of a retired list for superannuated army officers.

.... Mr. Hammatt Billings lately visited New York with his design for the Pilgrim Monument at Plymouth.

.... We learn with pleasure that Mlle. Gabrielle de la Motte is fully occupied with piano forte classes.

.... There is a talk of laying a telegraph cable between Florida and Cuba—if Spain has no objection.

.... Mrs. Abbott Lawrence, of this city, has recently contributed 500 dollars towards building the Pilgrim Church in London.

.... The total losses by the snagging of steamboats on the Mississippi River, last year, was $523,854.

.... The London Times discountenances any further government expeditions to the Arctic regions.

.... In the desert of Sahara, a French general has bored successfully for water. Its absence was a great bore.

.... The present viceroy of Egypt is a man of great energy and large views, but cruel and luxurious in his habits.

.... The New York Courier urges the removal of the Hudson's Bay Company, that giant monopoly, from our soil.

.... Guizot has just published a work on the "Causes of the success of the English and American revolutions."

In that capital book, Beresford's "Miseries of Human Life," the characters amuse themselves by suggesting to each other certain petty annoyances which, added together, make a total aggregate of wretchedness. To the statement of each of these grievances, an explanatory comment of greater or less length is added. There is a humorous rivalry when the parties meet, as to which shall suggest the most tremendous and astounding evil. At one of these meetings, Mr. Sensitive, or Mr. Testy, pronounces the simple word "servants," and leaves it to its suggestions of terror, a single word of explanation being unnecessary. There must be some meaning in this cabalistic word. A very clever writer made it the theme of a very clever book, entitled the "Greatest Plague of Life," and we have no doubt that those who are envious for their wealth and state, the millionnaires of Beacon Street and the Fifth Avenue, find in their retinue the source of their most serious troubles. The skeleton that is in every house is very apt to be clothed in flesh and blood, and to be present at the feast in the form of a butler, or omnipresent as a major-domo. We don't wonder that the little wretches who drive our buggies to and from the stable are called "tigers." They are inexorable and insatiable. "What do you think the old man's gone and done?" asked one of these 'helps,' the other day, of his crony. "He's gone and lent my horse, and choused me out of my afternoon ride."

If servitude be an evil, then are servants—the servants of the rich—amply avenged on their employers. It is they who control the luxuries of the household—they who really enjoy the plate, the wines, the sumptuous viands, the warm atmosphere, the odors of exotic flowers, the strains of exotic music, for, lucky fellows! they have no bills to pay.

A well-bred servant, transferred from a stately family to the establishment of a vulgar rich man, is really the master of his employer. With what a satirical glance the dog notes every social solecism, and what sarcasm there is in his very servility! One of these gentlemen, while waiting on a table, at a costly entertainment given by a new-blown Croesus, whispered to a distinguished guest: "Ah, judge, this isn't the style of society that you and I are accustomed to!"

Well, people pay dearly for style, certainly. A housefull of servants is as hard to manage as a troupe of opera singers or actors. In both cases, each individual's line of business is strictly defined, and woe to the wretched man who attempts to change the programme! Ask the chambermaid to perpetrate an omelette when the cook is sick, or the coachman to carry the horses when the groom is drunk, and just see what a row will ensue. Ah, these people who ride in brilliant carriages, and look out on the street through plate-glass windows, and have perfectly well-bred gentlemen to wait at their tables, are little to be envied. The democratic theory of equality in this country is no meaningless fiction, and rank is only to be maintained by a constant tax upon the feelings of the ambitious votaries of state and fashion.

Luther regarded his love of music as one of the choicest blessings of Providence, and he frequently speaks of it. He says:—"It is one of the finest and most glorious gifts of God to which Satan is a bitter enemy; for it removes from the heart the weight of sorrow and the fascination of evil thoughts. Music is a kind of gentle discipline; it refines the passions and improves the understanding. Those who love music are honest and gentle in their tempers. I always loved music, and would not for a great matter be without the little skill I possess in this art." Music, however, Luther to the contrary, does not always soften the temper, for many eminent musicians have been very irritable. Hooker is another eloquent eulogist of music. He says, in his "Ecclesiastical Policy":—"Touching musical harmony, whether by instrument or voice, such is the force thereof, and so pleasing effects it hath in that very part of man which is most divine, that some have been thereby induced to think that the soul itself, by nature, is or hath in it harmony."

THE AMENDE HONORABLE.—A gentleman in California who shot another gentleman in the dark, thinking him to be a third person, called on the widow a few days afterwards, and politely apologized for his "little mistake." There is nothing like courtesy among well-bred persons.

MAJOR LOUIS GALLY.—This veteran soldier, recently deceased, who for twenty-five years commanded the New Orleans Battalion of Artillery, had served under two commanders of renown—Napoleon Bonaparte and Zachary Taylor.

CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN.—This admirable American actress—a Boston lady, by the way,—has gone to spend the winter in Italy. Who that ever saw them can forget her Meg Merrilies and Lady Macbeth?

THE FLAG FOR FOUR CENTS!—Cheapness being the order of the day, we have reduced the retail price of "The Flag of our Union" to FOUR CENTS per copy.

Mrs. FANNY KEMBLE.—This lady is now personally noticeable for her plumpitude. She looks "fair, fat and forty." Her readings are everywhere successful.

NATURAL CONSEQUENCE.—The circulation of "The Flag of our Union" has increased nearly eleven thousand since the price was reduced to FOUR CENTS per copy.

COMPLIMENTARY.—The Sultan of Turkey has been invested with the Order of the Garter. We believe he never wears stockings.

It is not unlikely that the enormous rents of houses in our great cities may lead to a revolution in our social habits, and that we shall, before long, be compelled to adopt the European plan of building houses a dozen stories high, and lodging many families under the same roof. This manner of living gives rise to many curious mistakes. It is almost impossible for infrequent visitors to remember the rooms occupied by their friends in such a wilderness of lodgings, and occasional intrusions into strange drawing-rooms are unavoidable. A friend of ours was lately invited to dine with a certain family in Paris. On inquiring for the people who occupied such a room—he was sure of the number—he was told they were already at dinner. Wishing to avoid formal excuses, and to put his friends in good humor, he bestrode his cane and galloped into the dining-room, shouting like a boy broke loose from school. To his horror he discovered, as he was cancoling round the table in that ridiculous style, that every person was an entire stranger to him. He had mistaken the room, and, instead of bursting on a joyous company of madcap artists, he had intruded on the privacy of a set of people as grave as deacons of the church. He hesitated for a moment, but being a man of infinite self-possession, and seeing the door by which he had entered still open, he bravely resumed his gallop, vanished through the door, and, mounting a story higher, convulsed his friends by the relation of his misadventure. In Paris, the rents diminish as you ascend—the first floor (our second story) commanding the highest price. Very often a millionaire lodges on the first floor, and a starrng operative in the attic. Nowhere in the world are social contrasts so striking. The poor man's death and the rich man's bridal often happen at the same moment beneath the same roof.

Mrs. BATEMAN'S COMEDY.—"Self," the new American comedy produced at New York, Boston, and elsewhere, has some good ideas and many striking incidents in it, but is exaggerated and improbable. The same may be said of "Young New York." The American comedy is yet to be written.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.—We are no less surprised at the remarkable cheapness of this popular magazine, than delighted at its chaste and attractive contents. The story of "Money, or, The Chimney-Sweep of Anvers," now publishing in its columns, is not only intensely interesting, but conveys a most wholesome moral. This publication is one of the wonders of the day, having reached to the marvellous circulation of rising 65,000 copies!—New York Sentinel.

ROYAL SORROW.—An English paper says, "Our royal family has gone into slight mourning for the late Prince of Leiningen, the queen's half-brother." Slight mourning! We suppose the queen is half sorry he is dead.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Williams. Mr. S. W. Dooner, of Somerville, to Miss Margaret Gerrin; by Rev. Mr. Miler, Mr. Orvin S. Roe, of Shorham, Vt., to Miss Caroline L. Higgins; by Rev. Mr. Stockbridge, Mr. Charles E. Cookidge, to Miss Eliza T. Hall; by Rev. Dr. Adams, Mr. James H. Fairbanks, to Miss Anna M. Gibbs; by Rev. Mr. Robbins, Mr. Edward Augustus Locke to Miss Nellie Bailey Goodrich; by Rev. Mr. Craft, Mr. Henry F. Sampson to Miss Margaret A. Mead; by Rev. Mr. Stow, Selah H. Tenney, Esq., to Miss Mary E. Bartlett.—At East Boston, by Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. Samuel Hall, Jr., to Miss Harriet A. Lovejoy.—At Winter Hill (Somerville), by Rev. Mr. Pope, Mr. Henry F. Woods to Miss Lucy A. Magoun.—At Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Gear, Mr. Horace J. Nickerson, of Grington, Me., to Miss Mary Collins.—At Beverly, by Rev. Mr. Foster, Mr. John E. Wallis to Miss Eliza A. Foster.—At West-borough, by Rev. Mr. Sheldon, Mr. George F. Tufts to Miss Sarah C. Tufts.—At Newburyport, by Rev. Dr. Withington, Mr. Edwin P. Noyes, of Newbury, to Miss Mary T. B. May.—At New Bedford, by Rev. Mr. May, Mr. William H. Wordell to Miss Cynthia M. Wordell.—At Fall River, by Rev. Mr. Hathaway, Mr. Elihu C. Hathaway to Miss Marie Sanford.—At Bordentown, by Rev. Mr. Goodno, Mr. Edward Cliff to Miss Hattie C. Taylor.—At Leaskville, N. C., Mr. Charles Eugene Kluge to Mrs. Sarah C. Pollard, of Marlboro', Mass.

In this city, Mr. George Whipple, 33; Miss Maria K. O'Brien, 18; Seth Sprague, Esq., 69; Thomas I. Parker, M. D., 73; Mr. Charles H. Hopkins, 21; Mr. Benjamin Patterson, 47; Mrs. Betsey Gove Robbins, 60; Mr. Thomas Bartlett, 89; Mr. Timothy McHugh, 51; Mrs. Betsey V. Martin, 46; Mr. John Hughes, of Addison, Me., 21.—At Charlestown, Mr. Caleb Symmes, 70.—At Milton, Miss Mary Jane Kennedy, of Walpole, 35.—At Brookline, Miss Lucy T. Clark, 39.—At Needham Plain, Miss Mary Ann Howland, 30.—At Dedham, Mrs. Joanna Day, 76.—At Lyran, Mr. Selina Newhall, 61.—At Norwell, Mr. Elias W. Weyce, 55.—At Worcester, Rev. Nathaniel Herry, 47.—At Holden, Mrs. Judith B. Holbrook, 95.—At Northampton, Mrs. Hannah Swift, 68.—At New Bedford, Mrs. Mary Eunice Shepherd, 50.—At Falmouth, Mr. Cyrus K. Lincoln, 69.—At Springfield, Mrs. Rebecca Warriner, 57.—At Nantucket, Capt. Reuben G. Plinkham, 69.—At Mattapoisett, Mrs. Priscilla A. Barstow, 47.—At Westport, Miss Sarah D., daughter of N. C. Brownell, 30.—At Yarmouth, Mrs. Mattia, wife of Mr. Ruel H. Bartlett, and daughter of the late Hon. John H. Bartlett, 35.—At Hingham, Mrs. Elizabeth, widow of the late Thomas F. Kettell, 73.—On board ship Southern Cross, on the passage from Calcutta to Boston, Mrs. S. A. Satterlee, widow of the late Rev. Alfred Satterlee, of the Baptist Mission to Darnah.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary miscellany of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the BEST AMERICAN AUTHORS, and the results of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all sailing vessels, and of the most interesting and important naval and mercantile ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS:—INVARIABLE IN ADVANCE.

|                        |        |
|------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " "     | 10 00  |
| 10 " " "               | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the American copy gratis.

* * One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BAILLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BAILLOU,
No. 22 WINTER STREET, BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; R. A. Duncan, 162 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Gray, 43 Broadway Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Groves, Corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Hingbold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Peterborough Row, London, general agents for Europe.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

FOR MUSIC.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

Something to love—ever something to love!
 All crave a fixed star in time's changeable sky;
 No meteor to flash, and then fade from above,
 But a planet whose lustre shall last till we die!
 Though life's sparkling cup
 To the brim be filled up,
 By affection untinctured, insipid 'twill prove;
 Drain it off as we will,
 The heart's longing is still
 For something to love us—something to love!

For something to love—ay, almost to adore;
 And which loves in return with such tender excess,
 That life's harp-strings would break with one tremor the more,
 Yet be tuneless with one sweet emotion the less.
 Proud philosophy's chain
 May be forged by the brain;
 But spite of such fetters the free heart will rove,
 Till round it are thrown
 Those pure links which alone
 Can unite it forever with—something to love!

DREAMLAND.

For the heart whose woes are legion,
 'Tis a peaceful, soothing region;
 For the spirit that walks in shadow,
 'Tis—O, 'tis an El Dorado.
 But the traveller travelling through it,
 May not—dare not—openly view it;
 Never its mysteries are exposed—
 To the human eye unclouded.
 So will its king, who hath forbid
 The uplifting of the fringed lid;
 And then the sad soul that here passes,
 Beholds it but through darkened glasses.—Poe

THE CROWNLESS HAT.

Peregrine thou deem'st it were a thing
 To wear a crown—to be a king,
 And sleep on regal down!
 Alas! thou knowest not kingly cares:
 Far happier is thy head that wears
 That hat without a crown!—Hoop.

BEAUTIFUL EYES.

O, those persuasive, yet denying eyes,
 All eloquent with language of their own:
 See Venus there, the fickle deities,
 And Pleasure seated on her azure throne.—Locks.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Among all our host of exchange papers, we find none that are more readable and acceptable than the New York Mirror, edited by Hiram Fuller. The readers of "Ballou's Pictorial" will remember the fine head and biographical mention which we gave of Mr. Fuller in these pages, not long since. He is a brilliant and fearless writer, aiming his shafts at high and low; while now and then there peeps out from his editorials a tender strain of pathos, that shows he has a heart beneath it all. Certainly the most disagreeable experience we have gathered in a long period of editorial life, is the returning of rejected manuscripts. After the loss perhaps of an hour or more in deciphering an indifferently written article, it is discovered to be entirely too prosy, or too something for our columns. This loss of time, however, could be easily gotten over, and often is, by borrowing a little more time from our pillow; but the worst is yet to come. The author is to be disappointed—perhaps offended. He or she cannot realize the many things we are obliged to take into consideration in our decision. Yesterday we handed back a manuscript to a young lady not yet out of her teens—one who wrote not from necessity—and saw her try to hide the quivering lip and moist eye!.....Six dollars a barrel for ordinary apples! Think of that, ye farmers and fancy gardeners, and multiply your orchards. The most common eating apples are selling exorbitantly high in our Boston market, and hard to find at any price. The last season was a partial failure, to be sure, but the growing consumption of this staple fruit is increasing vastly each year. ....It so happens that the three richest men of Boston are at this moment confined to their homes by sickness, more or less dangerous to persons of their advanced age. One of them is reputed to be worth about four millions of dollars. What a vast responsibility must rest upon a man with that sum of money! How much of charity should justice demand at his hands. Do such men ever repeat to themselves that sage epiphany—"What I spend, I have lost; what I possessed, I have left to others; but what I have given is still mine." .....There are some follies which are caught like contagious diseases; for instance, behold the immoderate skirts of our city belles. Washington Street is a caricature upon humanity from 12 o'clock, M. to 3 o'clock, P. M. Where will this expansive idea stop? One fashionably-dressed lady takes up the whole width of the sidewalk already; and while one (so large is the quantity in use), is getting to be immoderately expensive. Recall for a moment the simple and classic costume of old, wherein the drapery received its folds and modest fullness from the glorious human form alone! Fashion seldom interferes with nature without diminishing her grace. ....The fabled of the Chinese language are perhaps the most curious of all known to us. Generally they are very literal in their signification. Thus our word "Amen" is, in Chinese, "Sin yuen ching shing," that is, the heart wishes exactly so. ....At a temperance meeting in this city, recently, Rev. I. S. Kallouch said, "No wreck is so terrible as that of a blasted character." Yet how many of these wrecks do we encounter daily drifting on the ocean of life towards eternity. ....From what strange circumstances do names of places date! The Malakoff, which will figure forever in song and story, was named after a Russian navy lieutenant dismissed from the service for intemperance, who set up a sailor's drinking-shop on that memorable spot. ....We see that Dr. Francis Lieber has retired from the professorship of History and Political Economy in the college of South Carolina. Dr. Lieber is a German by birth, highly educated, and when a very young man fought under the Prussian eagles at Waterloo. He came to this country many years since. He was one of the editors of the Encyclopedia Americana. ....Master Merrill, an old schoolmaster, well-known at Cape Ann, in this State, sensitive and in needy circumstances, lately committed suicide by hanging. The suicidal mania seems lately to have broken out in all classes. ....Is there any affinity between railroads and milk-cans? Asa Whitney, the originator of the great Pacific Railroad scheme, now supplies Washington, D. C., with the lactical fluid of a herd of kine. He talks like a statesman, and looks like a farmer. ....It must be rather pleasant to be frozen up in a foreign port. The ice has caught several American vessels at St. Petersburg, and there they lie, like so many Arctic exploring craft, hard and fast till the thermometer takes a fancy to rise. .... Every now and then some gallant soldier of the republic yields up his breath to the universal conqueror. Major Gally, who commanded Taylor's guns at Corpus Christi, is among the last called. ....What odd events are constantly turning up in everyday life—and how often a trifling mishap results in a great good! Rev. A. G. Nelson broke down in his Sunday morning sermon at Stillwater, Minnesota, and was so mortified that he left the church, but reached home just in time to save his house from burning down. ....All who read "Wilkes's Exploring Expedition" are familiar with the artistic talent of Joseph Drayton, the draftsman, and will learn with regret that he died recently at Philadelphia. ....Felix O. C. Darley has been called the American Hogarth, but it is no compliment. In genuine humor and exquisite correctness of drawing, he far surpasses the great English artist. ....The Boston Fatherless and Widows' Society perform a noble work of charity. Their thirty-ninth annual report is deeply interesting and touching. Think of a poor widow, half blind, who wearily pierces the needle for four days for forty-eight cents! Contributions at this season of the year are peculiarly acceptable. The president of this society is Mrs. James F. Baldwin, No. 128 Tremont Street. ....Among the tragic occurrences of a recent date, the following struck us as very sad. A gentleman of New York went on board the Arago from Havre to meet his expected bride. A friend checked his eager steps, and told him that she whom he sought lay cold in death below. The house that was to have witnessed the joyous nuptials, was the scene of the funeral solemnities. ....Little do the rich and happy dream of the scenes of toil and care that surround them! There is now in this city a widow sixty-eight years of age, who supports herself, an aged sister, and an invalid daughter, by washing. ....We often pity the people of the Far West. Yet, when we know that, while we are eating tough beef, they are luxuriating on venison, wild ducks, partridges, prairie chickens, quails and rabbits in Wisconsin, we really feel as if we should like to die with them. ....What a responsibility rests on a great landholder! The Duke of Sutherland's property runs right across Scotland from sea to sea, and embraces about one thousand square miles. ....It is rather a quaint idea of Dow, Jr., that "Life is a contra dance; and when the figure is ended, Time hangs up the fiddle, and Death puts out the lights." ....The most insidious destroyer of life in this country, is consumption; it carries off 200,000 persons annually. ....No brilliant image of war was that given us the other day by a Crimean officer on his way to Canada. He told us of a comrade who had lost both his legs and arms, and was still languishing from the effects of seventeen bayonet wounds in his body. ....Let none of our subscribers fail to preserve the copies of "Ballou's Pictorial" for binding. Thus each six months they will accumulate a volume to add to their library, the interest of which, in a few years hence, will be greatly enhanced. These volumes are already becoming scarce, and we have but a few sets left complete. ....Major Poore, quoting from an old author, in one of his recent lectures, says—"A fine and honorable old age is the child of immortality!" A beautiful idea. ....A friend, writing us from far-off Iowa, says—"I send you eight subscribers with the money for your Dollar Magazine. My little daughter, twelve years old, obtained them this forenoon, and wants a gratis copy for her trouble." She shall have it. That little girl will make somebody a smart wife one of these days. ....Mexico is still torn and distracted by internal troubles. With the exception of Spain, this country is the most miserable on the face of the globe—civil war being forever here. ....Col. Fremont is daily met in Wall Street, New York, where his large business relations call him. Mr. Buchanan is quietly preparing for the White House, besieged by political aspirants. ....The English militia now in Ireland are being put on a war footing, in point of numbers. What is in the wind?—does John Bull distrust his neighbor on the other side of the Channel? ....The Indians within our limits are estimated at about 300,000 souls. And yet they are often treated as though they were entirely destitute of souls! ....Uncle Sam's finances seem to be in a healthy condition. The president tells us that the entire income for the last fiscal year is $73,913,141; total expenditure, $72,948,792. ....An editor, describing a lecture to the fair sex, exclaims with enthusiasm:—"Three thousand ladies hanging on the lips of one man!" Goodness, gracious! ....We don't like to be personal, but the names of five of the leading Unitarian clergymen in and about New York are rather ominous for superstitious minds—Furness, Coles, Bellows, Bleese and Burnap. ....A Texas editor, noticing the marriage of a contemporary, says—"We wish him posterity and happiness." Of course he does. ....An exchange paper says, that the girls in some parts of Pennsylvania are so hard up for husbands, that they sometimes take up with printers and lawyers. We know of one or two this way who have been brought so low as to even marry an editor! ....Under the head of "Broken English," a Paris paper places such Londoners as get smashed up by railroad collisions, or financially burst. ....When the Abbe Malot, expressing a doubt to Richelieu as to how many masses would save the soul, the cardinal replied—"Pho! you are a blockhead!—as many as it would take snowballs to beat an oven." Richelieu was rather plain spoken. ....The London Illustrated News copies one of our local Boston scenes, and we have to thank its editor for a complimentary notice of "Ballou's Pictorial." ....A new project is on foot for the extension of the provisions of the reciprocity treaty to the British West Indies, whose trade is monopolized by Great Britain and her colonies. The movement is certainly one of much importance. ....Leave your grievances, as Napoleon did his letters, unopened for three weeks; and it is astonishing how few of them by that time will require answering. ....The papers in all directions are recording suicides by individuals, exercised by a belief in what is popularly known as spiritualism—a sad delusion that will have its day. ....A church for the deaf and dumb is about to be opened in New York—the first institution of the kind in this country—where divine worship will be conducted by signs. ....We observe that Sue Washington, a famous race-horse, has just been sold for five thousand dollars. ....Nine hundred and forty-two new subscribers have been added to the subscription list of our Dollar Monthly Magazine in the last six days! ....Who would ever think, dear reader, of sitting down to write in gloves? Yet say that Eugene Sue, the author of "Mysteries of Paris," writes his novels in white kids, and puts on a fresh pair at the commencement of every new chapter. ....What strain is that blending with the carts and carriages in Winter Street? It is a most dismal, pertentious organ-grinder, torturing our ears with "Mourir pour la patrie"—to die for one's country. Why didn't he set the example, and die for his, instead of coming over here to lacerate our tympanums? ....Dr. Hall insists upon it, that there is no such thing as forgetfulness, and that the true interpretation of "I forgot it" is "I don't care." ....There goes a band of grey-checked school children trooping away to school, and running like greyhounds for fear of being late. Unless their faces are deceptive, they are not over pressed with study—one of the crying evils of our modern high-pressure education. We are too apt to sacrifice the body to the mind, and so, ultimately, destroy both. ....We have just this moment been handed a splendid specimen of quartz rock glittering with California gold. The owner tells us that there are sixty-three factories in the land of gold, in which quartz-grinding and extracting the gold by machinery are carried on.

Not alone to know, but to act according to thy knowledge, is thy destination, proclaims the voice of my inmost soul. Not for indolent contemplation and study of thyself, nor for brooding over emotions of piety—no, for action was given thee; thy actions, and thy actions alone, determine thy worth.—Fichte.

It may very reasonably be suspected that the old draw upon themselves the greatest part of those insults which they so much lament, and that age is rarely despised, but when it is contemptible.—Dr. Johnson.

Choice Miscellany.

POISONING BY ADULTERATION.

Dr. Normandy gives a case in which a gentleman was poisoned without any person being directly responsible for the act. The case was as follows:—A gentleman was taken suddenly ill after eating some double Gloucester cheese, and his medical attendant having with much perseverance determined to trace the poison to its source, did so with the following result. The cheese he found had been colored in the ordinary way with annatto; the annatto had been heightened in color with a little vermilion, which, in small quantities, is a comparatively harmless pigment; the vermilion had been, however, previously adulterated with red-lead; and hence all this mischief. The adulterator had been adulterated; and each person, in the series of successive falsifications, worked independently of the other, and was not, of course, aware of the manner in which he was preparing poison for the public.—Associated Medical Journal.

CURIOUS EPISODE IN INSECT LIFE.

A curious circumstance is said to have occurred in a silk factory of M. Garibaldi, at Cremona. It is positively stated that in that factory a quantity of silk-worms, instead of forming the cocoon, as usual, actually wore a kind of silk ribbon of the breadth of ten inches, and the length of upwards of twelve feet. In the course of the inquiries made in the matter, it has been elicited that a similar phenomenon, only on a much larger scale, took place at Alexandria, in 1833, in the silk factory of Dr. Gilo, where the silk-worms wore a ribbon two inches broad, and upwards of sixty feet in length, part of which is now preserved in the Museum of Natural History at Turin.—Liverpool Mail.

A WATER-DRINKER.

Cobbett thus describes his own experience:—"In the midst of a society where wine or spirits are considered as of little more value than water, I lived two years without either; and with no other drink but water, except when I found it convenient to obtain milk. Not an hour's illness, not a headache for an hour, not the smallest ailment, not a restless night, not a drowsy morning, have I known during these two famous years of my life. The sun never rises before me; I have always to wait for him to come and give me light to write by, while my mind is in full vigor, and while nothing has come to cloud its clearness."—Dewey.

RETRIBUTIVE.

John H. Mears, the companion of the late Dr. Gardiner in his frauds on the United States, since he obtained his portion of that plunder, has been a wanderer, and lost and squandered all his money. At length he became a trafficker in small wares, and took his goods from one place to another in the various trains of wagons that go through Mexico. Not long since he was accompanying one of these trains from Nieves to Monterey, and on the way they were attacked by the savages, and Mears, his family, and several others were murdered by them.—Home Journal.

JOY IN ADVERSITY.

All birds, when they are first caught and put in a cage, fly wildly up and down, and beat themselves against their little prison, but within two or three days sit quietly upon their perch, and sing their usual melody. So it fares with us, when God first brings us into strait; we wildly flutter up and down, beat and tire ourselves with striving to get free, but at length custom and experience will make our narrow confinement spacious enough for us, and though our feet should be in the stocks, yet shall we, with the apostles, be enabled even there to sing praise unto God.—Hopkins.

New Publications.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF THE EMPEROR CHARLES V. By WILLIAM ROBERTSON, D. D. With an Account of the Emperor's Life after his Abdication. By Wm. H. Prescott. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co. 1857. 3 vols. 8vo. pp. 618—804—505.

This new addition to the sterling historical series already published by Messrs. Phillips, Sampson & Co., will receive, as it deserves, a warm welcome from the reading public. Robertson's work is one of the few histories which find equal favor with young and old. Treating of events of the deepest significance, of characters fully as interesting as any heroes of romance, it is written in a singularly fascinating style, the purity and warmth of its diction alone rendering it well worth studying. Mr. Prescott's contribution to the work before us is of great importance. The fresh materials which he possesses, and to which Robertson could not have access, have enabled him to correct many unavoidable inaccuracies in the former's account of the closing years of Charles V., and to throw a new light upon that period of his existence. He has accomplished his task with his usual brilliancy and effectiveness, and completed one of the most vivid and historical pictures extant.

PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT: OR, Meditations in Exile. By WM. SMITH O'DRINN. Boston: Patrick Donahoe, 1856. 12mo. pp. 461.

Mr. O'Drinn's name will command a wide sale for this treatise, while the political ideas of a man of so much learning, experience and ability will meet with earnest consideration. Original notes are appended to the author's text, such as the American experience or Catholic principles of the editor would seem to call for. The style of publication is very creditable to Mr. Donahoe's press.

HOLIDAY GIFT-BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.—Messrs. Phillips, Sampson & Co., have catered as liberally for the young as for the old. We have before us a pile of their brilliantly illustrated juveniles—"Red-Beard's Stories for Children," translated from the German by "Cousin Fannie," is a most mirth-provoking collection, with the funniest silhouette illustrations. "Daisy; or, The Fairy Spectacle," by the author of "Violet," is a really delightful story, beautifully illustrated. "The Worth and Wealth," and other tales, by "Cousin Angie," will bear frequent perusal, and become universal favorites. "Bright Pictures of Child Life," translated from the German, by "Cousin Fannie," is a collection of pleasant stories, with fine colored illustrations.

LADY'S ALMANAC FOR 1857. By DANIELL & MOORE and G. COLLIDGE. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co.

This is the prettiest of the series we have seen. The illustrations, drawn by Billings, and engraved by Andrew, are very fine, and the little diamond publication is a perfect gem.

PORTRAIT OF HOSOA BALLOU, 2c.—Messrs. C. & D. Cobb, No. 9 Tremont St., have just published an admirable likeness of this gentleman, the first president of Tufts College. It is a fine specimen of lithographic art.

KOBOLDTORG, a sequel to the "Last of the Huggenbuggers," is due to the pen and pencil of that accomplished artist, Christopher Pearse Cranch. Mr. Cranch has hit the true vein of story-telling, and his "pictures to match" are exceedingly happy.

A DECIMAL SYSTEM FOR THE ARRANGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION OF LIBRARIES. By NATHANIEL B. SUTCLIFFE, M. D.

This is a small quarto, printed for private circulation, and describing the admirable system invented by Dr. Sutcliffe, and applied with complete success in the Boston Public Library. We have examined this system carefully, and are satisfied that it is the best that can be devised. By its use, the management of a large library is quite a simple affair.

NEW MUSIC.—Oliver Ditson has sent us "We Parted," a favorite duet, "In Whispers Soft and Light," from La Traviata. "O, Gott, du Frommer Gott," German chorale, and "Tenor air" from Il Trovatore, for flute and piano.

Editorial Melange.

It is said that there are at least two thousand gambling houses and one hundred faro banks in the city of New York. — The years of the greatest speculation in western lands, have been 1835, in which 12,566,000 acres were sold; 1836, in which the sales were 20,074,870 acres. — In 1855, the land sales again rose to 12,000,000 acres, and in 1856 to 40,000,000 acres. — The number of Shaker societies in this country is eighteen, located in several different States. The denomination was founded by Anna Lee, who was born in 1736. — The amount of canal tolls collected at Oswego, the present season, is $406,407 31, against $270,432 24. Increase, $135,975 07. Most of this large increase is on the amount of breadstuffs carried, a slight portion arising from the late increase of rates. — A resident of Madison, Indiana, has invented what he calls "an indelible pencil." It is formed upon the plan of the ink-supplying pen. The handle is tubular, and holds the ink which passes to a pencil point, in which there is a diminutive tube, split like a pen. — Benjamin P. Bancroft, cashier of Salem Bank, N. Y., late of Granville, Mass., has appropriated a portion of his youthful earnings in order to found a scholarship in Williams College. — The New York School of Design for women has completed its fifth year, it is said, under encouraging auspices. It is questioned, however, whether an increase of the number of designing women is desirable. — A student of medicine in Michigan, having courted a girl for a year, and got the mitten, has turned round and snubbed her father for the visits he paid her. — Defoe, the author of "Robinson Crusoe," died insolvent, though the author of two hundred and ten books and pamphlets. What a sad commentary on the fate of authors! — Robbing the mail is no joke in Alabama. Thomas Cashions and John Montgomery were respectively sentenced to the penitentiary for ten and fifteen years, in Marion county, a few days ago, for taking that description of liberty with Uncle Sam's property. — Mr. George Duyckinck, of New York, one of the authors of the "Cyclopedia of American Literature," who was injured by a railroad accident in England, some weeks since, has received distinguished attention from many leading men in England during his temporary confinement. He is rapidly recovering from his injuries. — Among the modes of attraction enjoined on Persian females is this: "Let their crimson-tinted toes be exposed, in order that the young men may see and admire them with wounded hearts." — When you say in a phrase, which is now Americanized, such and such a man is a brick, do you think of, or do you know the origin of it? It is this: An Eastern prince, on being asked, "Where are the fortifications of your city?" replied, pointing to his soldiers, "Every man you see is a brick." — A recent writer says that as regards health, no man has any business to grow old. It is absolutely our own fault if we become aged. We have nobody but ourselves to blame if we let our limbs acquire positions which, so to speak, look old. The bend in the knees, the bow in the back, the stoop in the head—all these are not the effects of age, but of the laziness, or weariness if you will that comes with age and may be defied. — We dislike to see a fact stated "on good authority." It generally turns out to be an unfounded rumor.

HORRIBLE.—An English lady, in full dress, lately got wedged in a narrow passage in Sutherland House, and had to be cut out by garden shears in the hands of an intrepid milliner and her assistants. Punch says:—"The difficulties they encountered in cutting through the impenetrable strata of silk, whalebone, goipure, foundation, muslin, gauze, stiffening, calico, flannel, caoutchouc, and erinoline, would, we are told, if minutely related, send a thrill through the bosom of the stoutest engineer! The lady, considerably entrained of her fair proportions, was carried home, more dead than alive, in a sedan-chair. The ruins of the dress were removed in a cart. The stairease is to be enlarged.

COTTON MACHINERY.—Of the rapidity with which some portion of the machinery employed in the manufacture of cotton operates, some idea may be formed from the fact that the very finest thread which is used in making lace is passed through the strong frame of a lamp, which burns off the fibres without burning the thread itself. The activity with which the thread moves is so great that it cannot be perceived, with the unaided eye, that there is any motion at all—the line of thread, passing off a wheel through the flame, looking as if it were perfectly at rest.

SPLENDID MARITIME PICTURE.—The next number of the "Pictorial" will contain one of our two-page pictures, delineating a local marine scene, executed in the very highest style of art, both as regards designing and engraving. We challenge the most critical examination of this masterpiece.

CINCINNATI.—The people of the Queen City have originated a magnificent plan of local improvement. They propose laying out an avenue one hundred feet wide round the corporation line, with little green oases, fountains and statuary at intervals. The estimated cost would be from three to five hundred thousand dollars.

MYSTIFIED.—"Presidential Electors at Large!" exclaimed an old lady, as she read a newspaper paragraph with that caption. "Goody gracious! when did they escape?" She was as much terrified as the man who was told the "Guyosentas had broke loose."

MONOMOTISM.—The Mormon missionaries in London do not appear to be making much progress, though they have lately converted a beer shop into a chapel and are working hard.

Wayside Gatherings.

The value of land attached to the U. S. Marine Hospital, Chelsea, is estimated at $150,000.

Of the ships in the Collins line, the Baltic has made the "best average passages."

At one pork house in Louisville, 4330 hogs were killed and hung up in a single day.

Miss Rosa Peter, of Prince Edwards, Va., eloped last week to Kansas with her lover, F. Frenchly. She assumed male attire and passed as his brother.

The Galveston Civilian says that the sugar crop of Texas, the present season, will be almost nothing; probably not to exceed 3000 hog-heads.

Letters from Liberia state that the culture of sugar has been carried on so prosperously that several sugar growers are talking about exporting it largely to the United States.

We see it stated in the Canada papers, that a movement is on foot in Canada to secure the passage of an act of Parliament, by which fugitive slaves may be sent back to the United States.

A mass of correspondence of John Calvin, relating to Protestantism in the south of France, was recently to be sold at Avignon, at public auction. When the day fixed for the sale arrived, the papers were missing.

As a party of four persons were card playing at Circleville, Ohio, a dispute arose between Thomas Moore and another man, when Moore caught up a corn-cutter and literally cut his opponent to pieces.

Alvin Power, a milkman of Farmington, N. Y., is under eight indictments for forgery to the amount of a quarter of a million of dollars. He expects to escape by showing that usurious interest was taken on the paper.

John Andrews, of Petersburg, Va., wagered twenty-five cents that he would eat two pounds of beef steak, half a sheep, and one pound of tallow candles. He "worried" the whole down, and "wet it with two quarts of ale." The bystanders paid the expenses.

Throppe's Catalogue of Autographs (1843) includes a letter from a Miss Smith, of Armadale, forwarding to the Earl of Buchan "a chip taken from the coffin of the poet Burns, when his body was removed from his first grave to the mausoleum erected to his memory in St. Michael's Churchyard, Dumfries."

Stove lustre when mixed with turpentine and applied in the usual manner, is blacker, more glossy and durable, than if put on with any other liquid. The turpentine prevents rust—and when put on an old rusty stove, will make it look as well as new. The odor of the turpentine passes off quickly.

A project is on foot for facilitating the communication between the Western States and the Atlantic, by the way of the St. Lawrence, by cutting a canal across the Michigan peninsula, which will shorten the distance some hundreds of miles, and save much of the rough navigation of Huron and Michigan.

In Pennsylvania, there are about $15,000,000 invested in the production of iron from the ore, and full $8,000,000 invested in the conversion of cast into wrought iron. The capital invested in lands, buildings, and machinery, directly dependent upon the iron works for their value, cannot be less than $25,000,000.

A native of California was lynched and hung at Watsonville, in Santa Clara county, on suspicion of being connected with a gang of horse and cattle thieves. While being tried, he escaped, but was recaptured and hung without a hearing, as his attempt at escape was considered evidence of guilt.

There are now in operation at Ophir, Placer county, Cal., three quartz mills. The Empire quartz mill is driven by a thirty-horsepower steam engine, and crushes about twenty tons to the twenty-four hours, as it is kept running day and night. In three weeks it has taken out about five hundred ounces.

A machine for spinning cotton into merchantable yarn has been patented. It is thought it will revolutionize this branch of manufacture. The inventor proposes with the ordinary labor on cotton plantations to convert the seed cotton into yarn. Of the practicability of the invention, nothing as yet is known.

In a lodging-house lately, half a quarter of lamb, two-thirds of a ham, two packages of chocolate, a pot of marmalade, the remains of a large pigeon pie, thirteen lumps of sugar, half a canister of coffee, the whole of a bottle of French brandy, was discovered (by the landlady) to have been consumed by the cat.

At the recent laying of the corner stone of Pilgrim Church, in London, England, a note was read from Mrs. Abbott Lawrence, of Boston, enclosing £100, and promising another £100 hereafter, towards the erection of the building. The church was established by the suggestion of her late husband while minister to England.

The waters of the river Chesapeake have been united to those of the Great Lakes. A boat passed through the North Branch and Junction canals, arriving at Elmira, N. Y., a few weeks since, from Pittsburg, Pa. This new and important channel of internal communication was commenced in 1853, at a cost of about $400,000. The new channel is eighteen miles in length.

At a chair manufactory in Burlington, Vermont, a machine has been invented and put up for bending timber for chair backs. It is said to work well. A piece of timber, previously steamed, is placed into a cast iron mould of peculiar construction, which bends it into any desired form. The wood is then placed in a drying oven, when it is soon fit to join the backs of chairs of any shape.

A valuable addition to the fossil department of the British Museum has been received, in the entire skeleton of a gigantic wingless bird, recently described under the name of Thyrax phanopus. This fossil is stated to be the only specimen of the species in which the skeleton has been reconstructed from the actual bones of one and the same individual bird.

The internal commerce of this country is now unequalled. With 24,000 miles of railway in active operation,—more than all the other countries of the world,—and the vast extent of our navigable watercourses, covered by our vast commercial marine, the United States at this time presents a spectacle of material success which cannot fail to excite the admiration of the world.

A large haul of hogs money has been made in Louisville. A man named Daniel Preston offered a fifty dollar note at a jewelry store. An officer was sent for, who took him into custody. He was searched, and four thousand dollars of the bills of a defunct bank in Georgia were found on his person; also five hundred dollars in counterfeit money. He was lodged in jail to await an examination.

A robber was lately captured at the village of Durno, near Inverury, in a way remarkably unpleasant to himself. He attempted to enter an old widow's house at night by descending a chimney; he stuck fast midway; the old widow heard him; she heaped straw in the fireplace and lighted it; the robber, half-suffocated, roared. Persons were collected by his cries; he was drawn up with ropes, more dead than alive, and the police took charge of him.

Foreign Items.

An alliance is said to be projected between Prince Napoleon and Princess Maria Romanoffka, eldest daughter of the late Duke of Leuchtenberg, and niece to the reigning czar.

The editors of the provincial journals in Austria have received verbal notice that they are not to discuss the merits of measures which have not been spoken of in the official journal.

The subscription for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of the late Sir H. R. Bishop is progressing, about £510 having been already subscribed in London, besides numerous sums by members of the University of Oxford.

In Norway, and through the whole of the Scandinavian peninsula, frost and snow surprised the inhabitants in the midst of their harvest, the greater part of which is still standing in an unripe state. In some of the valleys the snow is two feet deep.

The American government has sent Capt. Langcake, of the barque Windermere, a gold medal worth £100 for rescuing the people of the American ship Hampton, when she was in a sinking state. The medal was presented through the Local Marine Board of Liverpool.

The emperor and empress have placed 100,000 francs in the hands of the prefect of the police, to enable him to keep open the food-kitchens for the poor, which were founded last winter. Of this subscription, 80,000 francs is in the name of the emperor, and 20,000 francs in that of the empress.

According to the treaty of peace, Russia is only to have a certain number of vessels of war in the Black Sea; but the new Steam Navigation Company will have twenty-six post-steamers, six other steamers, ten tug steamers and twenty "barques." The crews of these vessels are to have the same uniform and discipline as the sailors who are in the imperial service.

Sands of Gold.

.... To great evils we submit; we resent little provocations.—Haslitt.

.... The wise man is wise in vain, who cannot be of use to himself.—Emilia.

.... The most sublime virtue is negative; it teaches us to do evil to no one.—Romans.

.... As to be perfectly just is an attribute of the Divine nature, to be so to the utmost of our abilities, is the glory of a man.—Guardian, No. 99.

.... Cunning is only the mimic of discretion, and may pass upon men men in the same manner as vivacity is often mistaken for wit, and gravity for wisdom.—Isidore.

.... In those vernal seasons of the year, when the air is calm and pleasant, it were an injury and silliness against nature, not to go out and see her riches, and partake in her rejoicing with heaven and earth.—Milton.

.... Those who wish to forget painful thoughts, do well to absent themselves for a while from the ties and objects that recall them; but we can be said only to fulfil our destiny in the place that gave us birth.—Haslitt.

.... To ruminate upon evils, to make critical notes upon injuries, and to be too acute in their apprehensions, is to add unto our own tortures, to feather the arrows of our enemies, to lash ourselves with the scorpions of our foes, and to resolve to sleep no more.—Sir Thomas Browne.

.... Think not that guilt requires the burning torches of the Furies to agitate and torment it. Their own frauds, their crimes, their remembrances of the past, their terrors of the future—these are the domestic Furies that are ever present to the mind of the impious.—Robert Hall.

Joker's Budget.

Why is the fun of the president elect like your breakfast cakes—Because it is Buck wit.

Get your money all ready before getting into an omnibus, and before going into chancery.

Why may carpenters reasonably believe there is no such thing as stone? Because they never saw it.

Why is one who has murdered a relation like a measure? Because he's "killed a kin." (Kilderkin.)

Who has ever been pushed by a shoulder of mutton? [We know of many who have been pushed for one.]

What is that instrument by which every tooth in the head may be drawn without pain, provided you shut your eyes and open your mouth? A pencil.

How to take care of yourself in the winter:—wear a great coat and long boots, carry an umbrella, and whenever it rains take a hackney coach for an overall!

When the vaudeville of the "Welsh Girl" was played at Liverpool, the bill announced that the music was by John Parry, the celebrated Methodist, instead of melodist.

"Mr. Engineer, is there any danger?"—"Of what, madam?"—"Of the steam's bustin'!"—"No, ma'am; the only things that 'bust' on this locomotive, are the boiler and engineer."

A minister on West advertises, in the hope of making young people come forward, that during the warm weather he will marry them for "a glass of whiskey, a dozen of eggs, the first kiss of the bride, and a quarter of a pig."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Massachusetts Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetry, and original tales, written expressly for the paper, in politics, and on all sectarian questions, is strictly neutral, therefore making it emphatically a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the MEDIUM size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
3 subscribers, " "..... 5 00
10 " " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirtieth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

STREET SCENE. IN THE CITY OF NAPLES, ITALY.

[For description, see page 45.]

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM { 6 CENTS SINGLE. Vol. XII., No. 4.—WHOLE No. 292.

WRECK OF THE ARCADIA ON SABLE ISLAND.

BRITISH HUMANE SOCIETY'S MEDAL.

On this page we present two interesting pictures—the first representing the medal of the London Humane Society, presented to Captain M. D. McKenna, for rescuing lives from the ship Arcadia, wrecked on Sable Island, in November, 1854; and the second, a view of the wreck itself. These pictures were drawn expressly for the Pictorial. Sable Island is a low, sandy island, 25 miles in length, 90 miles southeast of Nova Scotia, in the Atlantic Ocean, north latitude, 43° 49', longitude, 59° 47' west. It is the scene of many terrible shipwrecks. A company of men has been organized for the purpose of saving lives and property, at an annual expense of $4000. The island produces grass and wild pens, which support about five hundred horses and cattle. We will first speak of the medal. On the rim is inscribed "Captain M. D. McKenna, 1855." There are two medallions in the centre of the medal, surmounted by the British flag and crown. One has a bust of Nelson, the other a ship on the rocks. On one side of the medallions are a capstan and anchor; on the other, a mariner with his glass and a mortar for sending lines. Below are figures resuscitating a drowning person. The circular inscription in German text reads, "Shipwrecked Fishermen of Mariner's Key. Benevolent Society established A. D., 1839; incorporated by act of parliament, 1850." On the reverse, "England expects every man to do his duty. Presented for heroic service in saving life from drowning." The following extracts from the report of M. D. McKenna, superintendent of Sable Island, describes the wreck, which forms the subject of the large picture. The horses in the foreground are the wild ponies raised on the island. "The Arcadia was a fine coppered ship, five years old, 715 tons, built and owned in Warren, State of Maine, and commanded by Capt. William Jordan. She sailed from Antwerp on the 29th of October, bound for New York, with a cargo of lead, iron, glass, silks, etc.; also, 149 German passengers, and a crew of 21 men, and struck on the southeast side of the northeast bar of this island at 6 P. M., on the 26th of November, in a dense fog, and the wind blowing strong from south-southwest. As soon as we got the report on the following morning, we started for the wreck, and on reaching the bar, found the mate of the ship and four seamen on shore, they having landed in their own boat, but were unable to get off to the ship again. We found the ship lying about 200 yards from the shore, head to the southward, full of water, settled deep in the sand, and listed seaward, with her lee side under water; main and mizzenmasts gone by the deck, a tremendous sea running and sweeping over her bows, and the people all gathered aft on the poop. We immediately launched the life-boat Reliance, and the boat's crew took their stations, and with the mate of the ship pushed off for the wreck, and after contending for some considerable time with tremendous seas, strong currents, and high winds, they succeeded in getting alongside; and during the afternoon made six trips, and brought on shore about 80 persons. Two other attempts were made to reach the wreck, but were thwarted by the violence of the sea. When night came on, and we had to haul up our boat, the cries of those left on the wreck were truly heart-rending. A party of island men were despatched to head-quarters to fetch the life-car and mortar-warps, in case they should be needed in the morning; and before dawn of day, all hands were again at their stations on the bar, and the life-boat launched as soon as it was clear enough to see how to work her, and by 10 A. M., the whole 170 persons were safe on the island, and then the boat made a few more trips to the wreck, and saved some of the passengers' clothing. The ship was totally broken in pieces by the gale; only a few packages of cargo, some few articles of ship materials, and some passengers' clothing were saved. The island men were untiring in their work of kindness and attention."

MEDAL OF THE LONDON HUMANE SOCIETY.

WRECK OF THE "ARCADIA," ON SABLE ISLAND.

(Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRIME.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER X.

THE TWO GIRLS AND THEIR CHARGE.

WE will now return to Don d'Aguilar and his two daughters. The party arrived in safety. Carmina was the only child of Don d'Aguilar, and Alitea was the adopted daughter. Into their care Don Juan gave little Juan. At first, Carmina entered joyously into the task of teaching him, but when the novelty of the thing wore off, she found it very irksome, and soon Juan was left entirely to the care of Alitea, who, calm, cold and patient, performed her duties.

Juan won a place in their hearts by his ready obedience to every one and his constant cheerfulness. He had masters to teach him to read and write, but they were either unqualified or impatient, for Juan did not progress at all.

One day, Alitea found him in great trouble, almost weeping over his books. He started when he heard her voice, but she kindly and firmly made him confide his trouble to her. His master was dismissed, and Alitea undertook to teach him. Carmina thought Alitea too strict and severe, and in her kind little heart often tried to prevent some slight punishment from being inflicted; but Alitea was wiser than her sister. A few days only and he had not to be corrected, and learned all his tasks with astonishing rapidity.

Juan was still obliged to assist the cook and run of errands—tasks which he faithfully performed, though they suited him not, and oftentimes he felt full of despair because he was called from his book to help the major-domo Pablo. Alitea saw his trouble, and one day requested Don d'Aguilar to raise his situation, that he might have more time to read.

At the word read, Don d'Aguilar opened his eyes, and requested Alitea to prove it to him. She drew from her pocket a copy of Quevado, which Juan, who stood behind the chair of his mistress, read. Don d'Aguilar laughed and thought he must know the lines by heart, so impossible did it seem to him that he could have learned so much so quickly. After a pause, he drew a piece of paper and pencil from his pocket, and wrote some words upon it, and handed it to Juan, who read as follows:

"I will give Juan fifteen ducats per year as wages, and attach him exclusively to the service of Carmina and Alitea."

From that time, Juan had nothing further to desire. The tasks set him by his young mistresses were always light, and performed with joyful alacrity. He became devotedly attached to them, especially to Alitea, who was not so gay as Carmina, perhaps even rather cold and indifferent. He soon mastered all the books in their library, and gained permission to read those belonging to the viceroy. The gravest, most serious works were those which he preferred; science above all gained his deepest attention. His days were passed nearly always near his two dear young mistresses, Carmina and Alitea, and his nights he spent in hard study. He was treated by the young girls no longer as a servant, but as a friend, and he, always anxious to please, redoubled his efforts, and his progress was rapid.

One day they had a delicious repast set before them. They partook of it gaily, while Juan sat reading by the window. Never had the girls been in such glorious spirits. They chatted gaily and laughed merrily. Suddenly the door opened, and Pablo, the major-domo, entered the chamber in haste. Carmina and Alitea rose haughtily at seeing him enter without being sent for or knocking. He did not notice their displeasure, but exclaimed:

"Do not touch it—do not touch it! I come for the cook; the chief told me it was the wrong kind, and if eaten produced certain death."

Carmina uttered a cry, and would have fallen fainting if Alitea had not caught her and firmly sustained her in her arms.

"Juan, do you hear that?" asked Alitea.

"I heard it," calmly said Juan.

Hearing this, Pablo turned and with additional rage, exclaimed:

"Do you see him, in such a moment? the glutton—the thief! But he will be punished for his gluttony. God will chastise him."

"Leave us now, and say nothing, Pablo."

The major-domo inclined his head, and disappeared.

Holding Carmina in her arms, Alitea seated herself on a couch, while she asked Juan why he had eaten what remained on the plate.

"To die with you if you die," calmly answered Juan, and seated himself on a stool at the feet of his mistress.

"In one hour at the furthest. It is very hard to die so young. Poor Carmina! Perhaps it is best," murmured Alitea.

The three remained seated—two watching the clock, as the pendulum swung to and fro, and the hands slowly approached the fatal hour.

CHAPTER XI.

THE BEGGAR'S GARRET.

MOTIONLESS they sat. Nearer and nearer the hand came to the hour; it arrived and passed on, and they were saved. Alitea now aroused Carmina with the joyful news. From that day, Alitea was more friendly still, and obtained from Don d'Aguilar for Juan the situation of private secretary.

A grand ball was to be given on Carmina's birthday. Juan was hither and yonder, seeming to do everything. Anybody wanting anything, Juan found it. The night of the fete arrived, and at the last minute, Juan had a commission to execute for Alitea. He was going quickly through the streets, when a poor old woman begged him to give her a maravedi. He remembered the time when he was starving, and stopped kindly. Putting his hand into his pocket, he gave her all the money he had about him. It was a half ducat.

"A half ducat!" cried the woman, trembling with joy. "Thanks, young sinner, thanks." Then she let her arms fall as she muttered: "It is a great deal, but it is not enough. It will not save her."

"Of whom do you speak?"

"Of whom?" repeated the beggar, eagerly; "of whom but my daughter? The fever devours her, and the alguazils will send her from our poor garret, and she will die in the street."

Juan asked her where her lodgings were. She answered:

"Figaro Street, in the house of the Jew Solomon, the dyer."

"And your name?"

"Ah, my name—do you ask it? It is Sevilla."

"I will come there to-morrow." And Juan resumed his walk with accelerated steps, and was soon at the palace of the viceroy.

The ball passed off with great gayety. The two young girls, Carmina and Alitea, wore on this occasion Moorish dresses, which displayed to advantage their elegant forms and graceful movements. That evening opened Juan's eyes; he knew that he loved Alitea,—he, but three years ago a poor beggar in the streets of Pampeluna. He loved with the whole strength of his soul, or rather it was his life. Knowing nothing of the world, save what he learned by books, he knew enough to appreciate and understand his folly, and measure the abyss open at his feet.

During the whole night following the ball, Juan repeated to himself that Alitea, though an orphan, an adopted child, was of high birth; but that birth, that family, was unknown, and that very mystery gave Juan room to hope that there might be some misalliance—some stain in the shield. She was rich, but had he not read of many men who, having nothing, made splendid fortunes? Had not Alitea said herself that patience and courage overcame all obstacles? Alternating from despair to hope, he passed the night.

The next day he rose, pale and sad, and wishing to hide his trouble from all his friends, remembering his promise to the beggar the previous evening, he started in search of her. He found the street and house with very little difficulty, and upon reaching the room, found it occupied by three alguazils, with whom the old beggar was remonstrating. On a miserable pallet, in one corner of the room, sat another woman, about forty years old. Her haggard face bore traces of great beauty, but now her brilliant black eye burned with a feverish fire, and a deep crimson spot glowed on each emaciated cheek. The alguazils were in the act of bearing off all the furniture of any value that the room contained when Juan entered.

"Hold!" he exclaimed; "I am secretary to the viceroy, and these people are under my protection, and I forbid you to take their property."

He spoke with dignity and authority, and the alguazils sullenly obeyed, repeating that the woman would not pay her rent. Giving the men the exact amount, he closed the door upon them, and seating himself on a low stool, he asked of the two women their history, which was told in a few words.

The old woman's daughter, Griselda, the one now lying burning with fever, had been a famous dancer, and a count's son had fallen in love with her, married her, and tiring of her, had deserted her, leaving her with one child, a boy. The count's family heard of his misalliance, and under the garb of kindness, had taken her child from her. She found to her horror that she was never to see him any more. Then disease fell upon her, and almost destroyed her beauty. She could no longer dance, and fell into great want, possessing only her guitar and a mirror, relics of his former splendor.

"Yes," replied the younger woman, looking up from her bed and smiling sadly. "My sole hope through my life has been to find my son, place in his hands proof of his birth, bless him and die. That hope is gone, for I feel that I am dying, leaving behind me the mirror, the only remembrance of my beauty, the guitar, of my talent."

Juan turned, as she spoke, to look at the mirror, and as he did so, uttered a cry of surprise, seized the glass, and pressing an ornament, disclosed a hidden drawer. When the drawer flew open, Juan turned deadly pale, and hastily closing the drawer, re-seated himself, and in a calm tone demanded in what convent Griselda had placed her child, and, in fact, all she knew. Not the most minute detail was omitted. He gave as a reason for being so particular in his inquiries, that he thought he knew a young man who might be her son. She described a mark she had placed on his arm, for she was a Moor.

Juan listened in despair. One moment he thought to fly, to commit suicide, without breathing a word of what he knew. Filled with this design, he rose hurriedly, but as he was about to leave the room, he glanced at his mother. He saw her, poor, afflicted, scorned by all; and stopping, he asked:

"The child who was torn from you—do you ever think to see him again?"

"Always—always! He will come and blame me for my conduct, for giving him up."

"He will return," said Juan, gravely,—"he will return, not as a judge, but as a consolation."

"You know him, then? And you are sure he will not scorn me?"

"He pardons you already, and blesses you, my mother!" And uttering these words, Juan knelt before her. He forgot not even the old woman, who had been through life her daughter's evil counsellor, but forgiving all, held his hand out towards her, saying: "My grandmother!"

After a moment's silence, he asked his father's name. His mother at these words began to weep; then raising herself, she had the mirror brought her, and drew from the secret drawer some papers, and then wrote with the energy of a dying woman some words on a piece of paper in which she wrapped those she had taken from the drawer, and handed the package to Juan, saying:

"Go, my son, and give this package to the man to whom it is addressed. Lose no time, for I am dying, and I would fain know the result of your visit before I die. It is all I can do for you. Go instantly." And embracing him, she bade him leave her.

Arrived in the street, he looked at the letter, and read:

"To senor, the Duke d'Uzede. At his hotel, Madrid."

Juan went to the viceroy, and asked leave of absence for eight days, telling his patron that it was to execute important business for another, and the object of his journey must remain secret. Having perfect confidence in the honor and rectitude of his secretary, he not only granted him the leave of absence for eight days, but as long as he should be obliged to stay, and gave him a purse of money. Don Fernand d'Albayda was there, paying his devoirs to his lady-love, Carmina, and as he was going to depart immediately for Madrid, he kindly offered Juan a seat in his carriage.

Arrived at Madrid, Juan proceeded to the hotel, but found to his dismay that the Duke d'Uzede had left the morning previous for Valladolid. Juan was returning to his hotel, weary and dispirited, when he saw on a sign, "Gongarello, Barber." He stopped and knocked at the door, but no one answered the summons. A neighbor standing near told him the barber had been gone from there nearly three years, whither, no one knew; and when asked the reason for the house remaining so long unoccupied, the man shrugged his shoulders, and gave him to understand that the house was haunted. Near by stood another shop, and Juan remembered the name as being that of Gongarello's uncle. So he presented himself there, and upon mentioning that he was a friend of Gongarello and of Jnniata, he was received with joy.

The next day, he went to the duke's hotel, just in time to see the gates open and the carriage of the duke roll into the courtyard. Trembling with joy, he ran to demand an audience, but was refused. Three days in succession he came and was denied admittance, and the next the duke had actually gone to Valladolid. In utter despair, he ran to Gongarello's uncle, the only friend he had in Madrid, for Fernand had returned to Pampeluna, and to him he disclosed his trouble.

Andrea Cazolet was perfumer to the court, and he offered Juan to give him some of his articles, and send him to the Duke d'Uzede, who had just ordered a new perfume and pomade. Juan hesitated; he, the private secretary of the viceroy of Navarre, seek an audience with the Duke d'Uzede, his own father, too, in the garb of a perfumer's apprentice! His pride revolted against it, but finally his sense conquered. He had found to his dismay that, even as private secretary, he had no chance of seeing the duke; and while he waited, his mother's life was ebbing away.

He closed with the perfumer's offer, and in a day or two he reached Valladolid, with a small basket of bottles and cases on his arm, and presented himself at the door of the hotel. He was shown instantly into the duke's apartments, where he found him conversing with Countess d'Altamira.

Don Juan d'Aguilar had two sisters younger than himself. The oldest, Isabella d'Aguilar, good and amiable, had married Alonzo d'Albayda, one of the first barons in the kingdom of Valencia; she had one son—Fernand d'Albayda. Isabella and her husband lived but a few years after the birth of their child. The second sister, Florinda d'Aguilar, was remarkably beautiful, but vain, proud and selfish. Florinda married the Conat d'Altamira, a man old enough to be her father, one of the first equeries of Philip II. With him she lived a few unhappy years; then he died, leaving her free to plot and scheme for power as much as she liked.

CHAPTER XII.

THE FATHER AND SON.

THE countess laughed when she saw the perfumer, and after a light jest with the duke, left. Juan had intently watched the face of his father, seen for the first time now.

The duke was large—Juan was small; the duke had a grave, noble face—Juan's face was less distinguished, but more spiritual. For the rest they looked very much alike, and Juan found the likeness striking. The duke commenced, as soon as he was alone, to examine the case.

"The Circassian cream for the face—good. Water from the seraglio, to give nails a rose tint—very good. Almond cream for the hands—that is new. Ah, behold the bottle! Elixir capillaire; the last was a shade too dark. This is expensive!" he asked, turning to the son.

Juan bowed, unable to speak.

"Ah—well; they will do very well." And paying him, he bade Juan go.

Juan hesitated; then said he had something to say.

"Speak, and be quick, for I have my toilet to make," said the duke, impatiently.

Juan turned pale, and felt his heart beat as, drawing from his bosom the package, he handed them to the duke.

"Ah, a letter of recommendation! Well, you may go; I will read your letter. Call to-morrow for my answer."

"No, senor," said Juan, firmly; "I shall not go till you have read that letter."

The duke turned with great haughtiness towards the bold youth, but he perhaps saw something in that handsome open face which made him silent; and turning to the table where he had thrown the letters, he began to read. As he read, he turned pale, then crimson, and anger and fear showed themselves in his face. Having finished reading, he turned to Juan and said:

"This, then, is the message you had the honor to hear!"

"There is no honor in it, either for you or for me,—it is dire necessity only." And the glance of his eye was as haughty as the duke's own, as he added: "No honor for me to be your son, or you my father."

"Re-assure yourself, my fine fellow, I totally disavow the truth of the statement. And it cannot be proved, either," he added, as, with a sudden motion of his hand, he threw the letters—the only proofs Juan had—into the blazing fire, and stamped them down with his heel.

Juan uttered a cry of horror and utter despair, and sprang forward, exclaiming:

"You shall not escape from my hands alive!"

But the duke had already sounded his bell, and the door opened and three men entered the room. The duke turned with dignity to his men, and pointing to Juan, said:

"Put that man out of the house, and if he ever dares to present himself before the doors, I order you to chastise him as he deserves. Lead him away!"

"Señor duke," said Juan, impressively, "you are high and I am low now. I am ignorant of what destiny awaits us; but you will remember to your sorrow the day when you drove me from your palace."

The servants led him away. The duke remained alone, and in spite of himself, he felt ill at ease.

"Any way," he exclaimed, "all proofs of my youthful folly and modesty are destroyed; that is good, and now why should I fear the young man?"

Juan almost ran back to his lodgings, so angry and despairing was he. The next day, and for fifteen days, he lay stricken down with a fever, some of the time vacillating between life and death. At last he recovered, and set out on foot to return to Madrid. Reaching his lodgings there, he found a note from Alitea, bidding him come to them, for they were at Madrid, and in great sorrow. During his absence, the good old Don d'Aguilar had died, and confided to the care of Countess d'Altamira his two daughters.

Poor Juan was filled with grief and despair at hearing of the death of his benefactor, and hastened at once to see his dear young mistresses, or rather friends, after having written to his mother to apprise her of his failure.

On his way to the hotel of the Countess d'Altamira, he traversed the street Santo Domingo, which was crowded with indignant people. He paused awhile to discover the reason, and another grief came to fill his cup. An auto-da-fé was to take place. Two Moors were to be burned, and these two were Gongarello the barber, and his niece Juniata! Juan was stupefied for a moment, then rushed wildly to his friends.

Carmina and Alitea saw his agony, and demanded the cause, and in broken words he told them. Carmina nearly fainted, and went to find her aunt; but Alitea rose calmly and went to her writing-desk, and sending herself wrote a note. Juan demanded what it was she did, and she replied in thrilling tones:

"I try to save my brothers." Seeing Juan's look of surprise at the words my brothers, she added, in a low tone: "Yes—my brothers, for I am a Moor."

Alitea handed Juan the note, charging him to deliver it, and tell no one, not even Carmina, that she had anything to do with saving the two Moors, for she felt sure they would be saved.

Juan promised faithfully, and set off with speed. When in the street, he drew the mysterious note from his pocket, and saw to his surprise that it was addressed to her majesty the queen of Spain. He knew not how to convey it to her majesty, when he thought of the perfumer. Andrea Cazoleta gladly helped him; and as the perfumer's boy, he again made his appearance at court, before, not simply a duke this time, but the queen herself. He placed the note in a little bag of perfume, and in that way it safely reached the queen.

An hour afterwards, the Count de Lerma and the queen conversed together, and that bold, ambitious man felt that he had met his equal in wit in the queen—the good, beautiful queen. By the strength of her own uprightness alone, she made the Count de Lerma tremble and grow pale. Haughty and severe one minute and winningly gracious the next, the queen obtained great influence over the prime minister, and he left her room, having given her a promise to set Gongarello and Juniata free, but with a determination to persecute the Moorish people in future.

Thus they were saved. The next day, Juniata was appointed as a little chamber-maid to the queen. In many hearts and places rose earnest prayers for the safety and happiness of the beautiful, good queen Margaret.

The next day, Juan found Alitea alone. He gave her an account of the success of her letter. Alitea raised her beautiful eyes to heaven, and cried:

"God protect our queen, that she may be happy!"

Juan hardly dared ask her the reason for her conduct, though he ventured to ask if she knew her majesty. Alitea told him no, which increased his surprise.

"You have seen her?"

"Never," replied Alitea. Then seeing the curiosity which Juan dared not gratify by asking questions, she added: "No—never! If I do not explain this mystery to you, it is because the secret is not mine. If it compromised only me, you should know instantly, my dear friend." And she gave him her hand, which he took, nearly trembling with joy.

"I wish only to have the happiness to save you."

"The risk is great for you and me," she said, in a low voice, "for this is only the commencement of persecution against the Moors." "But what is the end of these cruelties?"

"To convert the Moors to the Catholic faith, and for that end no means will be wanting. They imprison and torture those who cannot prove that they have been baptized. And you, Juan," said Alitea, after a pause, "have you received the baptism?"

"Not that I know of."

"Will you receive it?"

"If my heart and conscience counsel it, perhaps; if not, never. Rather have the knife and funeral pile. I swear it!"

Alitea looked at him with a flashing eye and courageous smile, while she seized his hand and said only the simple words: "That is well."

From that day, Juan felt happier, though if asked why, he could give no reason. He only knew that he possessed a secret which Alitea only knew. The knowledge that Alitea was a Moor like himself, gave him hope, perhaps.

About this time, Griselida died, leaving to her son a letter directed to Don Delascar d'Alberique. She had lived only to hear of Juan's success. Her mother gave her her son's letter; she read it, uttered one bitter cry of despair, and fell back dead. Juan placed his grandmother in a situation of ease for the rest of her life, and considered that he had done his duty towards one who had only led his mother to evil, and would counsel him the same.

Little by little, Juan's gaiety returned to him, and he resolved to go to Pamplona, to look after his friend Pedralvi, and bear him news of Juniata. He arrived at the Golden Sun, but did not find him there. While he was taking his dinner, he looked out of the window at the very spot where, four years ago, he had sat, hungry and destitute. He saw sitting there a mother and her two children—Moors, who were flying from persecution. The father was standing near the window, looking at the food with eager eyes.

Juan rose and questioned them. They were in search of work, and had been told that in Valencia they would find it. Juan ordered the host of the Golden Sun, Gines Peres, to give them food at his own expense, enough for their present wants, and for the next day, too. He felt his heart beat as he watched the wretched family eating so eagerly the food, and his eyes filled with tears of joy when he thought of the beautiful young girl who, four years ago, had stood at the same window, watching two children, whom she had made happy, and he had been instrumental in saving them from a horrible death. Truly God was good, and had blessed him since he had entered an honest life.

While he watched the Moorish family, a young man, twenty-eight or nine years old, approached, and leaned against the wall and listened to a conversation between some men standing on the hotel steps, who were uttering words which showed that they relished the persecution against the Moors. It was Yezid.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE MEETINGS.

THE young man listened awhile, then went and spoke to the poor man, whose name was Sidi-Zagal. Juan looked at the young man's face, and strove to recall where he had seen it. It was not the first time he had seen it; it was not the first time he had heard a deep, sweet voice. The young man took Sidi-Zagal's hand, and spoke encouragingly to him. The action brought back to Juan's recollection the night when, in the Sierra Monenyo, Yezid had taken his hand.

"It is he!" cried Juan; "it is my benefactor!"

Absorbed in gazing at Yezid, he did not notice that he was the object of close examination himself. A man had entered the dining-hall and been closely watching Juan. When he had finished his repast he came behind him and pronounced one word: "Juan!"

Juan turned quickly and saw a man in black crossing the hall. The voice was too well known not to be instantly recognized as that of Captain Josef Baptista, the robber chief. Juan seized a knife and followed him, but he disappeared behind an orange tree hedge, and after vainly searching, Juan returned to the window. He said not a word of this to any one, and yet without the charge of being either weak or superstitious, he could not get rid of a feeling of impending misfortune.

Juan had learned from some men of the hotel the name and residence of Yezid, and with a heart overflowing with gratitude, he set out to find it. Juan was delighted with the splendor of the garden, and with beating heart he glided to the principal entrance, and raised with a timid hand the knocker, which, falling heavily, made a loud noise that made him tremble, for he had found out that Yezid's father was Don Delascar d'Alberique.

At the noise made by the knocker, he heard dogs bark, and a head appeared at a little grating and asked who he was.

"A stranger, who wishes an asylum."

The grating was opened by a large, handsome Moor, who led Juan into a superbly-decorated saloon, took a beautiful crystal cup, containing a delicious draught, from a marble table, and presented it to Juan.

"It is the cup of hospitality," said he, smiling, "and thy lips must touch it to prove that thou art faithful to us."

But Juan, instead of drinking, looked at the young Moor, and his hand trembled visibly.

"What art thou, then? Art thou an enemy and traitor?" he cried, seeing his hesitation. "Hasten to drink—hasten; thou shalt be no longer feared or have fear. It is we who will defend thee."

And the young Moor filled the cup to the brim; but Juan could only lean upon the table, to steady himself. His heart seemed oppressed; tears filled his eyes, and in his trouble, he exclaimed:

"Brother, brother, if I am mistaken, do not answer!"

"And why?"

"You resemble him so much; and if I am mistaken, nothing will console me."

He placed the cup on the marble table, seized the young Moor by the hand, brushed back the hair from his broad brow, regarded him for a while with an anxious and eager eye, then with a trembling voice, exclaimed: "Pedralvi!"

"It is I—that is my name! and who calls me?"

"My heart did not deceive me. Have you, then, forgotten your young friend, who has not slept one night without thinking of you, who delivered him by scaling the walls of the Golden Sun?"

"Juan!" cried his old companion, clasping him in his arms.

Eagerly Pedralvi inquired after Juniata, and learned to his delight that she lived, but his face paled when he heard that for three years she had been in the dungeon of the Inquisition. Seated upon a divan, the two friends mutually questioned each other, and each related his adventures. Those of Juan are already known to the reader, and Pedralvi's took but a short time to tell.

Since the day, or rather night, when Juan was carried off by Captain Josef Baptista, leaving his companion mounting guard upon the walls of the hotel, Pedralvi had enrolled himself among the servants of the Golden Sun, that he might not leave Juniata. Two years after, when the barber Gongarello left with his niece for Madrid, Pedralvi, who knew nothing and was good for nothing, resolved to make his fortune; but knowing neither how to read nor write, he had no other choice than to be either soldier or sailor. But even that chance was denied him, for, being a Moor, he could serve neither in the army nor fleet of king; and at Valencia, he nearly died of hunger—would have died, in fact, if he had not by chance found a vessel belonging to the rich Moor, Delascar d'Alberique. Yezid the son had noticed him for his courage and zeal, and taught him, and further still made him his confidant, and Pedralvi vowed himself, body and soul, to the family, wishing no greater happiness than to die for them, to prove his love and gratitude.

"They say thy master is very rich," said Juan, anxiously.

"Rich as the king; but they make a better use of their money; for they give work to all the world, but above all, to their oppressed brethren."

"So Delascar and his son are regarded as chief of all the Moors? They have not been baptized?" The Count de Lerma—does he not annoy them?"

"He dares not. Rather than submit, they would leave the country, and if Delascar d'Alberique closed his factories, all the workmen would revolt."

"Is he married?"

"He has been a widower some years; and although his faith permits him not only to marry again, but have many wives, he consecrates himself to the happiness of his son and people."

"And he is noble and generous?"

"Thou wilt see for thyself, if thou hast anything to ask of him."

Just then the evening prayer was finished, and Delascar d'Alberique entered with his son, and chief workmen and servants, who seated themselves at a large table. It was a happiness to be admitted and punishment to be excluded from the table. But all submitted without a murmur to the commands of the old man.

"Master," said Pedralvi, "behold a stranger who asks your hospitality, and who has something to ask of you."

"And for myself, I ask him, if he means well, to be seated at my table," replied the old man.

"That stranger is not one!" cried Yezid, recognizing him; "for yesterday he took the defence of that poor Sidi-Zagal, of whom I have spoken to you, my father."

"Yes," said the old man, "Sidi-Zagal—he is one of our brothers."

"He is one of mine, also!" cried Juan, with pride. "I am a Moor, too."

"Seat thyself, my brother, between my son and myself."

Delascar was sixty years old, but fresh and vigorous; his eyes brilliant with a youthful fire, his voice deep and musical, his mind active and cultivated. During the repast, the conversation was pleasing as well as brilliant. Pedralvi stood by, almost dumb with astonishment, to listen to his friend Juan take an active part in the conversation, displaying equal knowledge with his host, Don Delascar.

When the supper was finished, the old man, Yezid and Juan passed into another saloon.

"Speak now," said Delascar; "I will listen to you."

Yezid rose to leave, but Juan begged him not to go. The old man then asked him his name.

Juan stammered out his mother's name—Sevilla.

"Sevilla!—that is the name of an old soldier who fought with us in the Alpujarras. Less fortunate than myself, he fell, in the act of saving a friend, Don Juan d'Aguilar."

Then Juan, in a low, trembling voice, related all that had occurred, and gave Don Delascar his mother's note. The old man took the letter with a trembling hand, and read it slowly and attentively, then handed the letter to his son, bidding him read. When Yezid had finished the letter, his father, turning to Juan, said:

"You shall not be only the son of Sevilla—"

But the generous Juan did not allow him to finish his sentence. He threw himself into Juan's arms, exclaiming:

"My brother—my brother! I shall regard you as such, and you, my father, will not forbid me!"

"No, Yezid, my dearly loved son. I will adopt the child of the brave Sevilla, and thou hast rightly called him thy brother."

Juan fell on his knees, and pressed to his lips their hands, which he bathed with tears.

The old man smiled, and said:

"If Heaven does not blind us, your heart, at least, we have not mistaken. Love Yezid like thy brother, for he is the most noble and generous of men." And the father's eyes filled with proud, happy tears.

"I know it—I know it!" cried Juan.

"Swear to me to respect him as thy elder brother, as head of the family, to defend him and die for him, if it is necessary. It is thy duty, my son."

"I swear it. I will fulfil my duty. I swear it before God and before you! I swear it by my honor,—by the sacred name you have permitted me to call you,—that name," he added, hesitatingly, "that my lips dare not yet pronounce."

"I expect you to," replied the old man, kindly smiling.

"My father!" cried Juan.

Delascar received him in his arms, and seated him between himself and Yezid, like a son returned from a long journey, not like the stranger they had adopted. Seated between them, he complied with their wishes and related his history, and he dwelt upon the scene in the Sierra Moncayo, when the words of the noble Yezid raised his good feelings and made him an honest man; and how by misfortune he had been unable to profit by his generous offers. Juan learned that another had brought the tablets, and been kindly received and educated by the Moor. Juan continued his history—how he had saved Don Juan d'Aguilar, and been remanded by him and instructed by his daughters.

It was near the middle of the night when the recital was finished; and before going to rest, Delascar called all his people together, and presented to them Juan Sevilla, the son of the house, their new master. Pederalvi seemed almost beside himself with joy; he thought he had not heard aright, but Yezid said, smilingly:

"Yes—he is my brother."

The old man said to him, before bidding him good-night:

"My son, you have come to us in time of trial and misfortune; persecution menaces us, and if the powerful hand which sustained us is taken away, I know not what we shall do."

"I come, then, at the right time!" cried Sevilla. "My fate will not be separated from you again. I will come to defend and die for you, my father and my brother."

The old man looked at him with eyes flushing with pride and affection, and with a blessing, left him.

The next day, when he was leaving, the old man told him that for all he needed in future for his happiness, pleasure or caprice, he must ask himself or Yezid, and he should have it. He had been shown the manufactories of rich fabrics, and in showing them to him, Yezid had said:

"All that is for thee, brother."

"No—never, never!"

"Ah, well—for us, if you like that better."

But for his despairing love for Alitea, Juan would have been perfectly happy. With a friend's eye, he saw that Yezid was not completely happy. Oftentimes a sadness clouded his brow, and a melancholy smile rose on his lips. D'Alberique vainly pressed his son to marry, but Yezid only said: "We shall see;" but never made a choice. Once Juan saw him, when he thought he was alone, raise a pomegranate flower to his lips. He dared ask Yezid nothing, but one day he told him of his love for Alitea, hoping he would return his confidence, but his lips remained closed. The day came for departure, and with a sad heart he left his tender father. How much richer he went away!

CHAPTER XIV.

THE ALGUAZILS AND THEIR CAPTIVE.

It would have been very hard for Juan to leave the hospitable roof of Don Delascar if Pederalvi had not gone with him. Together they travelled, making no distinction between master and servant, but chatting like the friends that they were. They had not travelled far when night shut in, and before they reached the inn where they proposed to stop, they were overtaken by a band of alguazils, who made them captive and despoiled them of their money. Juan remembered the man in black he had met at the Golden Sun, and he feared that these men were only robbers disguised as alguazils, and his fears proved correct, for they had scarcely journeyed far, when the chief came to Juan's side and spoke to him:

"Juan is richer than when he worked with us. He is a gentleman, and has his pockets filled with gold, or rather mine."

Juan, in spite of the lapse of time, knew the voice.

"Robber, what do you wish more?"

"To learn from you the secret of making a fortune; to learn where to find the same treasure."

Just then, both Pederalvi and Juan heard the tramp of horses, and gave a loud, clear cry to which despair lent double strength:

"Help! To the rescue!"

The cry was repeated by the mountains, and they had soon the satisfaction of seeing a large number of mounted men, bearing torches and riding in front of two carriages, near the spot. A man clothed in black, and nearly asleep in the first carriage, demanded to know the cause of the stop.

"I only see some alguazils—seven or eight—who have captive two young men. Question them without descending from the carriage, for the night is dark and cold."

Then the grand vicar, who was spokesman, demanded the cause of their arrest. Pederalvi explained the affair in a few words. They had been arrested and plundered, without any reason, and they demanded their liberty. The grand vicar then turned to Captain Josef Baptista, and asked him what he had to answer.

The captain had heard the pious prelate spoken of, and knew him to be the most implacable enemy of the Moors, always striving for their conversion or death; so with a bold face, he answered:

"These two young men are Moors, who have not been baptized."

Hearing this, the prelate Ribeiro sprang up, as he exclaimed:

"In the name of the archbishop of Valencia, I arrest these heretics!"

"I have already taken away from them the jewels and impious ornaments they carried, and I will lead them to the prisons of Saint Hermadand," replied the gallant captain.

"No; I will take them in my charge." And the prelate had the two young captives brought to the side of the carriage, and questioned them. Pederalvi was the first interrogated. "You are a Moor, then, and have not been baptized?"

"I am a Moor, but I have, on the contrary, received baptism." And Pederalvi drew from his pocket a paper without which he never went anywhere, bearing the seal of the archbishop, and proving that seven years ago, when he was fifteen, he had been baptized by Ribeiro himself.

The prelate, with a disappointment he could scarcely conceal, turned to Juan.

"And you—have you been baptized?"

Juan Sevilla remained silent, but Pederalvi answered confidently in the affirmative.

"Swear it—swear it!" replied the vicar.

"I swear it!" said Pederalvi, without hesitation.

"And you also swear it?" said the vicar, turning to Juan.

But he remained wholly silent.

"Are you not a Christian? Have you not been baptized?"

"No, senor."

"What did I tell you!" cried the captain.

"What a happy hour!" said the archbishop. "At last we have arrested a Moor—a perjured Christian, who does not fear to take a false oath."

The prelate gave orders for the security of the prisoners, and to have them follow in his train. Pederalvi, by his courageous but imprudent declaration for his young master, had compromised himself without serving him. Pederalvi prudently retired, and watching his chance, in the darkness of the night, he gave rein and spur to his good Arabian, and before they missed him, he was beyond pursuit. Pederalvi had not hesitated to do that, knowing that he could better aid Juan if free. All the anxiety of the prelate was concentrated upon Juan, who had become, as it were, his property, his parcel, and he would give him up at no price.

Pederalvi hastened to Madrid with the sad news—Juan's capture, and all his friends tried to discover where he was hidden; but in spite of their searching, no traces of him could be found, and fears were entertained that he had been brought to Madrid and thrown into the dungeons of the Inquisition.

Carmina trembled violently, but Alitea, self-possessed and calm, only betrayed by the deadly paleness of her face how great was her fear for her friend. Fernand d'Albayda tried to reassure her by telling her that, like all his brothers, he would protest against the violence, but yield at last.

"He will not yield!" cried Alitea, despairingly.

"And why not?"

"Because I know him; and, if it is necessary to tell you, because he has sworn it to me."

"To you?" cried Fernand, turning pale.

"Yes—to me; poor Juan knows well how to keep an oath. He will be killed, rather than fail in his duty, or honor. You know to what punishments, to what tortures, they expose those who refuse to abjure their faith. Perhaps he is dead already. We have hope only in you, Don Fernand."

The noble young man seized Carmina's hand, and turning to Alitea, he said:

"Since Juan is your friend, as well as mine, I will save him; I swear it, and you shall see that Juan is not the only one who knows how to keep his oath."

Alitea sprang forward, while a beautiful blush rose to her pale cheek, and taking one of Fernand's hands in both of her own, she cried:

"Thanks—thanks, Fernand! I esteem and honor you, for you have a noble heart."

The next day, the court left for Valladolid, and Fernand, much as he disliked to be separated from his dearly loved Carmina, was obliged to remain in Madrid, to fulfil, if possible, his promise to Alitea, his bride's adopted sister.

Alitea counted a little upon the queen, but before going to her, she wished to be sure where the prisoner was, and what danger menaced him.

Don Fernand remained at Madrid, and the two girls, with the Countess Altamira, left for Valladolid. Although attached to the queen, the countess was very rarely at the palace; and at Valladolid, she had a house of her own, situated in a solitary and picturesque spot. The chateau was situated above a deep ravine, and surrounded by a dense wood, a thing very rare in that part of the country. Carmina had no need of occupation, for she was pleased always with walking in the park and dreaming of Fernand. Alitea undoubtedly had no one to dream of, and never was idle; she took long walks, carrying her paints and pencils, and many were the beautiful pictures she took around the chateau. In her rambles, she came across a peasant's family. The oldest child was a daughter about to be married. Alitea instantly set about preparing the pretty bride's trousseau, and seemed very happy while she made her needle fly so quickly.

Before Don Fernand had time to prosecute any inquiries concerning Juan, he was ordered to go to Lisbon. The countess laid deep plans in that solitude against the future happiness of Carmina. Always ambitious, she thought to make the king fall in love with Carmina; the rest would follow. These plans she made known to the Duke d'Uzede, the ungrateful scheming son of the prime minister, and together they labored.

One day, the Countess Altamira feigned illness, and confided to Carmina the news that she expected a relation of her husband's, Don Augustin de Villa-Flor, a cousin. She bemoaned to Carmina and Alitea that she could not receive him herself, and that the task devolved upon Carmina; "for you," she said, turning to Alitea, "are obliged to fulfil your promise to the pretty peasant girl, and go to the cottage this evening to get her ready for her marriage to-morrow."

Alitea saw by the false countess's eyes that she was glad that her absence was secured; and thinking to make her feel doubly sure, she said:

"Yes—I must be absent, and I am very sorry, for I would like to see the handsome Don Augustin."

The countess smiled, and expressed her regrets; and it was settled that Carmina was to do the honors of her aunt's house. Alitea embraced her sister and set out for the farm-house.

It was nearly the time for Don Augustin to arrive, and Carmina was arranging her toilet preparatory to his reception, when the door softly opened and Alitea entered, with her finger on her lip to prevent any outcry. She had received a note from Don Fernand announcing his departure for Lisbon. All thought he was already on his way, but unwilling to leave for an indefinite time without seeing his lady-love, he had rushed to see her, and requested Alitea to arrange a private interview for him with Carmina.

Carmina was in ecstasies, but suddenly the thought of the arrival of Don Augustin and her promise to her aunt came to her mind, and her heart sunk. Here Alitea came to her rescue; her aunt would not make her appearance; nothing need be said; Carmina should go, and Alitea would receive the expected guest. Carmina was delighted, and the two girls laughed merrily over their intended ruse.

Donning Alitea's mantle and hood, and accompanied by the peasant girl, Carmina made the best of her way across the park to the farm-house, where she was to meet her lover. She had scarcely gone, when Don Augustin de Villa-Flor arrived, and Alitea, hastily arranging her dress, descended to meet him. She opened the door with these words: "A thousand pardons, senor cavalier, for having made you wait."

The sight of such a beautiful girl, and her gracious welcome, completely disconcerted the king—for the king it was. He had been led to the chateau by the Duke d'Uzede, who pretended to have lost his way; and as he knew nothing of the part he was to play, he was completely astounded to be asked by the beautiful stranger for pardon because she had made him wait. The king knew not what to reply, or who she took him to be, for that she had mistaken the person, he felt sure. Her next words placed him in a more comfortable situation, for she requested Senor Augustin to be seated. He in that way learned his name.

"My aunt, the Countess Altamira, is very unhappy," continued the young girl, with a gracious manner, "that she cannot, on your first visit, do the honors of the chateau herself."

The king breathed more freely. He was in the house of the Countess Altamira, maid of honor to the queen; and more, the beautiful girl, who filled his heart already with the thoughts of love, was a niece of the countess. So far he was sure of his ground. The false cousin expressed a hope that the indisposition of the countess would not continue long. Alitea smiled, as she answered:

"It is on your account that she most regrets her illness, Senor Augustin; she wished to give a fete in honor of the visit from her husband's relative, a cousin of whom she is proud. Did you enjoy your hunt? for the countess told me you were to hunt to-day with the king. You must be fatigued."

"A little, my cousin."

Just then supper was announced, and Alitea, with surpassing grace, led the way to the dining-hall, where a very excellent game supper was prepared. While Don Augustin made his repast, the two chatted gaily. Alitea asked if her cousin had been all the time with the king, and received an answer in the affirmative, whereupon she exclaimed:

"You have then a right to be fatigued and ennied."

The king dropped his fork in astonishment, which Alitea noticed, and added, smilingly:

"Because the king is not amusing, he is so austere. Permit me to give you some wine." And she handed her cousin a glass of wine, which he took, saying:

"You do not love the king?"

"Which?" replied Alitea, with smiling gravity; "for there are two—the Count de Lerma and Philip III., one who reigns, and the other who acts. Nearly all men detest the first."

"And you scorn the second?" said Don Augustin, blushing.

"My cousin, I pity him, for he is good but weak."

"Then weakness is a great crime?" cried the king, ironically.

"Not in such as you, Senor Augustin, but in a prince, who ought to conduct affairs himself. But you do not drink."

For the first time, the king heard the truth, unpalatable as it was, but the beauty and innocence of the being who told him prevented him from feeling angry. He thought of her words a long time, and reasoned thus with himself: "By Saint Iago! if I must be governed, it is better to be led by a beautiful young girl like this, than an old minister like mine."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The following is said to be inscribed upon the tomb of an idiot boy at Colne, in Lancashire, England. It is very beautiful:

If innocence may claim a place in heaven,
And little be required for little given,
My great Creator has for me in store
A world of bliss—what can the wise have more?

BAY AND ROYAL PALACE AT GAETA.

VIEW OF GAETA, ITALY.—THE ROYAL PALACE.

The engraving above conveys an accurate idea of the strikingly bold and picturesque features of the city of Gaeta, one of the most interesting seaports of Italy. In front, and stretching away to the right, are the waters of the Gulf of Gaeta. On the strip of beach in the foreground, are grouped some Neapolitan fishermen and women in their peculiar costumes. Along the shore are seen various boats and feluccas with their curious luteen sails and picturesque striped awnings at the sterns. The campanile of the cathedral soars upwards on the left, and crowning the eminence, crowded with buildings, is the cumbrous mass of the Royal Palace. Further to the right is a strongly fortified hill.

VIEW OF CHELSEA, FROM EAST BOSTON.

[For description, see page 61.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

IMPROVE LIFE'S HOURS.

BY ROBERT R. MORAY.

The days mispent in idleness,
The hours all lost in vain,
Once passed, are passed forever,
To come no more again.
The moments spent in pleasure,
When we no wisdom learn,
Are so much vanished treasure,
And never can return.

Waste not in transient pleasures
These hours that are so fleet—
These moments here so precious,
Which will too soon retreat.
But some firm mark to trace them
In the lapse of days to come,
Leave on each path your journey,
Which now you are hastening from.

For time will stop for nothing—
Naught can the moments stay;
If gone, they're gone forever—
If passed, they're passed away.
Improve them while thou mayest,
For they are gliding by;
Put not off till to-morrow,
For to-morrow thou mayest die.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PASTOR'S CRIME.

BY MRS. S. E. DAVES.

NESTLED romantically among the New England hills, on the banks of a beautiful stream, stood the somewhat notable village of Gossypville. Its first settlers, impressed no doubt by the idea of its future greatness, had placed it on a commanding eminence, and were extremely careful that all the roads should go straight over the top of every hill, no matter how steep. The most prominent landmark of the village, and its crowning glory, was the ancient church, which, like similar structures of that day, was set conspicuously upon a hill. A graveyard, with many a moss-grown stone, marking the resting-places of generations past, lay upon the slope of the hill, while near by, in the very centre of the village, stood the parsonage. This spot seemed to be an object of special interest to all the inhabitants of Gossypville, inasmuch as nothing transpired in the minister's family, either in doors or out, that escaped their observation. Perhaps this was owing to the fact that Miss Patience Pry inhabited a cottage just over the way, and if anything looked suspicious in or about the parsonage, she always happened to drop in just at that time, to see how the poor dear minister's wife got along, and if she could assist her any. If a cravat was being hemmed for the worthy parson, or an apron made for one of the children, the quality and cost of the material, the stitches employed in making the garment, were all duly ascertained, and dispensed over the next cup of tea which Miss Patience chanced to take with her neighbors.

At the time our story opens, the venerable pastor who had labored faithfully in Gossypville for half a century, had recently been gathered to his fathers, and a young minister had been called to supply his place, whose family consisted of his wife, a sister of hers, and a young student, who had been attracted by the apparent quietness of the spot, and had persuaded the pastor to board him.

Mr. Rivers was seated with his wife a month after his installation, when there came a slight tap on the door, and a simultaneous opening of the same, and in walked Miss Pry, her little wiry curls vibrating rapidly with her excessive bowing.

"Ah, good evening, Mr. Rivers, and you too, ma'am. I see Deacon Hastings fetch you in a big pumpkin to-day, and I spose of course, you'll make pumpkin pies on't. Now the deacon planted his pumpkins on a miserable piece of land, and this will probably be tough and watery, and I'd advise you to bile the whole at one batch."

"I have not concluded to use it at all at present."

"Well, you'll remember what I said when you bile it. But I come to tell you that the ladies of the Dorcas Sewing Society have chosen you for their president. We meet next Wednesday afternoon at Deacon Harvey's, and we shall expect to see you there airy."

"Indeed, Miss Pry, this is a position that I feel wholly unqualified to fill. I should much rather yield the honor to those who are older and have more experience in such matters."

"Mercy, I hope you don't think we are a set of old ladies. I assure you, there are a great number quite as young as you. Ministers' wives are always presidents of sewing circles, and I guess you'll do as well as any on 'em. But la sakes, I've got an errand to do to-night, and how I've been staying. Good evening all."

"O, dear," sighed Mary, as the door shut upon their visitor, "I am told how to boil a pumpkin, and in the next breath informed I am appointed president of a sewing circle. What a strange woman she is, Henry; don't you think so?"

"She is rather singular, Mary; but there are a great many just like her, or quite as eccentric, so we must make up our minds to accustom ourselves to every phase of human character."

The Dorcas Sewing Circle met at the appointed time at Deacon Harvey's, and a large number of the ladies of Gossypville were in attendance, all awaiting the arrival of their new president. In the meantime, their tongues were not idle, and among other things, Miss Patience enlarged on the fine things at the parsonage, which in truth were only a few fancy articles of furniture and ornaments, which were the product of Mrs. Rivers's own industry, and disposed about the house to suit her own exquisite taste. Soon the new incumbent arrived, with her sister, Miss Helen Arnold, who was now making her first appearance in Gossypville. She was very beautiful in person, with fair, classic features, clear brunette complexion, large, liquid, hazel eyes, and a mass of chestnut brown curls, shading an intellectual forehead. Her form, which she knew how to adorn with the most perfect taste, was finely proportioned, and Helen Arnold, as she first appeared in her beauty among the fair ones of Gossypville, was the observed of all present.

Poor Mrs. Rivers, with trembling timidity, seated herself in the chair of state, and opened the meeting by reading a chapter in the Bible. After transacting some trifling business, the fingers of all present were soon busy upon some garment to send away to the poor children in Burmah, or some other remote part of the world.

"Would it not be well," said Mrs. Rivers, after ascertaining the object of the society, "to appropriate our charity nearer home. We have a cold winter before us, and perhaps there may be some poor people in our own parish who need warm clothing, and if not here, in some neighboring city. The climate of Burmah is very warm, and here are many garments that would be useless there."

Great was the consternation depicted upon the faces present at this proposition. Widow Jones said "it was a shame if those half-naked Burmah children couldn't have decent clothes to wear," and Mrs. Deacon Hastings said that "when folks did give those nearer home, they didn't get much credit for it." And so one after another a dissenting voice arose from the circle, until Mrs. Rivers, grieved and mortified, began to think she was alone in her opinion. But with a smile and nod of encouragement, Mrs. Deacon Lovegood expressed herself highly pleased with the proposal, and suggested that the ladies should think of it, and act upon it at their next meeting. Mrs. Squire Hobbs seconded the motion, and straightway voices of approval were heard in great numbers.

As Mrs. Rivers was about leaving, she encountered Mrs. Hastings in the doorway. Taking her cordially by the hand, she said: "Good evening, Mrs. Hastings. I have been trying all the afternoon to get a chance to thank you for that fine large pumpkin your husband was so kind as to send us. We are all very fond of pumpkin pies, and that is such an extra large one, I think we can revel in that luxury."

"I am glad if you were pleased with it," said Mrs. Hastings, somewhat mollified at these words; "but I did hear you said that you didn't think you should do anything with the miserable thing."

"I am very sorry you should think me capable of making such an ungrateful speech. I have never mentioned receiving the pumpkin to any one out of the family except Miss Pry, who was in the evening of the day it came, and said she came to advise me about boiling it. The reply I made was: 'It had come so recently I had not thought what I should do with it. I did not know as I should make any use of it at present.' You know pumpkins are sometimes sweeter for keeping in the sun awhile, so my father, who was quite an experienced farmer, used to say."

"There now, I might have known it all came from Miss Pry. I do wish she could ever tell anything as she hears it. I hope you won't feel offended, Mrs. Rivers, because I have told you of this."

"No, indeed. I am very glad I have an opportunity to correct so great a mistake. I assure you, your present was a very welcome one, we thank you very much. Our parishioners have been extremely kind in sending us such a variety of nice things."

"I fear, Helen," said Mrs. Rivers, as they were returning home, "I shall have to choose my words very nicely when in conversation with Miss Pry. She told what I said about that pumpkin in such a way as to nearly make Deacon Hastings's family our enemies."

"I fear we shall have to be careful what we say to everybody here, for such a set of gossips I never heard. I couldn't begin to tell you the scandal I heard this afternoon. I am more resolved than ever, to keep our affairs as dark as possible."

Unsuspecting Helen. Their affairs did become darker than she had any idea of. To keep anything private in Gossypville parsonage was an unheard-of thing. * * * * *

It was a glorious afternoon in September, just such an one as would tempt about the lover of the beautiful in nature. A mellow radiance bathed hill and vale, and a dreamy stillness seemed to woo the soul to a delicious repose. Charles Favor, the gentleman before mentioned as boarding at the parsonage, had wandered out to enjoy the scenes of beauty which nature had so lavishly bestowed on this retired region, and had seated himself almost mechanically in his favorite spot, a noble eminence overlooking the village, and crowned with stately forest-trees, which stretched far away into the background. There were some blackberry bushes interspersed among the trees and shrubs, but not enough to tempt many of the villagers to take the trouble of gathering them, so here he could dream away undisturbed. He had often thought what a magnificent place this would be for a house; and this afternoon he was admiring his air-castle, with the beautiful form of Helen Arnold as its mistress. Heretofore, his life had been aimless, but since he had seen her he had read a brighter life-lesson in the depths of those hazel eyes, and he felt that to wander with her through the ever-changing scenes of life would be bliss indeed. Charles was startled from his reverie by a shrill voice close to his ear, and turning quickly around, he encountered the form of Miss Patience Pry, a huge tin pail on her arm, with a few blackberries in it.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Favor. I thought seeing as there was a few blackberries out here, I might as well pick 'em as anybody else, and I guess by the looks there hasn't been any picked yet."

"I think not. I believe the ladies seldom visit this locality, but it is a favorite spot of mine."

"La sakes; then here's where you come every afternoon. I've wondered and wondered where upon earth you could be going to in this direction. How do all the folks at the parsonage do?"

"All very well, or were, at dinner, I believe."

"I guess Miss Rivers will miss her sister Helen when she comes to leave her."

"Is she going away? I had not heard of it."

"Why, for mercy sake. Are you boarding right there in the family and don't know she is engaged. Miss Rivers told me of it more than a week ago. He's a teacher in some school or seminary, I forget where she said it was. Helen's got considerable book-larnin' herself, and I guess she'll make a pretty good sort of a teacher's wife, don't you, Mr. Favor?"

Poor Charles grasped a brush that grew near, for support, while his face grew ashy pale, but he controlled his voice enough to say he thought Miss Arnold was well fitted for that position.

"I see you had a book, Mr. Favor. I don't know but what I have disturbed you, so I guess I'll be going home."

"I guess I put a flea in his ear that'll sting him quite sensibly," murmured Miss Patience, as she tripped home, well satisfied with her afternoon's work. As she passed the door of the hotel, and saw the landlady standing near the doorway, the temptation to enter was too strong to resist.

"Well, Betsey Wiggin," said she, addressing the grown up daughter, a fat, buxom lass of twenty, "I guess if I ever suspected that Mr. Favor was bewitched after that ladyfied Helen Arnold, I'm certain on't now."

"How do you know? He didn't tell you so, did he?"

"He might just as well. You see I went over on to Deacon Lovegood's hill over there, to pick some blackberries, and who should I come across but that lazy Charles Favor, sitting there under the trees, dreaming away as though the world wasn't made for folks to work in it. Well, you see just to try him, I told him Helen Arnold was engaged—you know Miss Rivers said she was, the other day. You ought to have seen his face; it turned just as white as that sheet, and he could hardly speak."

"La, I guess you imagined it half," said Miss Betsey, with a toss of the head.

"I guess I didn't. But I see you are bewitched after him just like all the rest of the girls, and want to make out that he isn't head and ears in love now, but you won't make me believe it."

Charles Favor watched the retreating form of Miss Patience till it was lost in the distance. He pressed his hand to his throbbing temples, and tried to think it was all a dream. But no; that shrill voice, like a raven's croaking, was still sounding in his ears, "Helen Arnold is engaged." His beautiful air-castle, that he had been building all the afternoon, had tumbled about him, and left him sitting there sad and dejected among the ruins. Finally his determination was made, and slowly and sadly he traced his way homeward to the parsonage. That evening he astonished all the inmates there by remarking at tea:

"I should like to leave town to-morrow afternoon, Mr. Rivers; is there any conveyance that will take me to the nearest railroad station?"

"No, sir, no public conveyance. But surely you are not going to leave us permanently."

"That is my present intention," he replied, in as indifferent a voice as he could assume.

He could not help glancing over to the opposite side of the table to note the effect of his words, and what he saw puzzled him exceedingly. There was Helen, usually so calm and self-possessed, turning pale and red by turns. What could it mean? Was there even a ray of hope for him?

Poor Helen was sadly disconcerted for some cause, for she passed the butter plate twice to Mr. Rivers, asking him if he would have some of the cake, and sweetened her own tea with preserves instead of sugar.

"Come, Helen," said Mrs. Rivers, next morning after breakfast, "I hear that blackberries are very plenty on the hill yonder; suppose you take a walk over there this forenoon and gather some."

"So I will, Mary. I haven't been berrying this many a day."

"I think, Miss Helen, if you have no objections, I will accompany you. That is my favorite haunt about here. I should like to visit once more before I leave."

"I should like your company very much, Mr. Favor. Come, Mary, you must provide him with a pail too, for I intend he shall help me in the expedition."

"Certainly," replied Mrs. Rivers, "from motives of self-interest, if none other."

That was a dangerous excursion for two hearts in just the state theirs were in. But their pails were nearly filled with berries, and still nothing had been said by either of what was uppermost in their thoughts.

"Come, Helen," said Charles, at length, "I have scrambled about among these bushes until I am really tired, and you look weary too. Let us sit down under this magnificent elm and rest ourselves. I shall miss this shady seat, where I have sat so many hours, more than I can tell, when I am away."

"Aint your leaving something very sudden?"

"Rather so. But then, I am somewhat impulsive. The parsonage will enjoy a season of quiet when two such inveterate talkers as we are absent."

"What do you mean, Mr. Favor? You speak of our going away. I have no intention of leaving my sister at present."

"Not at present, perhaps, but the happy hour will arrive soon enough, I presume. As this is the first opportunity I have had since I heard the news, let me congratulate you on your engagement. If you are as happy as I think you deserve, yours will be a blissful life."

"Mr. Favor, what do you mean? I confess your words are a perfect riddle to me."

"I fear, Helen, I have offended you by referring to this matter; but I thought it no harm to mention what is spoken of publicly. Miss Pry told me your sister informed her that you were engaged to be married to a teacher in a seminary, in some distant city, and spoke of how lonely your sister would feel without you."

"More mischief brewed by that odious woman. I declare this is provoking, and yet it is laughable, to see her ingenuity in getting up a story. My sister probably told her I was engaged as a teacher in Lewiston Seminary, which office I am to commence in January. Out of this she has manufactured the story that I am engaged to be married."

"Thank God, Helen. You spoke of my departure being sudden. It was this news that determined me. I could not bear to be tortured daily by the sight of one who has become associated with every hope I have on earth, and know that she was the affianced of another. I had dared to weave glorious visions of the future, and that afternoon I encountered Miss Pry, I had been running, in imagination, through the winding paths of life with you at my side. Was I only a visionary, Helen, or can those bright dreams ever be realized?"

Tears, but not of sorrow, and an almost inaudible "they can," were the only answer, but it sent a current of pleasure dancing through every vein of the listener, and life, that but a few hours before had seemed such a desert, now seemed a garden of fragrant blossoms. Hope had given place to despondency, and when they arrived at the parsonage, Mrs. Rivers declared that she had never seen either look in such excellent spirits, and that they ought to be sent on a similar expedition every day.

"Mr. Favor," said Mr. Rivers at dinner, "I have secured a conveyance for you, which will be here at three. I hope that will suit your convenience."

"I am much obliged to you, sir," said Charles, turning very red, "but I have altered my mind about going, and have concluded to remain here for the present. I am very sorry to have given you so much trouble."

"O, it has been no trouble. Deacon Lovegood said he was going directly to the railroad station, with a friend of his, and could take you as well as not. I am glad you are going to stay here."

That evening, in the home circle at the parsonage, Charles told the story of his love to the delighted pastor and his wife, who gave him their sincere approval. Mrs. Rivers had studied his character closely, during the months he had been an inmate of her family, for with a woman's perception in such matters, she had noticed his attachment for her sister, and he had borne her scrutiny nobly, and now she wept tears of joy, that her orphan sister, Helen, was to have so excellent a life-guardian.

"That will be a fine project," said Helen, a few mornings after, as the family had been having a confidential chat together. "I will assist you with all my heart. Not a word will I breathe about it to any soul. I pledge you my word."

"You forget that you live in a place where the lightest whisper is heard and told of," said Charles, with a merry laugh. "Prying ears may be round."

"Indeed, I don't forget. But we will elude their vigilance now."

"I declare, I haven't been out to-day," said Miss Patience Pry, as she peered out at the window one bright, moonlight evening, not long after the above conversation. "I guess I'll go over back of the parsonage there and across the meadow and call on Widder Jones; I haint seen her this many a day. Poor critter, she don't get out very often, and she likes to have me come, cause I tell her such lots of news. Now, Dorcas, mind you see every mite of that work before I come home. It's for poor children, and it's your duty to do it. I promised the society that I would have it done for the next meeting, and I shan't if you don't hurry. What's that you say? 'you're poor and want clothes for yourself.' Do you suppose I'll bear that from you, that I took out of the poor house for charity's sake. If I don't give you clothes good enough, go where there's better, that's all."

Away went Miss Pry, slamming the door after her, and poor Dorcas, the poor charity girl, with swimming eyes and weary fingers, plied her needle to make clothes for children not half so meekly clad as herself. Miss Pry reached the cross road that led to Widow Jones's, and there she saw a sight that made her stand still with astonishment. Suddenly recovering herself, however, she darted across the meadow with a speed remarkable for one of her years, and entered the Widow Jones's house in a breathless state.

"Good evening, Miss Pry. I'm proper glad to see you. But merely sake, what's the matter; you're all out of breath."

"I guess you'd be if you'd seen what I have."

"Do tell us what it is. You always have a power of news."

"Well, Miss Jones, as true as you live, just as I got to the cross road out here, who should I see but a gal standing by the bars there? I don't know who it was, but her form looked some like Helen Arnold's. Think's I, that looks rather suspicious, so I stepped back a little so she shouldn't see me, and watched her. And don't you think, I see Mr. Rivers, yes, that sanctified minister of ours, come and meet that gal, and she took his arm and they went off as lovin' as you please. What do you think of that?"

"Think of it! Why, it's the awfulest thing I've heard tell on since I lived in Gossypville. He ought to be turned right out of the church. I've had my suspicions of him this long time, that he was a wolf in sheep's clothing. I guess folks will find him out."

"I declare, if it aint all unsettled my nerves, Miss Jones. I came in here to stay some time, but I feel so frustrated I can't keep still. I believe I must be going."

"I hate to have you go, but it's worth a good deal, even this short call, to hear such a piece of news. Good evening, Miss Pry."

"Don't you think that's an awful thing about the minister, Seraphina?" said Betsey Wiggin to Deacon Hastings's daughter, as they were going to the sewing circle, at Widow Jones's."

"I guess it is awful. I wonder that Helen Arnold dares show her head among decent folks, but I spose she'll be there this afternoon as big as life. I do think she's despicable."

"So do I. And what do you think mother saw with her own eyes the other day?"

"I'm sure I don't know. Do tell me."

"Well, mother went to the store to do an errand for Widder Jones, and who should walk in but Mr. Rivers? He picked out the very handsomest Bay State shawl there was in the store, bought it and carried it off with him. When mother had done her errand she went to carry the things to Widder Jones, and right at that cross road where they've been seen so many times, she saw Mr. Rivers meet Helen Arnold and throw that very shawl over her shoulders. Now I don't believe his wife knew anything about it. I think it's scandalous."

"Well, for my part, I don't know what'll be the end of it."

"Nor I either," said Miss Pry, who had been close in the rear, and heard the story about the shawl. "But I guess I can tell you something that'll beat that."

"O, dear, what is it?" exclaimed both girls in a breath.

"Why, I staid dreadful late into Widder Jones's the other night. I guess it was as much as ten o'clock. Anyhow, it was so late Tom said I shouldn't go home alone, and so we were walking along, and overtook Mr. Rivers and Helen, arm-in-arm, just back of the parsonage. I guess she was crying, anyhow, she felt bad about something, for I heard Mr. Rivers say, 'Why, Helen, dear, don't take it to heart. I think we shall spend a more pleasant evening next time.' Now where on earth had they been, and what had they been about? Think of his calling her dear, too."

"I declare, it grows worse and worse," said Seraphina, rolling up her eyes in virtuous indignation, and Miss Betsey Wiggin, seeing Tom Jones coming towards them said, in a very loud voice:

"Well, if that pink of perfection, Helen Arnold, that all the fellers think is such an angel of beauty, cuts up such shines, I think that the young ladies that behaves themselves decent, ought to be prized if they aint so handsome."

By this time the three pedestrians had reached their place of meeting, where their fingers flew not half as fast as their tongues, for they were full of the startling revelations that were daily becoming more scandalous.

"What makes you so sad?" said Mrs. Rivers to her sister, as they were returning home.

"I'm not sad, exactly, but puzzled. I have had all sorts of looks aimed at me this afternoon, looks of disgust, indignation and contempt. I'm sure I cannot think what it means."

"I am just as much in the dark as you are. One remark I heard about myself, I have been thinking about ever since. Some one said to her neighbor: 'I think Mrs. Rivers looks dreadful worried, don't you? Poor thing, I pity her.' Now I was not aware I had anything particular to worry me, or needed commiseration."

"I suppose they have surmised something; at any rate, we shall bear sometime; but I should like to know the meaning of those strange glances this afternoon."

"There, Patience, I'm real glad to see you. I was just telling Betsey how lonesome it was. Do set down and take off your things."

"O, I can't stop now. I came to show you what I found just now. See here if you can read the name on that handkerchief."

"H. Arnold, as true as you live. Where did you find it?"

"Right on the bank of the river, down there by Widder Jones's pasture. Now Helen Arnold hasn't been seen since she went off the other night with Mr. Rivers. I asked Mrs. Rivers yesterday where she was, and she said her husband told her a friend of hers came for her rather unexpectedly, and she had gone to visit them. Now that's a pretty story; just as if Helen wouldn't know beforehand that she was going visiting, and tell her sister on't."

"I think the whole thing ought to be looked into. The pastor's setting a fine example to the young folks in Gossypville. I guess the church will prosper with such doings as this."

"O, I forgot to tell you something. You know at the last meeting of the society they voted to request all who were in need of warm clothes to make it known, and they would send a committee to see if they really needed them. Well, your Dorcas went to 'em, and Mrs. Deacon Lovegood called at your house this forenoon when you was out, to see her. I guess you got a fine settin' out."

Miss Patience grew livid with rage.

"To think that good-for-nothing charity jade should dare to do that. I'll go right home and turn her out of doors."

"Folks will talk like everything if you turn her out this cold night."

"I don't care, they may talk if they like. I guess they'll find I can talk too."

That night poor Dorcas was taken in at the parsonage, her thinly clad form nearly chilled through with the cold, and the tears almost frozen on her cheeks. When Miss Pry ascertained in the morning where she had found refuge, her indignation knew no bounds, and before dusk the story was all over town that Helen Arnold had probably been murdered and thrown into the river by their pastor. Mr. Rivers entered his home that evening looking very much perplexed, and took a letter from his pocket, saying:

"Mary, just hear what I have just now received."

"REVEREND SIR:—There are strange stories in circulation about you and your family, and circumstances that seem to point against you. We have called a meeting of the church and society to be held to-morrow evening, and you are desired to be present, to answer certain grave charges preferred against you. I am very sorry that this unpleasant duty has devolved upon me, but I have no doubt but that you can make all things clear. Your sincere friend in this matter, DEACON SILAS LOVEGOOD."

"What can we have done, thus to bring us before the church?"

"I know not, but I have a conscience 'void of offence,' and am ready to meet them; and it is my wish that you accompany me."

The vestry of Gossypville church was crammed on the evening of the meeting, and great was the astonishment of all when Mr.

Rivers entered, calm and unmoved, his wife leaning on his arm. After an awkward silence, Deacon Hastings arose and said:

"Mr. Rivers, the church feel that your recent conduct has been unbecoming a Christian minister who has the care of immortal souls, and we have summoned you to appear this evening to hear our charges. You have been often seen to meet a young lady, at a certain by-place in the road, and sometimes walked and sometimes rode off in her company, nobody knew where. You were seen to give that young lady a shawl you were known to have bought at Mrs. Simm's store, and overheard one evening as you were returning home from your rambles, to call her dear, and all this time your injured wife was supposed to know nothing of your whereabouts. That young lady has suddenly disappeared, and her handkerchief was picked up on the evening of her disappearance, on the banks of Gossypville river; there is great suspicion of foul play."

Mrs. Rivers looked blank with amazement, while her husband quietly arose to make his defence.

"My good friends, if any friends I have, I confess I am filled with astonishment at what I have heard. I should have deemed it incredible that such stories, from such a cause, should have been circulated and believed by any reasonable people. I shall answer your charges in course. Many of the brethren will recollect, sometime ago I suggested something in the way of religious instruction ought to be done for the west parish, whom I found to be generally a poor and neglected people. As it was not thought expedient for the church to do anything for them, I ventured to take the matter in hand myself. I have, with the help of my wife's sister, established an evening school there; it is now under successful operation, and I intended soon, as an agreeable surprise, to invite as many as would like to attend, over there to see what we had been doing. With regard to the shawl, my wife saw one at Mrs. Simm's store she liked very much, and being desirous of making her sister a birthday present, thought that would be an acceptable one. Having no money with her, and being in a great hurry, she left the shawl at the store. I called and purchased the shawl, and as it was the evening of the school, carried it with me and placed it upon her shoulders as a gift from her sister. Our school was held weekly on every Thursday evening, and as Helen has devoted that afternoon to reading to Mrs. Lunt, who you all know is blind, to save quite a walk for her, I have met her at a cross road near Widow Jones's. We have met there repeatedly, and rode or walked, according to the state of the weather. You charge me with calling her dear. As that is an appellation often used among the members of our family, I think it probable I have called her, perhaps repeatedly, 'my dear Helen.' My wife has been acquainted with our project from the first, and would have aided us if her health had permitted. With regard to the sudden disappearance of my sister-in-law, I can produce her in a few hours, alive and well, as on the last evening of our school a friend came for her and took her to stay a few days. I expect her to-morrow, and as many have been mourning her as drowned, can see her at my house in good condition, at any time they please to call. I have made my defence before you, and if the brethren and sisters are not perfectly satisfied now, I shall ask an immediate dismissal from my pastoral relation with this church."

Deacon Lovegood arose, with beaming face, and replied:

"Mr. Rivers, I have never believed there was any criminality in your conduct, and have from the first thought, what I now know, that it was only the fabrication of a set of idle gossips. There has been a great deal of mischief made in town from this same cause, and now I think it high time it should stop. And I would advise those who have been so busy in getting up this story, to be quite sure, hereafter, of a fact before reporting it publicly. I am rejoiced at your defence, and as many of the church as agree with me, will please to rise."

The entire congregation arose at this call.

"I am glad, my friends," said Mr. Rivers, "this unpleasant affair has terminated so happily, for I believe, from the good will that beams in your faces, that I have again your entire confidence, and now I invite you all to my house on New Year's Eve, and I hope to see the parsonage crowded to its fullest extent."

The evening designated at length arrived, and the parsonage was crowded, for the people felt so ashamed of their foolish charges against the minister that each one was anxious, by their presence, to prove their friendship.

"Will the company please suspend their conversation for a few moments?" said Mr. Rivers.

The door opened, and Charles Favor, with the beautiful Helen Arnold leaning on his arm, entered, and stood before the pastor, and ere the people had time to recover from their surprise, were pronounced husband and wife. All advanced to tender their congratulations but Miss Pry, who, indignant and mortified, made a hasty retreat.

After his marriage, Mr. Favor disclosed to Helen his real circumstances. Instead of being a poor student, he was the possessor of an ample fortune, and being disgusted with money-seeking daughters, and intriguing manias, he had come to this village to enjoy a season of quiet. Here he had found his ideal of a true wife, and soon, on the spot where he had built so many air-castles, there arose a more substantial structure, the most elegant in Gossypville, and the town, from his numerous benefactions, had reason to rejoice that he had chosen his residence there.

Miss Pry soon had the mortification to find that her stories were not believed so readily as formerly, and receiving a legacy from a deceased brother, of a small house in Tatletown, she removed thither, in hopes of finding more congenial society. After the departure of the prime mover in matters of scandal, the inhabitants of Gossypville, learning wisdom by the past, and stimulated by the example of their pastor's family, became as noted for harmony and good will as they were before for wrangling and dissension.

VIEW IN BOSTON HARBOR.—ENGL MAIL STEAMER GOING TO SEA.

[For description, see page 61.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE NAMELESS GRAVE.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

'Neath the low-drooping boughs of the sad weeping willow,
Life's fever departed, how sweetly he sleeps!
With the bosom of earth for his couch and his pillow,
And one silent mourner, the willow-tree, weeps.

'Tis a beautiful spot in the heart of the valley,
And sweet are the violets grown o'er the mound;
Now the whispering winds with the willow leaves dally,
And mournfully plaintive and sad is the sound.

But no head-stone is here with rude letters engraven,
To tell of the being now mouldered to dust;
Perchance 'tis a wanderer, reached his last haven,
And evermore shielded from life's wintry gust.

Perhaps 'tis a soldier—his battles are over,
The roll of the drum can arouse him no more:
Ne'er again round his pillow shall fitfully hover
Grim visions of battle-fields flooded with gore.

Or, is it a pilgrim, whose bosom was burning
To view, if but once more, an earlier home?
But arrived at the spot, there was no more returning—
His spirit departed, and here is his tomb.

In vain we conjecture, for closed are the portals
Which hold from the living the forms of the dead:
Concealed are his ashes from vision of mortals,
And never by us can the secret be read.

O, peace to his mates, wherever the being
Whose bones in this long-hallowed valley are laid!
Let the wild birds of song, with their warbling and gleaming,
Disport round his grave, in the willow-tree's shade.

When the evening wind steals with a low, gentle sighing,
O'er the hills that look down on the flower-covered mound,
Let it be a sad dirge for the nameless one lying
In silence and quietness under the ground.

[Translated for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PRICE OF LIFE.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH FROM THE FRENCH.

BY CHARLES W. STEVENS.

THE servant, opening the door of the saloon, informed us that the post-chaise was ready. My mother and sister flung themselves into my arms.

"It is still time," said they, to me; "come, renounce this journey, and remain with us. When you are gone, Bernard, what will become of us? And O, you may be killed in battle!"

"Mother," replied I, "I am a nobleman, and twenty years old, so I must set out and seek reputation, either in the camp or court. As to being slain, what matters it? Life is only a dream, and noblemen must seek glory. In a few years you will see me return as colonel, or lieutenant-general, or, perhaps, with a fine post at Versailles. Then I shall be honored, and shall marry my cousin Henrietta, and we will all live happy on my estate of Bretagne."

"But you may now," rejoined my mother. "Is there within ten leagues a richer domain and more beautiful castle than this of Roche-Bernard? You are now honored. Do not spend, or shorten by anxieties and torments of every kind, days which already flow so fast. Life is a sweet thing, my son."

"I am twenty years old, and a nobleman," cried I, impatiently, "and I must seek glory. Let me go."

Then through the sad and silent groups I hurriedly passed, and was about mounting the chaise, when a woman appeared on the steps. It was Henrietta. She wept not, nor said a single word, but pale and trembling, she could hardly stand. With her kerchief she waved me a last farewell, and immediately swooned. I ran to her, raised her up, and swore to her love for life; and then consigning her to the care of my mother, I hastened to my carriage. Had I but looked round to her, I could not have gone.

The post-chaise rolled over the highway, and for a long time I thought only of Henrietta, my mother and sisters; but as the turrets of Roche-Bernard receded from view, these thoughts were effaced, and then dreams of ambition and glory seized my mind.

The voice of my servant, who modestly called me monsieur le chevalier, alone forced me to abdicate the throne of my dreams. Every day the same visions returned. I was going to the vicinity of Sedan, to see the Duke de Core, an old friend of my father, and the protector of my family. He was to take me with him to Paris, present me at Versailles, and obtain for me the command of a company of dragoons.

I arrived in the evening at Sedan, and it being too late to repair to the castle, I put up for the night at the hotel, which is the rendezvous of officers, for Sedan is a garrison village. As I supped, I asked the road leading to the castle.

"Any one will tell you," said an officer, "for he is well known here; and it was at his castle that the celebrated warrior Marshal Fabert died."

And so the conversation fell on Marshal Fabert, as is natural to young soldiers. They spoke of his battles and exploits, and the good fortune which elevated him from a simple soldier to marshal. They said that the illiterate gave supernatural causes for his elevation,—that he had from infancy been engaged in sorcery and magic, and that he had made a bargain with the devil. And the credulous landlord asserted with coolness that a black man, whom no one knew, had been seen penetrating the window of the marshal, and then returning with the marshal's soul, which had been previously bought. This narration enlivened our dessert.

The next day, I repaired early to the castle. I must confess that I viewed with emotion the immense Gothic structure, as I recalled the recital of the landlord. The valet, to whom I gave my name, ushered me into a kind of armory, decorated with family portraits. I waited some time, and no one came. That career of glory, which I had pictured, begins then in the ante-chamber, thought I. Impatience got the better of me. I had already counted two or three times the portraits, when I heard a light noise in the wainscot. It was a door, which the wind slightly opened. On looking, I perceived a beautiful boudoir lighted by two large windows, commanding a view of a magnificent park. I walked a few steps in this apartment, but stopped at seeing what had before escaped my eyes—a man lying on a sofa. He arose, and without noticing me, ran abruptly to the window. Tears bathed his cheeks, and deep despair appeared imprinted on his features. He remained immovable for some time, with his face buried in his hands, and then rapidly paced the floor. He perceived me, and started. Confounded at my indiscretion, I wished to stammer an excuse and retire.

"Who are you, and what do you wish?" demanded he, loudly, holding me by the arm.

"I am Bernard of Roche-Bernard, and I have just arrived from Bretagne."

"I know—I know!" exclaimed he, and he cast himself into my arms, and earnestly spoke of my family, so that I thought he surely must be the duke.

"You are M. de Core?" said I.

"I was, but am no longer," replied he, rising, and looking at me with exaltation. And seeing my astonishment, he continued: "Not a word more, young man. Do not question me."

"If, sir, I have unwittingly been witness of your grief, and if my service and friendship could bring any mitigation—"

"Yes, yes—you are right; not that you can in any wise change my fate, but you shall at least receive my last wishes and vows."

After closing the door, he sat down beside me. Agitated and trembling, I awaited his words, which were grave and solemn. His physiognomy had a strange expression, and his forehead seemed marked by fatality. His countenance was pale, and his black eyes flashed lightning, as it seemed; and from time to time, his features, altered by suffering, contracted with an infernal smile.

"What I am going to tell you will confound your reason," he began. "You will not believe, and I myself often doubt, or rather, would like to doubt; but the proofs are at hand, and, indeed, there are in all that surround us many mysteries which we are obliged to submit to without being able to comprehend them." And he stopped a moment to collect his thoughts, passed his hand over his brow, and then continued: "I was born in this castle. I had two brothers, my seniors, who were to inherit the wealth and honors of our family. I had nothing to expect but an abbot's mantle, and yet thoughts of ambition fermented in my head, and stirred my heart. Unhappy at my obscurity, and avidious of fame, I dreamed only of the means of acquiring it, and this rendered me insensible to all the delights of life. The present was nothing to me, for I existed only in the sombre future."

"When I was thirty years old, I was still nobody. Then on all sides were rising literary reputations, the eel of which illumined even our province. Ah! said I often to myself, if I could make myself a name in the career of letters, it would be fame, which alone is happiness. My confidant was a negro servant, the oldest in the castle, who, the country people said, knew Marshal Fabert, and assisted at his death."

"One day, in the presence of Tago (the name of the negro), I abandoned myself to despair on account of my obscurity, and cried out: 'I would give ten years of life to be placed in the first rank of authors!'"

"Ten years!" said Tago, coolly; "that is paying very dear for a little thing; still, I accept your ten years. So remember your promises."

"I cannot paint my surprise at hearing that. I believed that years had enfeebled my reason. A few days afterwards, I quitted this castle for Paris. There I found myself launched into the society of the literati, whose example encouraged me, so that I published many works. All Paris was eager to see them; the journals resounded with my praises."

"Then you are not the Duke de Core?" said I, with surprise.

"No," returned the unknown, gruffly; and a smile of regret and contempt slightly passed over his lips, as he began again: "This literary reputation, which I had envied, was soon insufficient for a soul as ardent as mine. I aspired to nobler success, and said to Tago, who always accompanied me: 'There is no real glory, but in the career of arms. What is a man of letters—a poet? Nothing. Speak to me of a great captain and general. For a military reputation, I would give ten years more.'"

"I accept them," said Tago. "They belong to me, and do not forget it."

At this point of the recital, the unknown stopped; and seeing trouble and hesitation depicted in my features, he remarked:

"I told you, young man, that this would seem to you like a dream—a chimera, and to me, also; but yet the grades, the honors, I have obtained, were not an illusion. Those soldiers, which I have led to battle, those redoubts, those standards, those victories, with which France re-echoed—all that glory belongs to me. Tago had spoken truly; and when later, disgusted with this vain military glory, I longed for what only is real and positive in this world; when, at the price of five or six years of existence, I desired riches, Tago granted them to me. Yes, young man, I saw fortune surpass all my wishes in lands, forests and castles. This morning, even, all that was in my power, and if you doubt me or Tago, wait and he will come, and you shall see with your own eyes what will confound your reason and mine, and is unhappily too real."

The unknown then went to the clock, made a frightful gesture, and whispered:

"This morning I felt so feeble I could hardly rise. I rang for my valet, and Tago came. 'What is the matter with me?' said I."

"Nothing, except what is very natural," rejoined he. "The hour approaches."

"And what hour?"

"Don't you guess it? Heaven had destined you sixty years to live, and you had lived thirty when I began to obey you."

"Tago!" cried I, with terror; "do you speak seriously?"

"Yes, master; in five years you have spent in glory; twenty-five years—years which belong to me, for you have given them to me, and the years of which you have been deprived, will now be added to mine."

"What! what!—that the price of your services?"

"Others have paid for them more dearly—Fabert, for instance, whom I also protected."

"Silence! 'Tis not possible—not true."

"You will see; so prepare yourself, for you have only an half hour to live."

"Tago was about going out, and I felt my strength diminishing, and life ebbing out; and then I cried out:

"Tago, Tago! give me a few hours more."

"No, no," returned he, "for that would be only retrenching from my days, and I know better than you the worth of life."

"As he said this, I could hardly speak; my eyes were veiled, and the child of death iced my veins. Making an effort, I gasped:

"Take back these blessings, for which I have sacrificed all. For four hours more, I renounce my gold, my riches, which I so much desired."

"Be it so; you have been a good master, and I am willing to do something for you."

"I felt my strength rekindle, and I exclaimed:

"Tago, Tago! four hours more, and I disclaim my literary reputation."

"Four hours for that!" ejaculated the negro, with disdain. "But never mind; I will not refuse this last favor."

"Not the last?" begged I, clasping my hands. "Tago, Tago! I implore you, give me until evening, and let my military deeds be forever from the memory of man."

"You abuse my goodness; but still I will grant you till sunset; therefore, ask of me no more favor, for I shall come at evening and take you."

"And Tago departed," continued the unknown, with despair, "and this day in which I speak to you, is the last that is left to me." And nearing the window, which looked out upon the park, he soliloquized: "I shall no longer see this beautiful sky, these green fields, these gushing fountains; no longer breathe the embalmied air of spring. Fool that I was! These gifts, which God gives to all, to which I was insensible, and of which now only do I comprehend the worth, might have been still enjoyed by me twenty-five years. I have sacrificed my days for a sterile glory, which did not render me happy, and which is now death to me. See! see!" cried he, showing me peasants, who were repairing to their work, singing. "What would I not give to share their labors and misery! But I have no longer anything to hope here below."

At this moment, a sunbeam passed over, and lighted up his pale and distracted countenance. He seized my arm with a kind of delirium, and said:

"Look! look! how charming is the sun! and I must quit all that is beautiful. Let me at least enjoy it yet; let me relish entire this day, so pure and delightful, for there will be for me no morrow."

And he darted into the park before I could retain him, and to tell the truth, I had not the strength. I had fallen down upon the sofa, stunned and confounded by all that I had seen and heard. I arose, and walked to convince myself that I was awake, and in no dream. At this juncture, the door of the boudoir opened, and a servant said to me: "Here comes my master, the Duke de Core." And a man of sixty years, with a noble aspect, advanced; and having given me his hand, craved pardon for having so long kept me waiting.

"I was not in the castle," said the duke, "and I have just returned from the city, where I have been to consult for the health of the Count de Core, my younger brother."

"Is his life in danger?" inquired I.

"No, sir, thanks be to Heaven! But in his youth, ambition had overstretched his imagination, and a very dangerous disease set in, in which he came near dying, and which left in him a kind of delirium and alienation of mind, which continually persuades him that he has only one day to live. That is his insanity."

All was now explained to me.

"Now," pursued the duke, "I will see what I can do for your advancement. I will present you at Versailles."

"I know your goodness to me," said I, "but—"

"What!" interrupted he; "will you renounce the court and the advantages you may expect from it? for by a little assiduity, you can in a dozen years—"

"Ten years lost!" exclaimed I.

"Is it to pay too dear for glory and fortune? Come, young man; let us set out for Versailles."

"No, sir," said I; "I shall start for home, and I pray you receive my warmest thanks."

"That is folly!" cried the duke.

And thinking of the madman's tale, I said to myself: "It is reason."

The next day I departed. With what pleasure I saw once more my old castle of Roche-Bernard, the aged trees of my park, and all the surrounding beauty! I had found again my sisters, my mother, and happiness, which never forsook me; for, eight days afterward, I married Henrietta.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE WOUNDED DOVE.

BY MRS. A. T. ELDRIDGE.

Fly to my bosom, weary, trembling thing,
And I will soothe thy pain;
Against my bosom rest thy wounded wing,
'Twill soon be well again:
Fly to my breast!

I will not harm thee—thy low, mournful cooing
Falls sadly on my ear;
Its thrilling tones, so plaintive and subdued,
Call forth love's stainless tear:
Rest, rest, sweet dove!

Rest on my bosom calmly until morning,
Then I will set thee free;
Thou'lt seek thy home at day's first rosy dawning,
Where thy mate waits for thee:
Thou shalt go home.

How many a heart that bleeds with untold anguish,
A few soft words might heal;
Beneath a diamond crown bright eyes may languish,
A velvet robe may oft conceal
A wounded heart.

Within her nest the dove will find protection—
There's one to love her there;
Whilst many a heart now pines for true affection,
Worn out with grief and care:
There's rest in heaven.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A DELICATE FINANCIAL OPERATION.

BY PHILIP BROMLEY.

"Il y a un Dieu pour les ivrognes" is a French proverb, which means, or is intended to mean, a tipsy bricklayer may fall from a scaffolding thirty feet high, and rise from the pavement unhurt, while a sober gentleman will break his leg in merely stepping from his carriage;—a proverb which the circumstances I am about to relate are intended to illustrate.

Captain Sullivan was seated in his comfortable front parlor enjoying a cigar. His young wife was employed on a crayon portrait of the captain as a memorial for hearts at home, while he was in India with his regiment. No one could have shown greater heroism than Sullivan at that hour. He had just returned from an annoying interview with Mandamus & Tort, his solicitors.

There was a knock at the door, and the landlady entered to inform Captain Sullivan that a gentleman below wished to see him.

"Show him up. I suppose it is nobody but Lawrence," said he.

A young gentleman, not Lawrence, entered the room, and presented a note to the captain. He broke the seal, and read:

"Sir:—Messrs. Mandamus & Tort have assigned their small claim to me for collection. If you will send me sixty pounds by the bearer, I will consider the demand cancelled; otherwise, I do not hesitate to forewarn you of degradation, dishonor and imprisonment.
Yours, etc., SERVICE SUMMONS,
"In behalf of Mandamus & Tort."

"I will return immediately," observed Sullivan, leaving the room, possibly to procure the sixty pounds. Caesar Summons, the bearer of the note, who was thus imprudently left alone with Mrs. Sullivan, was the child of an officer, being the son of Service Summons, Esq., sheriff, who acted "in behalf" of Mandamus & Tort. Mr. Caesar Summons had been transfixed but a few evenings before by the graces of Mrs. Sullivan, having met her walking with her sister and mother, in the Temple Gardens. So deep was his emotion on that occasion, and so conspicuous his attention, that both combined, absolutely drove her from the spot; and Mr. Caesar Summons, throwing away almost a whole cigar, was for that evening miserable.

"Most happy, Miss Sullivan, at the unexpected, and I may add the emphatic delight of this second meeting!" observed Mr. Summons, as the captain left the room. "Really! what!—a picture of your brother, the captain! Fine looking man, upon my honor! I am glad this small sixty pound matter doesn't weigh upon his spirits. He looks as jovial and hearty as the governor after a successful levy. Depend upon it, Miss Sullivan, your brother will turn out a colonel yet!" Mr. C. Summons could not have assumed a tone of more refreshing confidence and patronage had he been commander-in-chief of her majesty's forces. "But, really, I trust the captain doesn't intend to leave us so soon? There must be some means of keeping him!" Mr. Summons intended to speak in a very significant manner.

"You mistake, sir! I am Captain Sullivan's wife!"

"Ah, indeed! Really, I beg pardon!" said Mr. Summons, not in the least disconcerted.

"Do you really think that Mr. Sullivan will not be compelled to depart so soon as he expected?" inquired the lady, taking Mr. Caesar Summons for an army officer, instead of the son of a civil one, and supposing him, from his peculiar style of conversation, to be high in the confidence of the commander-in-chief.

"Not quite so soon as he expected," answered Mr. Summons. "I think I may assure you of that upon my own responsibility."

"I am very happy for your telling me so," said Mrs. Sullivan, forgetting, in her joy at the postponement of her husband's departure, the encounter in the Temple Gardens.

"Not at all—not at all, my dear Mrs. Sullivan. Indeed, I think we can defer your husband's departure for an unlimited time. But I claim no credit for it myself, though I would do more to give you pleasure—a great deal more, I assure you, my dear Mrs. Sullivan." And Mr. Caesar Summons with every word approached nearer to the lady—considerably too near, doubtless, in his audacity, for the captain entered at that moment, and Mr. C. Summons, by some unaccountable process, was thung with his head under the fire grate, his neck in a very uncomfortable position, supported by the edge of an iron fender. There he lay and bled, as the Caesar who existed before him did. There was one excuse for Mr. Caesar Summons's conduct—he had not the remotest idea that the captain would return so soon. As for Sullivan, he was inexcusable; he should have known the folly of committing an assault upon the son of a sheriff, who held against him a claim of sixty pounds. I can only observe, in extenuation of his conduct, that he tenderly assisted his servant in raising the prostrate and bleeding Summons, in placing him on his feet, and in conducting him carefully down stairs to the street door. Half an hour afterwards, there was another knock at the door of Captain Sullivan's front parlor, and Lawrence Hardy, a young barrister, and a friend of the captain, was ushered in.

"Ah, Lawrence, I've been expecting you! I'm afraid I've got myself into a scrape."

"There could be nothing less incomprehensible. What have you been doing?"

"I'm afraid I've injured a sheriff's deputy."

"That's dangerous, indeed. What d'ye have them in your house for?"

"He came to bring me that," said Sullivan, giving his friend Mr. Service Summons's letter.

"Why didn't you pay Messrs. Mandamus and Tort?" asked Hardy, after he had read it.

"I employed them some months ago to negotiate a purchase; they delayed to do it, and perceiving that they would accomplish nothing, I took the business out of their hands, when they presented a bill for fifty pounds for what they had not done, which I refused to pay. I have heard nothing from them until I received that letter. It seems they have assigned it to the sheriff—who charges ten pounds bonus—doubtless in order to employ the whole artillery of their infernal trade (I beg your pardon,) more effectually against me."

"And now you've hurt the sheriff's deputy, they've got a reserve battery in addition. When does your regiment leave?"

"In a week. You don't seriously apprehend that they will attempt to prevent me from joining it?"

"Most assuredly I do. You may anticipate the service of a writ at any time between to-night and to-morrow morning. It's an admirable ground of action."

"It must be prevented at all hazards. Mr. Summons's prediction of dishonor and degradation will be likely to be verified, if I'm prevented from joining my regiment!"

"It is rather satisfactory, but not at all safe, to break a sheriff's nose. It is enacted by our scrupulous statutes, that it can't be done gratis," observed Mr. Hardy.

"No more of that," said the captain, beginning to be seriously alarmed. "You must help me out of this scrape."

"It is too late to do anything to-night, but I will come here in the morning, and we will call on the aggrieved Summons. Perhaps we can build up a bridge of gold, as a substitute for the one you've broken! Don't lose the sheriff's letter; it may be useful."

As Sullivan and Lawrence Hardy ascended the steps of Mr. Service Summons's office on the following morning, a paralyzing hand was laid upon his right shoulder, and a sepulchral voice said:

"You must come along with me, sir!"

The speaker was Mr. Caesar Summons, who was still in a very agitated condition. The blood from his injured nose had meandered down his shirt and waistcoat, leaving both garments more fancifully variegated than the professional insignia of the most imaginative hair-dresser.

"Wait one moment. We are about to see your father upon this subject. Perhaps some arrangement can be made, you know," smilingly observed Mr. Hardy.

The soiled sheriff's son assented, and they entered the office.

"Morning, gentlemen. Very happy to see you. Sit down, if you please," was the pleasant greeting of Mr. S. Summons, who spoke as agreeably, and smiled as extatically, as if he were not confronting the man whom the law held responsible for a compound fracture of a very important member of Summons junior.

"Will you have the goodness to show me the assignment which Messrs. Mandamus & Tort made to you of their claim against Captain Sullivan?" asked Lawrence.

"Certainly, with all my heart," said Mr. Summons, with a smile so gracious and cheering, that the captain began to be sorry that he had been instrumental in defacing Caesar's physiognomy. "Here it is, gentlemen; made purely from disinterested motives of advancing the interest of all parties." And as he handed Lawrence the assignment, he passed the captain the morning paper in the politest manner in the world.

Mr. Hardy read the assignment carefully, and then ejaculated the very French proverb with which I commenced.

"Il y a un Dieu pour les ivrognes!" Sullivan, there is certainly some good genius watching over your affairs. This assignment is void from beginning to end, notwithstanding it is drawn by those astute rascals, Mandamus & Tort.

"I thank the genius, whoever he is, for it," said the captain.

"This paper is useless," said Lawrence, addressing the sheriff.

"I rather think it is all correct," observed the sheriff, stretching out his right leg, and patting his calf with an encouraging, and not at all alarmed, air.

"It expresses no consideration, and isn't worth the paper it is written on!" Lawrence's tone somewhat affected Mr. Summons.

"It must be correct, gentlemen. Mr. Mandamus himself drew the instrument."

"Send for him—send for them both, sir!"

In a very short half hour the astute firm made its appearance. Both partners had received an intimation of the purpose for which they were summoned, and both smiled with enviable amiability as they noted the youth of the gentleman who contested the assignment.

"It seems these gentlemen question the validity of this instrument," smirked the sheriff, handing Mandamus the assignment.

"Ah," observed Mandamus, taking it; while Tort widened his mouth, and continued to smile with great industry.

Mr. Mandamus's face was in a glow of satisfaction, as he handed the paper to his junior partner. Mr. Tort read it over carefully, and his voice rung like glass, as he remarked, complacently:

"I don't think the gentlemen will find fault with it!"

"Gentlemen," said Lawrence, calmly, "I hope to convince you that this is a financial operation which won't stand legal tests. Now, Mr. Mandamus, as a professional man and a lawyer, you must know that that instrument, stating that you have assigned to Mr. Summons all your right, title and interest to a large sum of money without expressing any consideration whatever therefor, would be held void in any court of law or equity in England!"

The astute firm opened their eyes. Tort looked daggers at Mandamus, who had drawn the paper, but prudence kept his lips closed. Mr. Mandamus's cordiality and happy flow of spirits suddenly vanished, as the conviction crossed his mind that the senior partner had bungled in "a very delicate operation."

During the temporary embarrassment of the astute firm, Mr. Summons senior whispered to Mr. Tort, who soon after spoke:

"We are really very sorry, gentlemen—very sorry, indeed—that this little informality in the assignment should have produced this discussion. If you will consent to waive it, we will discontinue another little personal proceeding against Captain Sullivan for an assault, of the severity of which Mr. Caesar Summons's present appearance bears sufficient testimony."

"We shall waive nothing!" said Lawrence.

The firm had now regained its accustomed geniality, and Mandamus rubbed his hands with an air of intense self-satisfaction.

"Very sorry," said Tort. "Nothing but our stern conviction of duty could force us to such unpleasant and distasteful measures. Mr. Summons, execute the writ!"

"Wait one moment!" interposed Lawrence. "Here is a document which I intend to present for your consideration. It is a letter received by Captain Sullivan last evening, purporting to be written by Mr. Service Summons. Here, in the language of the reporters, Mr. Hardy read the letter. "Now, gentlemen, if you proceed one step further in this matter, I shall immediately take the proper measures for having you all indicted under the statute for sending threatening letters, for purposes of extortion!"

The several jaws of the astute firm fell again, and Mandamus looked over his spectacles at the sheriff, as if he would annihilate him, if it were in his power. Suddenly a bright idea pierced the brain of the senior partner, and he whispered to his junior partner, who said, smilingly, as if he had discovered something:

"We presume—as our names do not appear on the document, as you style it, sir—that you do not pretend to hold us liable under the statute!"

"Certainly not! As-suredly not!" said the senior, rubbing his hands complacently, and emphasizing strongly the first syllables of the first and third adverbs.

"The letter is subscribed 'Service Summons, in behalf of Mandamus & Tort,' which makes you amenable as principals, and Mr. Summons only as agent."

The looks which the four eyes of the astute firm now bestowed on Mr. Service Summons were too much for that functionary, who disappeared incontinently within a back office.

"Captain Sullivan proposes to pay you ten pounds," continued Lawrence, "for your services in the business he entrusted to you, for which you will do me the favor to write a receipt to full."

The firm was a philosophic one. Tort, particularly, had a vein of unexaggerated tenderness for a man who could meet him so boldly and successfully at every point. A rational and wise man was Tort—so, with one of his most winning smiles, he handed Hardy a receipt for ten pounds; and with another, still more benign, received the notes and deposited them in his waistcoat pocket.

"No offence, I trust, gentlemen!" observed the astute firm, as it opened the door, and its several coat-tails waved in the morning air.

Caesar Summons's nose was well in a week, and ever after he was a more cautious deputy. Mr. Summons, senior, was never afterwards considered available by Messrs. Mandamus & Tort in arranging delicate financial speculations. Captain Sullivan joined his regiment, and was promoted to a colonelcy, as Caesar Summons had predicted; and Lawrence Hardy continued during his life to render himself useful, by extricating his friends from delicate financial operations.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Dedicated to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 100,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

ELISHA SMITH, JR.

LATE CHIEF ENGINEER OF THE FIRE DEPARTMENT.

We present herewith a fine portrait of the late Chief of the Boston Fire Department, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, from a fine photograph by Messrs. Massey, Silsbee and Case of this city. The recent death of Mr. Smith, the general sorrow felt for his loss, invests this record of his features with mournful interest. Elisha Smith, Jr., was born in the town of Upton, county of Franklin, Massachusetts, Dec. 22, 1814. He learned his trade with his father, who was a carpenter, and afterwards came to Boston, where he found employment as a stair-builder, which business he continued till the time of his death. Married in 1836, he left a wife and daughter to mourn his loss. In 1837 he joined the Fire Department, and served in various capacities until 1854. At the great firemen's meeting held in Faneuil Hall, Dec. 5, 1856, to concert measures for purchasing a lot of ground in a suburban cemetery, "for the use of the past, present and future members of the Fire Department," in the centre of which the remains of the late chief are to be deposited, Thomas L. Drew, Esq., after a brief sketch of the life of Mr. Smith, paid the following eloquent tribute to his memory: "How well he filled his important post, from the moment of his choice until the day of his death, the demonstration made at his funeral eminently displayed. It was no idle parade—no heartless show—it was demonstrative of the outgushing of the hearts of all the firemen in the city towards a highly honored man and a most exemplary officer. That he was so no surer evidence could be produced. That he was a kind husband, those who were witness to the poignant grief of his bereaved widow could never doubt. That he was a brave and noble fireman, the presence on that occasion of so many of his associates and brothers in danger was also undeniable proof. That he was a man—firm, upright and bold in his integrity—the appearance on that occasion of the ex-members of No. 13, who were disbanded under him, and who exhibited in their voluntary attendance the high regard they paid to that integrity, although it influenced their interests, was a most gratifying evidence. It was one of the highest gratifications to his family and relatives as well as to the department, who honored the 'Ex-Thirteen' for their noble conduct. Those who were with the deceased on his death-bed, and in his last moments, could well testify that, besides the possession of the virtues which had so much dignified him as a man, he was a true Christian, and that he died in the full hope of a glorious immortality. When he was told by his physician that it was no longer possible that he could recover, he summoned his friends around him, and spoke to them the words of Christian comfort and advice. He was asked if he was willing to die, and he said—I hope and trust that I am. It was a matter of desirableness, Mr. Drew said, that every member of the Boston Fire Department had been present on the solemn occasion, to hear the words of advice and admonition uttered by the dying man; none of their number could have failed to appreciate them, and to feel the more deeply thereafter engraved on his heart the injunction—Be ye also ready. Many present here to-night were of the acquaintance of the deceased, and none of them would be for a moment disinclined to bear their testimony of him as a man in whom many virtues concentrated—one whose kindness and charity were seldom equalled. Mr. Drew hoped they would all study the duty of following his noble example, and awake at the Great Day as he would awake, to an eternity of happiness, and that they would so conduct themselves as that their end on earth should be like his." Mayor Rice and others spoke in the same strain of heartfelt eulogy. The words of praise thus spoken will be cherished by the gallant brethren of the departed fireman, and by the near and dear ones whom he has left to mourn his loss. The example of gallantry and devotion to duty set by the late chief, will long be cherished by the department, and incite them to emulate his example. The efficiency and high character of the department has already extended its fame to other lands, and it is not unlikely that its organization may serve as a model even in the older European countries.

E. SMITH, JR., LATE CHIEF OF THE BOSTON FIRE DEPARTMENT.

SCENE IN A MAGISTRATE'S COURT, OUDE.

In the last number of our last volume, we presented a portrait of her majesty the dowager queen of Oude, and we now give on this page a scene in a magistrate's court in Oude, which is filled with striking oriental figures. The costumes of the people of Oude and their physiognomies contrast strongly with that of the British official who is seated at his table listening to the evidence and prepared to pronounce judgment. Behind and around are grouped a bevy of native officers. A scribe or reporter is seated on the floor with a formidable roll of paper before him, while a basket on his right is filled with documents. Another official appears to be reading an indictment. The prisoner, under guard of a soldier, is heavily ironed, but stands sullen and self-possessed. Other prisoners and other guards are in attendance. The attitudes of all the personages in this scene are very natural and effective. The native races of the East complain bitterly of the sort of justice administered to them by Europeans, though perhaps, after all, they are as well treated by them as by their native rulers. Cruelty is eminently characteristic of the orientals, and the justice that is tempered with mercy is rarely found among them. From the Chinese and Japanese, with their refinements of torture, to the Turks of the West, with their coarse and savage cruelty, there seems to be little exception to the rule of the oppression of the poor by the rich, of extortion, corruption and extensive severity. The British administration of such provinces as have fallen under their sovereignty or protection, instead of deriving its character from the usages of Christendom seems to have been infected by the example and neighborhood of barbarism. More than once have the cruelties, authorized or winked at by men high in authority, been brought before parliament and raised a clamor in Great Britain. But the outcry has subsided, and matters have gone on pretty much the same as ever. There is unquestionably less abuse of power now than formerly; but the dominant race is but too apt to tyrannize over the inferior. Nor can we inveigh against such oppression with a very good grace, when we reflect how much the Indians of America have suffered from contact with the Anglo-Saxon race on this continent. The Indians of the East and the Indians of the West both have sad stories to tell of the white man. The power of the Anglo-Saxon race is extending rapidly in the East, and every day the western influence gains new accessions or western arms achieve new conquests. The whole political and social aspect of Asia will be greatly changed in the course of the next half century.

COURT SCENE IN OUDE, INDIA.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- M. D.—The motto of the English royal arms—Dieu et mon droit, that is, God and my right—was first taken by Richard I., to intimate he was the vassal of God only; afterwards assumed by Edward III., when he first claimed the kingdom of France.
- A. V.—The consumption of gas in London is nearly 11,000,000 cubic feet in 24 hours.
- L. F.—The great organ in the Abbey of St. Denis, France, has 6000 pipes.
- BRONX.—Up Guards, and at them! were the words attributed to the Duke of Wellington at Waterloo. But he could not remember himself having made use of any such expression.
- THEATRE.—Pantomimes, or dramas, in which action supplies the place of language, were invented by two Romans of obscure station, named Pylades and Bathylus, in the reign of Augustus.
- MARIA S.—Formerly women could not legally marry till they had upon a complete set of bed furniture; hence the term spinster, still in legal use.
- MEXICAN.—Glass bells are a modern invention. In 1841, one was cast in Sweden six feet in diameter.
- W. T.—An excellent poem, but necessarily declined on account of its length. We wish our correspondents would confine themselves to at longest six or eight stanzas.
- D. W.—Arab, Barb and Turkish horses ran longer distances, and carried heavier weights, than the horses of the present day, although smaller than they are.
- C. B. S.—Icebergs have been measured in the Atlantic, which were three hundred feet high.
- H. J.—The reason that Nantucket has so equable a climate is, that it is surrounded by the sea, which diminishes the heat and mitigates the cold.
- QUAKER.—The average fall of rain each year in the tropics is ninety-five inches; in the temperate zone, thirty-five.
- A. REACRATER.—You have lost your bet; for there is a liquid form of matter in which iron will float, and that is quicksilver.
- Q.—The strength of a horse as compared to that of a man, is just five times as much; or one horse equal to five men.
- L. C. Z.—With a quantity of powder equal to two-thirds the weight of the ball, a twenty-four pounder will throw a shot about four miles.
- O. M.—Terra-cotta means, literally, baked clay.
- HENRY C.—Yes; for it has been proved that a person under water can hear a bell struck in the open air not far above the surface.
- J. C.—New York has more newspapers than any other State in the Union; Pennsylvania is next; Ohio next; Massachusetts next. The total number of papers published in this country, as near as is known, is 3764.
- A. M.—The minor children of any one duly naturalized, if dwelling in the United States, are legally citizens.
- STRONT.—The first library destroyed at Alexandria, Egypt, contained but 400,000 volumes. It is the second one you refer to, when the Saracens took the city. The library destroyed by them numbered 700,000 volumes, and served them for firewood for six months.
- L. H. W.—The word aborigine is applied to any people whose origin is not known, that being its actual signification.

T. B. PETERSON'S BOOKS.—We have frequently called attention to the handsome style in which this enterprising publisher issues his various works, particularly to his elegant library edition of Dickens. We have before us several volumes which we have already noticed, but to which we again call the attention of our readers. Here is the duodecimo edition of "Little Dorrit," Vol. I., splendidly illustrated; next, "Mrs. Widdifield's Cookery Book," which has had an extraordinary sale; splendidly bound and gilt. An acceptable present to any lady. The "Humors of Falconbridge," a collection of mirth-moving stories, illustrated, and welcome at any season, and "Major Jones's Courtship," also illustrated, a standard classic of American humor. The name of T. B. Peterson on a title-page is sure to give currency to the book that bears it, for he is an excellent judge of the popular taste.

These books may be found at Shepard, Clark and Co.'s.

SPLINTERS.

- .... Mr. Dexter, the sculptor of Gen. Warren's statue to be erected in Roxbury, is entirely a self-taught man.
- .... Wayne county, New York, is said to produce more fruit than any other twenty counties in that State.
- .... Three girls in Texas went out visiting, lately, and in course of a week came back with Indian husbands.
- .... The total number of inhabitants in the city of St. Louis is in the neighborhood of 130,000.
- .... J. W. Laneagan, the actor, has fitted up a theatre in St. John's Hall, in the city of St. John, New Brunswick.
- .... Men must pursue things which are just at present, and leave the future to a divine Providence.
- .... Mr. Oliphant, author of the "Russian Shores of the Black Sea," has gone to Nicaragua to see that country.
- .... A son of Thomas Hood, the poet and humorist, has lately written a volume of sketches, in prose and poetry.
- .... Deer have been plenty in Falmouth, Massachusetts, this year, so that venison cannot be dear there.
- .... The sugar crop in the West Indies promises to be a good one. Sugar has been a scarce article lately.
- .... The friendship which is founded on a love of virtue is the happiest as well as the most permanent.
- .... Hon. Caleb Cushing, it is said, will practise law in Washington at the close of President Pierce's term.
- .... There are 242 Unitarian congregations in England, and 313 of the same denomination in all Great Britain.
- .... Ennius, the Latin poet, said, "a sure friend is discerned in an assure matter," according to Cicero.
- .... By an imperial ukase, Protestant and Roman Catholic chaplains are placed on equal footing in the Russian army.
- .... A companionable woman is always pretty—a fact that plain ladies would do well to remember.
- .... The Liverpool Times compliments our countrymen on their ready acquiescence to the expressed will of the majority.
- .... An advertiser in a city paper commends his "cool and airy" rooms to boarders. Rather cool for January.
- .... He who has acquired a judicious and sympathizing friend may be said to have doubled his mental resources.
- .... Oysters ought to be cheap here. They are a drug in New York—but a drug very pleasant to take.
- .... He who must needs have company must needs have sometimes bad company. Be able to be alone.
- .... There is a domestic society in Providence, Rhode Island, which watches baker's bread when they need it.

THE WASTE OF WEALTH.

Just now the papers are ringing with denunciations of social extravagance, and we ourselves have done our part in protesting against this great evil, productive as it is of consequences that will overshadow the future like a black pall. We have not yet made our mind which is the greater evil, avarice or extravagance,—the one locking up wealth that might produce incalculable good to the community; the other stimulating branches of industry useless in themselves, and, by the force of example, sweeping into a wild vortex all strata of society.

But, in justice to our countrymen and countrywomen, we must remember that extravagance is not a vice of this country and this age, and that it has exhibited its folly on even a greater scale in other times and in other lands. All wealthy communities, even the soberest, have, in times of a plethora of prosperity, made themselves ridiculous by spending money wildly and recklessly on some prevalent taste. Take, for example, Holland and the tulip mania. The Dutch are a sober, thrifty people, and flower-raising is generally ranked among the cheapest of recreations; yet this people made this pursuit the basis of the most ruinous expenditure. Were not the record of the tulip mania well authenticated, we should treat its whole history as a fable. Gold, houses and lands were often bartered away for a single bulb, because it produced a flower with a new stripe or a new shade, and yet a whole bed of scentless tulips was not really worth a handful of fragrant roses that might be bought for a penny.

In 1635, many persons were known to invest a fortune of 100,000 florins in the purchase of forty tulip roots. A trader of Harlem paid one-half his fortune for a single bulb. A famous tulip of Amsterdam was bought for 4600 florins, a new carriage, two gray horses, and a complete set of silver-mounted harness.

Many ludicrous incidents occurred during the prevalence of the Tulipomania, which was, in fact, an epidemic mental disease. A travelling English botanist happened to see a tulip-root lying in the conservatory of a wealthy Dutchman. Being ignorant of its quality, and as curious as a Yankee, he took out his knife and began to slice it up, until he had reduced it to half its original size. Suddenly the owner pounced upon him and roared out: "What are you doing there? Do you know that's an Admiral Van der Eyck?" "Thank you for the name," replied the unconcerned visitor, as he proceeded to make an entry in his note-book. "Pray, are these same admirals common in this country?" "You shall find out!" shouted the infuriated Dutchman; and seizing his guest by the collar, he dragged him before a magistrate. There the poor man soon found out to his consternation that "these same admirals" were worth four thousand florins apiece; and he had ample time to reflect bitterly on the popular mania and on his own thoughtlessness when he was committed to prison, there to remain until he could give security for the payment of the enormous sum demanded by the bereaved tulipomania.

This mania in Holland produced in the end terrific results; "substantial merchants were reduced almost to beggary, and many a representative of a noble line saw the fortunes of his house ruined beyond redemption." Let us, as a people, profit by the record of such examples.

HONORABLE CONDUCT.

Pope tells us that an honest man is the noblest work of God, and we are glad to offset the stories of fraud and peculation of late so rife, by citing examples of a different character. A correspondent, writing from Lexington, Ky., furnishes one of these. He says:—"Thirty years ago, Mr. J. S. Davis, of your city, borrowed 1 of the late Nathan Jarvis, then also of your city, a sum of money. Mr. Jarvis became afterwards a very prominent citizen of New Orleans, La., where he was one of the founders of the free school, a city father, and president of the New England Society, besides being a prominent member of all the benevolent societies. He met with an accidental death from the explosion of the boiler of a steamboat. His widow and two daughters found a home here in the interior of Kentucky, where Mr. Davis has taken the pains to seek them out, in order to return this money with thirty years' interest. And he says, 'When I borrowed it, I hoped soon to be able to return it, but I struggled long with poverty. Fortune having recently favored me, enables me now to pay it, feeling very grateful for the use of it, particularly as I have never been reminded in any way that I owed it.' He was undoubtedly the only living person that knew of the existence of this debt."

FROM FAR AND NEAR!—We should be worse than ungrateful not to chronicle our earnest thanks for the prompt alacrity with which our friends have renewed their subscriptions to "Ballou's Pictorial." We also desire to kindly greet the large number of new friends, whose names swell our subscription list. From far and near, subscriptions have poured into our office by each successive mail, until we are induced to ask, what state, city or town is there in this far-extended republic, which we do not reach?

OUR LARGE ILLUSTRATIONS.—The new mode which we have adopted of binding up our large engravings preserves them in the volumes in the most perfect manner, without injuring the face of these elegant scenes. Such a series of mammoth pictures was never before attempted, either in Europe or America. Their popularity is unbounded.

ALMANACS FOR 1857.—John P. Jewett & Co. have published in beautiful style the Boston Almanac and the Juvenile Almanac for the present year, both of them elaborately illustrated.

THE FLAG FOR FOUR CENTS!—Cheapness being the order of the day, we have reduced the retail price of "The Flag of our Union" to FOUR CENTS per copy.

MARINE VIEW, BOSTON HARBOR.

It affords us great satisfaction to lay before our readers the magnificent marine view which occupies the whole of pages 56 and 57 of the present number. It was drawn and engraved expressly for our paper; and Mr. Hill, the artist, has certainly exerted himself to the utmost in producing a picture, striking in local fidelity, and fairly meeting all the requirements of artistic taste. We have no hesitation in affirming this to be the best large wood engraving of a sea-piece ever executed in this country or in Europe. There are boldness and vigor in the detail, and a highly pleasing general effect. The principal vessels introduced are portraits. On the right we have that splendid barque, the Neapolitan, under canvas; on the other side, a Canard steamer, outward bound, with the British flag at the stern, and the stars and stripes at the bow, firing a gun to announce her departure. The "Forest City" steamer is seen in the middle distance. The crowd of shipping in port is well delineated. Across the water in the foreground, a row-boat, fully manned, gives liveliness to the scene. The profile of the city is accurately delineated, and many striking localities will be readily recognized. On the left rise the domes of the Custom-House, near the water, and the State-House crowning the outline of the city. India, Long, and other prominent wharves, are also seen. On the right are the spires of the Gothic church in Hanover Street, and of Christ Church, so celebrated for its beauty. This beautiful and costly gem of art is, however, but an earnest of the efforts we are making to ensure the perfection of our illustrated journal, in return for its vast popularity.

VIEW OF CHELSEA.—The view of Chelsea on page 53, was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, the station-point of our artist being at East Boston. On the left is seen the Naval Hospital, immediately below which is the bridge connecting Chelsea with Charlestown. Near the foreground is one of the fine ferry-boats which ply between Chelsea and this city. On a commanding eminence, surmounted by a flag, is the new Marine Hospital. The building is as yet unfinished, and the grounds are not yet laid out, but the intention is to make the latter highly ornamental. The site is an admirable one.

THE PRIZES.—Let all of our friends engaged in getting up clubs send in the names as fast as obtained, accompanied with the money. The list can always be added to at the same price, and all will be duly counted in the credit of the person sending, till the first day of February. There is no discount on prizes paid in gold!

REMARKABLE.—There has been only one death among the children in the Boston Female Asylum in a period of three years.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. James Evans to Mrs. Flora Henry; by Rev. Mr. Twombly, Mr. Hanson Graham to Miss Martha J. Lewis; by Rev. Mr. Stowe, Mr. Collin Cook to Miss Elizabeth Matthews; by Rev. Mr. Killeb, Mr. Allen McLeod to Miss Louisa W. Stearns, of Paris, Me.; by Rev. Mr. Bartol, Mr. Frederic L. Ballard to Miss Anne J. Campbell; by Rev. Mr. Miner, Mr. Edward Capen to Miss Rhoda Allen; by Rev. Dr. Stow, Mr. William W. Laird to Miss Anne J. White; at Roxbury, by Rev. Mr. Bowler, Mr. William R. Jackson to Miss Elizabeth A. Attridge; at Cambridge, by Rev. Mr. Bradley, Mr. Charles C. H. W. Hunt to Miss Eliza A. Canney; at Salem, by Rev. Mr. Hopkin, Rev. Charles White, of Berryville, Clark county, Va., to Miss Mary F. Felt; at Essex, by Rev. Mr. Bacon, Mr. Albert Larkin to Miss Peter Jones; at Bedford, by Rev. Mr. Coggin, Mr. Albert Perry, of North Andover, to Miss Mary W. Perley; at Newburyport, by Rev. Mr. Dimmick, Mr. Benjamin Austin to Miss Ruth Ann Chase; at Clinton, by Rev. Mr. Bowers, Mr. J. V. Moore to Miss Henrietta A. Goodale; at Plymouth, by Rev. Mr. Edwards, Mr. George Benson to Miss Caroline E. Brown; at Fall River, by Rev. Mr. Porter, Mr. David Bradley to Miss Emma Deedy; at New Bedford, by Rev. Mr. Rice, Mr. James M. Comstock, of Toledo, Ohio, to Miss Lydia L. Watkin, of New Bedford.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mr. John Henry Garner, 23; Mr. John H. Weed, 51; Miss Fanny S. Gilman, 19; Samuel Davis, Esq., 51; Miss Emma Augusta Frost, 17; Madam Mary Barry, relict of the late Major Louis Barry de Belleville, 90.—At East Boston, Mrs. Cynthia Charlotte Parsons, 57; Mr. William White, 67.—At South Boston, Mr. Nehemiah A. Henderson, 56.—At Charlestown, Mrs. Sarah A. Hall, 27.—At West Roxbury, Mrs. Fannie Rice, 20.—At Jamaica Plain, Betsy Perry, 69.—At Dorchester, Mr. Jacob Foster, 50.—At Brighton, Mrs. Mary Hill, 57.—At Lynn, Mr. John H. Sullivan, 23.—At Salem, Mrs. Mary P., widow of the late William Arrer, 56.—At South Scituate, Mr. Consider Howland, 96, a Revolutionary pensioner.—At North Bridgewater, Mr. Hannah H. Joslyn, 43.—At Manchester, Mr. William Ringham, 66.—At Newburyport, Capt. Joseph C. Hunt, 57.—At West Newbury, Mr. William Vicker, 75.—At Plymouth, Mrs. Mary Finney, 80.—At Fall River, Mrs. Ruth Ann Slade, 25.—At New Bedford, Mrs. Sarah A. Coggeshall, 39.—At Worcester, Mr. James G. Priest, 57.—At Springfield, Mrs. Martha, wife of Caleb Rice, Esq.—At Somerset, Dec. 4, Gideon Chase; and 5th, Phoebe, widow of the late Stephen Chase, both in their 90th year.—At Enfield, Mrs. Sarah Cary, 80.—At Nantucket, Capt. Frederick Swan, 78; Mrs. Sarah Long, 88.—At Providence, R. I., Mrs. Susan, wife of Mr. Holmes Greenwood, 94.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary miscellany of noble character of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and anecdotes, by the best and successful authors, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $3 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " " 20 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the American copy gratis.

* One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $2.
Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 WINTER STREET, BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; R. A. Duncan, 122 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roy, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AT REST.

BY G. O. W.

O, pleasant words! O, pleasant thought to me,
So long a wanderer on life's stormy sea;
When gazing back into the misty past,
Where joys and sorrows have their shadows cast:
When cheering hopes revive my weary breast,
How sweet to think that I am now at rest.

At rest! How bright the truth—how glad the thought—
How pure the joy—but, O, how dearly bought!
My ardent boyhood, with its hopes and fears,
Has passed away, and brought maturer years.
Farewell, old ocean! to thy billowy breast
Resign me now, for I would be at rest.

When tossed with anguish on a bed of pain:
When wandering fancies racked my fevered brain:
When trembling even at the gates of death,
And life hung wavering on a feeble breath,
My thoughts were wandering in the sunny West—
I dreamed of home, and longed to be at rest.

At rest and happy? No! that hope were vain
In this cold world, where sin and sorrow reign;
But gentle sunbeams sometimes light my way,
And change my cheerless night to summer's day;
Their light is feeble, but it gives me zest—
It lulls my spirit, and I am at rest.

TO A YOUTHFUL FRIEND.

As through the wood some pure and crystal brook,
Low murmuring, ripples on its peaceful way—
In which, if thy young heart should chance to look,
They should see only native purity:

So may thy life glide on! Do thou aspire,
And all that life with noble deeds adorn;
Then shall thy spirit, answering God's desire,
Soar heavenward to the chambers of the morn.—WM. WINTER.

BLESSINGS IN DISGUISE.

In losing fortune, many a lucky elf
Has found himself;
As all our mortal bitters are designed
To brace the mind,
And renovate its healthy tone, the wise
Their sorest trials hail as blessings in disguise.

HORACE SMITH.

YOUTHFUL TEARS.

The tear down childhood's cheek that flows
Is like the dew-drop on the rose;
When next the summer breeze comes by
And waves the bush, the flower is dry.—SCOTT.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

All the heroes of the European revolutions of 1848 are not crushed. General Klapka, formerly commander of the Hungarian fortress of Comorn, has lately been elected a member of the Grand Council of State of the canton of Geneva, Switzerland—an event which has caused excessive dissatisfaction in the Austrian cabinet. . . . A man bedizened with jewelry makes a ridiculous figure. Yet the rage for jewelry has infected the French dandies, and they now wear gold vest buttons as large as an American quarter of a dollar. . . . We never drop into the Boston Theatre of an evening without a kindly thought of the veteran manager, Mr. Barry, whose conduct of that splendid establishment evinces taste, tact and liberality. This theatre alone is enough to justify the claim of our city to the title of the modern Athens. . . . That was a splendid chestnut saddle-mare that just dashed by our window—a perfect picture. Somebody says that the points of a horse go in triplets—three things long—ear, chest and forearm; three things short—bones of the tail, hind legs and back, and three things large—the face, the breast, and the croup. . . . We have just been reading a report of the proceedings of a Woman's Rights meeting. The inadequacy of employment for females is a serious matter, and engages much attention. There are certainly many avenues of employment which they might and ought to occupy. The Home Journal says: "More profitable female employment is within the patronage of the women themselves than of any government in Christendom. But then, women, to deserve it, must professionally fit themselves for it, and not expect to be preferred by their own sex merely because they are women; for this, they know, is contrary to nature." . . . Statistics are red reading, as we suppose most of our readers are apt to acknowledge; yet a few figures will sometimes claim our attention, and it is gratifying to notice in the report of the secretary of the United States treasury, that the foreign trade of the country for the last treasury year shows a balance in favor of the U. States of $12,324,976. . . . The "Mysteries of the People," by Sue, now in the course of publication at Paris, has already yielded its author $100,000. This eclipses Mrs. Stowe. . . . We hear sorry accounts of Vestrali's opera speculation in Mexico. One of the prima donnas eloped, two musical ladies, infuriated by rivalry, had a pitched battle at the wings, and retained specimens of each other's hair after the combat, while the treasury was empty. Alas! that such discords should enter musical fraternities! . . . Elizabeth Barrett Browning, whose "Aurora Leigh" is just now eliciting warm commendations from the English and American presses, is the most vigorous female poet of the age. . . . Our friends in the neighboring town of Dorechester are rejoicing over the successful inauguration of their Athenaeum. John G. Nazzari, Esq., is president of the society. . . . We noticed a curious error of the press the other day, the "Home for Indigent Females" being spoken of as the Home for "Indignant" Females. We fancy it would take rather a large institution to accommodate all of the latter. . . . The heroines of Italian opera are not very amiable or exemplary characters. Mrs. Elvira, Mrs. Norma, Mrs. Borgia and La Traviata, are not exactly ladies whose acquaintance one would like to cultivate in private life. . . . We perceive that General Tom Thumb has sailed for Europe on a professional tour. How capricious the world is! They run after one individual because he is great, and after another because he is little. Mankind are ever rushing to extremes. One must be a giant or a pigmy to create a sensation. . . . As we saw, a few minutes since, a beautiful lady sweep into Mayer's in all the amplitude of fashionable silks, we thought with bitter indignation of the anonymous libeller, who asserted that hoops made a woman look like a perambulating sugar boghead done up in mud. . . . Another insolent fellow, a Frenchman, has invented a writing ink, black and brilliant for a time, but disappearing at the end of three or four months. He calls this the "ladies' ink," thereby intimating that they make promises and professions on paper they do not choose to be reminded of afterwards. . . . It was a pretty thought of a French writer, speaking of Madame Rachel's library of showily-bound books in her house at Paris: "Not one of these books seems to have been opened—they are books only, not friends." . . . We have mentioned before, that the Athenaeum Exhibition just closed contained two splendid portraits of horses by Rosa Bonheur. Well, the gentleman who paid eight thousand dollars for her "Horse Fair," cleared fifty thousand dollars by exhibiting it in England. . . . Happening into Carew's the other day, and noticing some fine designs for marble monuments, we were reminded of one of the ceremonies attending the inauguration of the Emperor of China. A stone-cutter appears with specimens of the choicest marbles, and says: "Choose, O, Celestial Emperor, beneath which thy bones shall one day rest." This is the skeleton at the Egyptian feast. . . . We see by the papers that there is some talk of refitting the line of battle ship Pennsylvania. She was built at an enormous expense to the government, and has made just one voyage from Philadelphia to Norfolk, where she has been used ever since as a receiving ship. . . . That was a good idea of Mr. Barry to unite the whole Ravel troupe at the Boston Theatre. They are imitable performers in their line. . . . Philadelphia will soon have a rival to the St. Nicholas, New York, in the shape of a magnificent hotel to be erected on the Butler estate, Philadelphia, which was sold in September last to Wm. P. Petridge, Esq., for the sum of $225,000. . . . Marsden has painted some capital cattle-pieces, some of which may be seen at Dale's, in Tremont Row, and bids fair, we think, to take a very high rank as a delineator of animals—not the highest branch of art, to be sure, but still a very agreeable and popular one. . . . We observe by our foreign files, that the mild air of Egypt has quite reanimated the declining health of Rachel, and her physicians give strong hopes of her once more returning to the Parisian stage. . . . The culture of silk cotton, introduced from Mexico, has been commenced in Texas. Col. Random, at Fort Bend, recently sold five bales of it at twenty cents per pound. This is a new staple. . . . Kansas has as large an extent of territory as England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland added together. . . . Ingenious and scientific men are occupied in trying to discover the means of warming houses by gas. Cooking by gas is already rendered practicable. We find no trouble in warming our sanctum by one of Mr. Shaw's gas stoves. . . . A bluff son of the sea calls the navigation of the streets by the ladies, "a great circle sailing." He deserves to have his ears served as he does his compass. . . . Since we reduced the price of "The Flag of our Union" to four cents per copy, our edition has rapidly increased in all directions. . . . A Canadian judge has decided, that inasmuch as lotteries are illegal in Canada, lottery tickets are there valueless, and that, consequently, the stealing of them is no crime. This sounds logical enough, but it isn't exactly square with our ideas of equity. . . . Fresh Pond is in excellent condition for skating just now, and is visited daily by large numbers, who delight in this exhilarating sport. . . . Illinois promises to become a sugar-producing State. We see it stated that there will be one hundred acres of Chinese sugar-cane raised in Wabash county the coming year. . . . An imitable artist is Frost, meaning Jack. The other morning this sharp gentleman covered the large plate glass windows of our sanctum with sweeping scrolls and foliage, that none of our artists could excel. His pictures were worthy of being perpetuated. Why don't our friends, Masury, Silsbee & Case, ever photograph a window-pane on a frosty morning? . . . In the peaceful occupations of art, science and literature, there must needs be the secret of the Elixir of Life. Look at Titian painting to the very verge of a century, and Humboldt in extreme age, still brilliant and profound, and our Washington Irving in his eighth decade, but with no decadence of his brilliant powers! . . . Photographs, daguerotypes and ambrotypes have almost, if not quite, ruined miniature-painting—that exquisite branch of art, which will be known to succeeding generations only in the carefully preserved specimens of its great masters. . . . The Chinese authorities, we see, have lately been putting to death a Roman Catholic missionary, charged with exciting insurrection, torturing him for days with a savage cruelty aggravated by ingenuity. There is certainly a broad streak of the demon in Chinese nature. . . . Whatever difference of opinion there may be with regard to the justice of Gen. Walker's course, we cannot but admire his determination, and the Spartan bravery of his followers in Nicaragua. In the words of a certain London cockney:—"There's no race equal to the Hango-Saxon." . . . The mock combats of the stage are not always unattended with danger. The other day, while E. L. Davenport was playing Richard III. in New York, he came near losing an eye from a stroke of Richmond's sword. . . . The use of stimulants and narcotics, except under the direction of a physician, cannot be too strongly discountenanced. A young lady in Austin, Texas, who had been in the habit of using chloroform to put herself to sleep, was found one morning lately dead in her bed. . . . The red men of the West still elude the traditional usages of their fathers. A band of Sioux warriors lately burned a Chippewa prisoner at the stake, and he met his fate with the heroic firmness of the "son of Alno-moke." . . . That magnificent project, the Transatlantic Telegraph Company, by means of which we shall read the London news of one day the next morning at the breakfast-table, requires a capital of $1,750,000. . . . The people of Saratoga Springs may apply for a city charter this winter. It gives one theague, though, to think of Saratoga Springs at this season of the year. . . . The United States corvette Constellation dashed into the Golden Horn the other day, and startled the sluggish Turks with the roar of her guns. But it was a friendly salute, and the deep-mouthed batteries of Topkane soon did honor to the ever glorious stars and stripes. . . . Our women's rights friends ought certainly to send missionaries among the Arabs, for the Arab wives are absolute slaves to their lords, doing all their drudgery. . . . When John B. Oough is not lecturing on temperance, he is raising corn and peaches on his farm at Boylston, Massachusetts. . . . Can our readers fully realize the idea that telescopic experiments reveal the fact of there being eighteen millions of stars in the Milky way? According to Humboldt, there are not in the whole heavens more than about eight thousand stars visible to the naked eye. . . . In a book of antiquity, which we have just laid down, we see it stated that one Paoutshe, a learned Chinaman, published a dictionary of the Chinese language eleven hundred years before Christ. That was a good while ago! . . . The thermometer, with the help of zero, has given us some pretty severe weather lately. One poor, houseless wanderer was frozen to death upon one of the city wharves during the night. . . . Some one, not having the fear of our honest indignation before their eyes, has sent us a back-handed manuscript—the letters all leaning the wrong way. Perhaps we shall read it, but we rather guess not. . . . We have passed a whole hour this evening in turning over the leaves and volumes at our neighbors, Phillips, Sampson & Co. What a treat!—what fine print, choice themes, superb binding! We doubt if there is so fine a collection of classical literature on sale in this country. . . . Some one writes of Paris: "This splendid city teaches idolatry for the golden calf—it places the ballet-girl higher than the orator, the cook higher than the poet, the millionaire higher than all; for with his millions he can command ballet-girl, orator, cook and poet." . . . We are about to illustrate "Ballou's Dollar Monthly." The wonderful circulation of this Magazine is a marvel to the slow cone publishers. The secret is, to give the public a valuable work at a cheap rate. This is the cheapest publication, without exception, in the world!

The friendship which is founded on kindred tastes and congenial habits, apart from piety, is permitted by the benignity of Providence to embellish a world which, with all its magnificence and beauty, will shortly pass away; that which has religion for its basis, will ere long be transplanted, in order to adorn the paradise of God.—Robert Hall.

The light of nature not only shines upon the human mind through the medium of a rational faculty, but by an internal instinct, according to the law of conscience, which is a spark of the purity of man's first estate.—Lord Bacon.

Choice Miscellany.

GLASS AND ITS PHENOMENA.

The elasticity of glass exceeds that of almost all other bodies. If two glass balls are made to strike each other at a given force, the recoil, by virtue of their elasticity, will be nearly equal to their original impetus. Connected with its brittleness are some very singular facts. Take a hollow sphere, with a hole, and stop the hole with the finger, so as to prevent the external and internal air from communicating, and the sphere will fly to pieces by the mere heat of the hand. Vessels made of glass that have been suddenly cooled possess the curious property of being able to resist hard blows given to them from without, but will be instantly shattered by a small particle of flint dropped into their cavities. This property seems to depend upon the comparative thickness of the bottom; the thicker the bottom is, the more certainty of breakage by this experiment. Some of these vessels, it is stated, have resisted the stroke of a mallet given with sufficient force to drive a nail into wood; and heavy bodies, such as musket balls, pieces of iron, bits of wood, jasper, stone, etc., have been cast into them from a height of two or three feet without any effect, yet a fragment of flint not larger than a pea dropped from three inches high, has made them fly.—Laws of Science.

FERTILITY OF DAMASCUS.

The glory of Damascus is its gardens and forests of fruit trees, which surround the city for miles, and almost hide it from view. Vegetables of all kinds are abundant and cheap. Almost every species of fruit is produced around Damascus, either on the plain, or in the valley of the Barana. Besides the olive, we either saw or heard expressly named, oranges, lemons, citrons, apples, pears, quinces, peaches, apricots, almonds, plums, grapes, figs, pomegranates, mulberries, walnuts, hazelnuts, pistachios, etc. The vines of Damascus are among the best of Syria. Grapes ripen early in July; and are said to be found in the market during eight months. Such is this splendid plain, the seat of this great oriental city. Well might Abulfeida say of it:—"The Ghutah of Damascus is one of the four paradises which are the most excellent of the beautiful places of the earth. They are the Ghutah of Damascus, the She'ab Bauwan, the river of Uballeh, and Sogh of Samarkand. The Ghutah of Damascus excels the other three."—Biblical Researches.

THE NUTMEG TREE.

The nutmeg tree flourishes in Singapore, near the equator. It is raised from the nut in nurseries, where it remains till the fifth year, when it puts forth its blossoms and shows its sex. It is then set out permanently. The trees are planted thirty feet apart, in diamond order—a male tree in the centre. They begin to bear in the eighth year, increasing for many years, and they pay a large profit; they are cultivated chiefly by Europeans. The nutmeg is a large and beautiful tree, with thick foliage of a rich green color. Every day of the year shows buds, blossoms and fruit, in every stage of growth to maturity. The ripe fruit is singularly brilliant; the shell is glossy black, and the mace it exposes when it bursts is bright scarlet—rendering it truly a "thing of beauty."—Rural New Yorker.

HEAVY LOSS OF DIAMONDS.

A gentleman, named de Souza, who arrived off Havre not long since, by the Frane Comtois, from the Brazils, in his hurry to land, would not wait an hour for the turn of the sea-side, which would enable the vessel to enter the dock, but landed by a pilot-boat. In getting from the vessel into the boat, he let slip overboard a small box containing diamonds, which he hoped would produce him a sum of £200,000. A boy was immediately placed to mark the spot, and an experienced diver was engaged to seek to recover the lost treasure. In case of success, he is to receive 1000 francs; and 100 francs, if unsuccessful. He has already made one attempt without result, and will make another shortly.—Caliguanti.

New Publications.

HOME AND THE WORLD. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 405. A really excellent novel, full of interest and incident. Many of the European scenes are admirably sketched. It is by the gifted author of "Souvenirs of a Residence in Europe." For sale by Redding & Co.

SENGMOOR; OR, HOME LESSONS. By Mrs. MANNERS. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857. 18mo. pp. 252.

This little work embraces a vast amount of information conveyed in the most ingenious way, interspersed with the conversation of a home circle. It is an excellent book for the fireside. For sale by Redding & Co.

NEW GRAMMAR. Twenty Months in the Andes. By ISAAC F. HOLTON, M. A., Professor of Chemistry and Natural History in Middlebury College. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857. 8vo. pp. 605.

It is quite refreshing to get hold of a book of travels respecting a place that has not been devoted to death by tourists. This is the case with "New Granada;" and our author has given a most vivid and readable account of it, while the publishers have illustrated it by maps and engravings on a most liberal scale. For sale by Redding & Co.

HISTORY OF HENRY IV., KING OF FRANCE AND NAVARRE. By JOHN C. ARNOTT. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 18mo. pp. 335.

An admirably written sketch of the heroic king and his stirring times, particularly adapted for young readers. For sale by Redding & Co.

OLD WHITEY'S CHRISTMAS TROT. By A. OAKLEY HALL. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857.

A capital holiday story for young people, with splendid wood cuts. For sale by Redding & Co.

LEARNING ABOUT COMMON THINGS. By JACOB ABBOTT. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Animals, birds, domestic implements, etc., are treated in this most illustrated book in a manner to interest young children. For sale by Redding & Co.

DOUGLAS FARM. A Juvenile Story of Life in Virginia. By MARY E. BRADLEY. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co. 1857.

A very pleasing tale, describing an old Virginia homestead, and sure to be a popular one with young readers. For sale by Redding & Co.

SABBATH TALKS WITH LITTLE CHILDREN ON THE PSALMS OF DAVID. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co. 1857. Small 4to, muslin, gilt.

The author of this excellent juvenile is favorably known by the "Mothers of the Bible" and "Sabbath Talks about Jesus." An unexceptionable book.

THE PUDDLEFOOT PAPERS; OR, HUMORS OF THE WEST. By H. H. RILEY. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1857. 12mo. pp. 353.

A book of genuine humor, rare and readable, crowded with mirth-moving originals, and illustrated liberally with very clever pictures. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

NEW MUSIC.—We have received from Russell & Richards, 13 Tremont St., and 282 Washington St., Thalberg's famous capriccio from La Sonnambula, and "Regard, a cluster of gems for the piano, by A. Baumbach."—Also, from Oliver Ditson, "Ah, For a Tul!" the celebrated aria from La Traviata. "Cavalier's March," for the piano, "Souvenir de Bourbonville," polka, and the "Deep Blue Sea," a song by Miss E. C. Huntington, composed by E. Perkins.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of HOLLER'S PICTORIAL,
$4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. N. BAILLOU.

TURKISH LIFE.

The lively sketch on this page represents, with the fidelity of a daguerreotype, the out-door life of the Turks in the streets of their famous city, Constantinople. The large figure on the right is a porter, bending under an enormous weight of baggage. These porters are fellows of prodigious strength, and some of them carry loads that would break down a horse. Stuck in his girdle is the never-failing pipe. The indolence of the Turk is well represented in the cross-legged figure on the platform of the booth, and the luxurious Osmanli who is seated with his pipe at his lips, his pipe-bearer beside him just opening a fresh box of smoking-tobacco. Further off is a procession of the veiled beauties of the harem—ghostly, shrouded figures, with only the bright eyes visible. It is said that the ladies of Constantinople are already beginning to rebel against the jealousy that veils their charms, that they claim the privilege to see as well as to be seen, and that though they still wear the veil, it is of so transparent a texture that the bloom of their cheeks and the curve of their lips are distinctly visible through its folds. European influence will produce great changes at Constantinople before many years. The experience of the past justifies us in the belief that the Turks cannot long maintain a foothold in Europe against the encroachments of the Franks. It will be found that as the latter multiply, as their customs, their arts and their religion spread, the Osmanlis will fade away before them, as in this country the North American Indians have before the Anglo Saxons. When the emperor Nicholas said that Turkey was a "sick man" he was only uttering a notorious truth—the only question was whether it should be allowed to be the kill or cure doctor to prescribe for him. As it happens, the services of Russia were dispensed with, and France and England were admitted as regular practitioners. The poor Turks have about as much reason to dread their professed friends as their avowed enemies. Their power is broken. The sign of Constantine is again in the ascendant, and many years, probably, will not elapse before Constantinople will again become a Christian city.

STREET SCENE IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

years! The distance which it required a couple of days' riding in a stage-coach, night and day, to accomplish, is now travelled in eight hours. We complain if the fires are suffered to get a little low in the cars now-a-days, but our fathers and mothers journeyed to and fro without any fire, boxed up, nine inside, in a coach, with the thermometer eight degrees below zero, if not altogether uncomplainingly, at least with comparative resignation. Yet probably a few years will witness improvements in our mode of travel. We may not increase the rate of speed, but we shall probably be able to dine, sup and sleep in the cars.

CARS TAKING ENGINE FROM NEW YORK TO BOSTON.

RAILROADS.

The living scenes on this page, representing the New York and Boston cars taking the engines to New York city, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Hill, will readily be recognized by all who have journeyed by the inland route from New York to Boston, via Springfield. The location is 32d Street, 4th Avenue, between two and three miles from the City Hall. The horses which have drawn the cars from the city terminus, are being removed, and the long train harnessed to the single iron horse which is to drag it for more than two hundred miles, at a pace no horseflesh can ever attain. Parties of travellers, ladies and gentlemen, who take the cars at this point, are hastening to secure their seats. In the distance is seen the entrance of the long tunnel. The large engine-house is seen to the left. What changes have taken place in the mode of intercommunication between New York and Boston within a very few

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM | VOL. XII., No. 5.—WHOLE No. 293.
6 CENTS SINGLE

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD SNOW-PLUGH.

As the horse railroad is just now attracting great attention, we present our readers with a view representing the operations of the snow-plough for clearing the rails, attached to one of the cars. This implement was used successfully in the first part of the winter, during the light snows, and worked admirably in clearing the rails of snow and ice. The scene depicted in the picture is on the "Neck," and the row of houses is the Malone sand-stone block, which has attracted so much attention. The locality is faithfully represented, and the picture was drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Champney. In deep snows it is not expected, of course, that the cars will be enabled to run, in which case stage-sleighs will be substituted, the company having already purchased a stock of eighty, so that the public will be fully accommodated. Thus far, the Metropolitan Railroad has worked admirably. In no other way could the travelling demand be met. Not only have the cars carried many more passengers than the omnibuses ever did, but the ease of their running, the facility of getting in and out of them, and the frequency of their trips, fully meet all the wants and desires of the public. Their perfect safety is an important point. The horses cannot run away with a rail-car, and a breakdown, should such a thing be possible with such a strongly-built structure, would be attended with no injury. The rail-cars add a new feature to the physiognomy of Washington Street, an avenue which, except its unfortunate narrowness in certain parts, is worthy of the great and growing city which it intersects, and of which it is the main artery. We knew this street of old under many aliases. In the first place, starting from Market Street, we travelled along Cornhill, then displaying many dry goods shops, and affording a great lounge for shopping ladies and attendant beaux. After Bromfield Street, it took another name, and was known as Marlboro' Street; but a little further along the sign-boards told you you were in Newbury Street, and finally, before reaching the Neck, you found yourself in Orange Street. We never could see the fun of all this, and always thought there was something suspicious about it. It bred deadly feuds among its denizens. The Cornhill boys wouldn't speak to the Marlboro' Street boys, and the Newbury Street boys were at loggerheads with the Orange Street juveniles. In fact, the city authorities were finally obliged to interfere for the sake of the public peace, and merged all these titles into one. A queer, picturesque street it was of old, and it yet retains much of its former character of uniqueness and picturesqueness, though many of the old buildings are gone, and their places are fast being supplied by towering palaces and warehouses. On the Neck, in particular, the hand of improvement is most distinctly legible, and this portion of Washington Street promises, ere long, to vie in palatial character with the "up town" of New York city. It is the great promenade of fashion.

HORSE RAILROAD SNOW PLOUGH, BOSTON "NECK."

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THEBONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRIBE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XV.

THE TWO FALSE COUSINS.

THE king remained seated in his chair perfectly silent. Alitea was astonished as well as annoyed by the silence, and at last she broke it with: "What is the matter, Senor Augustin?"

"My cousin," replied the Senor Augustin, with an absent air, and still following his own idea, "are you married?"

The question startled Alitea. Was he not a cousin of the countess, and an invited guest? Could it be that her aunt had not informed him of Carmina's betrothal, and he had come hoping to gain her hand? If that was the case, she could not long usurp her place.

"No, no, cousin," said she, hesitating,—"I am not married. And you?"

"I—I am," replied the king, heaving a sigh.

Re-assured by this declaration, Alitea became frank and gay and with a bewitching, smiling simplicity, she questioned him:

"Are you happy, cousin? You must be, for you are young and married, and your wife—is she not very pretty and amiable?"

"My wife is very beautiful, but I am not happy, for neither she nor any one else loves me." And he said the last words with a sadness so profound that Alitea, in her kind heart, felt great sympathy, and hastened to remove his sadness.

"That must be imagination, for you are too good not to be loved. Perhaps you are disappointed in your fortune?"

"No; I am very rich—very rich indeed."

"In your health, then?"

"No; I have good health, in spite of all the doctors."

"I can think of but one thing more: your ambition, then?"

"No; I have an excellent situation."

"Then you are envious, like the king."

"What is that you say?—like the king! Yes—I am always envious, except to-day, my cousin."

Alitea laughed, as she made haste to answer:

"You must conquer that evil, my cousin, for I hear people sometimes die of it. You must be employed."

"I have an idea—an ambitious idea, too ambitious, without doubt—"

"Speak to the king, since you stand so well with him, or to his minister, for all depends upon him; but perhaps you stand not so well with the minister?"

"We are good, excellent friends."

"Then the grand-inquisitor Sandoval must be gained, if you are not one of his friends."

"He is a friend, and will refuse me nothing."

"Is it possible!" cried Alitea, her face expressing joy and surprise.

"What is the matter with you?" asked the king, seeing her rather pale face crimson and her eyes sparkle with joy.

"The grand inquisitor refuses you nothing?" cried she.

"No, truly."

Among her many good qualities, Alitea had one—it was never to forget friends, and to think always how to do them good. She instantly thought of poor Juan, arrested, imprisoned, groaning in the dungeons of the Inquisition, and forgot the chimerical griefs of Senor Augustin when thinking of true unhappiness.

"Cousin," said she, putting on her most fascinating smiles, "since you pretend to have so much credit—and I do not doubt you—I have a service to ask of you."

"Speak, speak!" said the king, overwhelmed with joy.

"It will not expose or compromise you, so I will speak. There is an old servitor of the house of d'Aguilar, who is called Juan Sevilla; he has been lately thrown into the prisons of the Inquisition. I am not sure—I know nothing, except that he was arrested, and has not been found,—that the dungeons of the Inquisition are well hid, and no one knows what passes there."

"I will discover—I will tell you if he is enclosed there."

"That is all that I ask of you, cousin."

"And if it prove that this Juan—"

"Sevilla?"

"Juan Sevilla is there, what will you do?"

"I will try to obtain his liberty, by the influence of some friends."

"Ah, well, and I," said the king, with an air of goodness which was not without its charms,—“can I do nothing more?"

"That is too much goodness."

"I have not much credit, but I know others, and I promise you I will employ my influence with them for the deliverance of Juan Sevilla, your protégé."

He wrote the name upon the tablets which he drew from his pocket. And Alitea, touched by the offer of friendship, so simple and frank, became natural and as agreeable as she had promised Carmina she would be.

The king was completely ravished. He had no idea of anything so charming; the court offered him no beauty so fresh, no manners so winning, for etiquette always glided into the most intimate relations—the king was always the king there, whilst here he was only Don Augustin de Villa-Flor, the cousin of the prettiest girl in Spain, and who, believing herself obliged to repay in graciousness the services of the generous young man. Alitea pleased very much without striving to, and the poor monarch, beside himself with joy and delight, was master neither of his head nor heart.

He was about to fall on his knees before his beautiful cousin, and exclaim: "Take pity on me; I am the king!" when some one knocked loudly at the gate of the pavilion which opened upon the forest, and they heard the neighing and stamping of horses.

"What is that?" exclaimed Alitea.

"They are my men and horses, who await me."

"You must go, then, and adieu, my cousin."

"Yes—I must go. Tell my cousin how much I enjoyed her reception—that is to say, yours. Tell her I shall never forget this evening, and your good counsels."

"Say my friendship, cousin."

"Yes, yes," said the king, with emotion, "it is friendship—wholly sincere, on your part, at least; I shall prove yours."

"Adieu, then."

"Can I not, at least, claim the cousin's kiss of departure?" he added, hesitatingly.

"I will grant it," said Alitea, gaily, and presented to him her young rosy cheek.

The lips of the king touched her cheek. Then knocks were heard again at the gate, and caused him to hasten. "Adieu!" he exclaimed, but still lingered, and Alitea suddenly disappeared; without that, perhaps, the king would not have left. She had gone, and left him no remembrance of her presence; and the king at last tore himself away from the dangerous place.

Alitea had quitted the king by a little gate hid in the tapestry which opened upon an orange grove in the park.

Delighted with having kept her promise to Carmina, and with having so well received Don Augustin de Villa-Flor, and more delighted still with all that she had done for Juan, Alitea was returning to Carmina's room to give an account of the evening, and was about passing through an oak grove as the nearest way back to Carmina's apartments, when she perceived a man coming towards her. She recognized Don Fernand d'Albayda.

"Is it you, Don Fernand? You have left Carmina?"

"Yes. I felt it necessary to speak in confidence with you, for I am very uneasy. I must go to Lisbon. I wish to die."

"To die is always easy," replied Alitea, firmly, "and is less worthy of a noble heart than to live and struggle, and conquer."

"You are right. I will live and conquer. I implore you to shield me from the Countess Altamira, and to watch over Carmina; guard her from her aunt."

"Her aunt?" cried Alitea.

"Yes."

"I have not studied her character much," said Alitea, reflecting; "I had no interest to know her. But the constant presence of the Duke d'Uzede at her chateau has seemed singular, for he was Don d'Aguilar's mortal enemy, and is yours also. I will watch her, that she does not malign you or hurt Carmina."

"Thank you. I have heard many things that have aroused my suspicions. I think that the countess, always artful and ambitious, has some scheme on foot concerning Carmina. I know it is through her influence I am sent to Lisbon. I must be got out of the way. Dear Alitea, I implore you to watch her well. I am gone, but I leave my dearly-loved Carmina in your charge. Keep me informed of anything important that may transpire."

Just then steps were heard, and Fernand seized Alitea's hand, while she said, in a low, but distinct voice:

"Fernand, I swear to you to guard Carmina, and keep her safe till your return."

"God bless you!" he answered fervently, and was gone.

Alitea, with a heart oppressed by an indefinable dread—a foreshadowing of evil, went to Carmina's room, where her sister was awaiting, blushing with her great joy. Shaking off all appearance of sadness, and striving to be gay, Alitea, after listening to Carmina's account of her meeting with Fernand, gave her a minute description of Don Augustin de Villa-Flor, and all that was said or done, the way he had supped, the kiss which he had demanded, and his departure for Burgos.

During the time, the king galloped away with his faithful confidant, who enjoyed in this circumstance a part that raised him in his master's eyes. The king did not think of the dampness of the night, or the darkness of the forest which he travelled. He was gay, he was happy, he was brave, he was amorous.

"The place you happened to come upon, I learned, was the chateau belonging to the Countess Altamira, one of the queen's maids of honor," said the artful duke.

"I know that already," said the king, with a triumphant air.

"I supped there. I passed a delicious evening with her niece."

"The adorable Carmina?"

"Is that her name?" cried the king, eagerly.

"Yes, sir. I know her well."

The king then confided to the Duke d'Uzede all that had happened, as faithfully as Alitea had related it to Carmina, and he ended by declaring he must see her again—must speak to her. Could his companion procure him that happiness?

"It is so difficult! One thing you must be assured of."

"Well, well, I promise you anything."

"Your majesty must promise me to preserve entire silence with the Count de Lerma, my father, with Sandoval or father Cordova."

"To no one in the world will I mention it; I swear it. Thou alone art my friend—my true friend."

From that day, the artful Duke d'Uzede had an influence over the king, equalled by none—not even his father, the prime minister. The king placed in him great confidence, and would always have him with him. One end of the Duke d'Uzede was gained, even if the countess gained nothing.

CHAPTER XVI.

DON AUGUSTIN DE VILLA-FLOR.

THE king was ever wishing to see the lovely Carmina, and longed for her introduction at court; and upon his return to Madrid from Valladolid, he counselled the Countess Altamira to forthwith bring her lovely niece into the world. The countess was perfectly delighted with the success of her scheme. Together the Duke d'Uzede and the faithless countess laid more plans, and each in secret thought the other a tool, to be used at will.

One day a great rumor filled the palace and the halls of the Inquisition. The king, without consulting any one, not even his prime minister, had nominated one Father Jerome as abbot superior of the community of Hecares, and an unknown monk, named Escobar, had been raised to the dignity of priest. The prime minister went to his son, to ask if he knew a reason for the conduct of the king; and the artful duke replied in the negative, although, to further his own ends and those of the countess also, he had told the king if he wished to see Carmina again he must raise those two men to a higher station, and by ingenious reasoning had made the king believe it was Carmina's wish. Knowing all this, the duke answered his father in the negative. Father Ambrosio, the secretary of the Inquisition, was commanded by the king to search in the prisons of the sacred office for Juan Sevilla, and bring him news of his whereabouts, also to inform him of any vacant places. All these innovations annoyed and puzzled the Count de Lerma.

Since their return to Madrid, Carmina and Alitea did not go out much, and neither morning nor evening had the Countess Altamira been able to make her niece take the air, or walk in the Buen-Retiro, the park surrounding the palace. One evening after supper, Carmina consented to go, together with Alitea, and the countess's carriage conducted the three ladies to the palace of the king. Two men were standing on one of the sidewalks as the carriage rolled in. Cold, and a desire to remain unknown, caused them to envelope themselves in large mantles, while large Spanish hats shaded their faces. Seeing the ladies descend from the carriage, the youngest one could not repress a slight cry of joy, which his companion strove to check. The three ladies walked up the middle path, wholly unconscious that they were the objects of scrutiny and admiration. A few minutes more, and a large company of ladies and gentlemen joined the party, and continued the promenade, ever followed at a distance by the two men.

Having finished their walk, the countess and the two girls returned to the carriage, and went home. It was nearly dark when they reached the hotel. The countess descended first, then Carmina, but Alitea, the fringe of whose mantle had caught in the carriage, remained a few seconds after them. She was busy disengaging her mantle, when a man, enveloped in a cloak, took her hand. She was about to call out, when he made her a sign to be silent, and respectfully raised his hat.

"Don Augustin?"

"Himself, senora."

"I thought you were in Burgos."

"I was, but returned to serve you." And he slipped a little paper into her hand, enjoined silence, and disappeared.

Alitea, concealing her astonishment from the eyes of the countess, waited patiently till she could go to her room. When there, she told Carmina all that had passed, and opened the note:

"MY COUSIN,—Juan Sevilla is not in the prisons of the Inquisition, unless he has been set free. Use me and my credit; if I can serve you and prove to you my affection, the most happy man will be your cousin, AUGUSTIN DE VILLA-FLOR."

Carmina laughed, and declared her cousin must be in love with her sister Alitea. Alitea blushed, as she answered, gravely:

"You are mistaken, for Don Augustin is married."

"That alters the case," said Carmina, and dismissed the idea at once from her mind.

The two girls decided that they ought to inform the countess of all, save the letter which concerned only Juan.

A ball was to take place at court, and the Duke d'Uzede persuaded the countess that it was now time for her to present her niece, and so it was settled that Carmina should now in plain sight meet the king's eyes. Poor Carmina did not wish to go, but the countess had compelled her to consent to it, by telling her that the king desired—nay, even commanded it. To go to court, and for the first time, without Fernand d'Albayda, seemed to her absurd; she did not wish to be presented till after her marriage. Alitea tried to console her.

"To be sure it would have been pleasanter," said Alitea, sighing; "but, nevertheless, at your age, a few hours spent in a ball-room is not such a great punishment that is worth disobeying the king for. Have you never seen him?"

"No, never?"

"They say the queen is good and affable; she will protect you, I am sure."

"But I should not mind it quite so much, dear Alitea, if you were going."

"That is impossible. I am not invited. There is a vast difference here between Don d'Aguilar's own daughter and an adopted one. But I shall have a great deal of pleasure in getting you ready."

The hour came at last, the important hour, the decisive hour, and the countess felt as if entering upon a field of battle, where she must either conquer or die. She feared that Carmina would not look as charmingly as she should. Uneasy, she was about ascending to her chamber, when she saw her niece enter the hall. Carmina wore a robe of very rich tissue, and her head, arms and bosom sparkled with diamonds. The countess uttered a cry of admiration, and eagerly demanded where she had got the rare tissue her dress was made of. It had been Alitea's gift.

"The dress should have been reserved for thy bridal, child; no—it is perhaps better to-day. The king must be won, and Don Fernand needs that not. He loves thee enough already."

The countess was perfectly astonished to hear that the dress and diamonds, jewels of the finest water and inestimable value, had been the gift of Alitea. The carriage came to the door, and put an end to the questions of the countess. Carmina and her aunt seated themselves in the vehicle,—the one calm and indifferent, the other fearful and dispirited, hardly heeding the voice which cried to the coachman: "To the palace of the king!"

The apartments were brilliant with light and jewels. All the first families were there, rivalling each other in luxury, elegance, and brilliant jewels and ornaments.

The queen, sweet and sad as usual, seemed to resign herself to the pleasure they forced upon her. She regretted the quiet of her own apartments; she would have preferred, during this brilliant ball, to remain in her oratory to read, to pray, to think, perhaps. Persuaded that all who came there were as unhappy as herself, she received them with a kind, compassionate manner.

The Count de Lerma, with haughty pride, walked through the saloons, distributing smiles and nods.

The king, burning with expectation, could not remain still, but went hither and thither among the people, speaking to all. The ladies and gentlemen were in ecstasies, for he had never seemed so gracious and agreeable, so witty and conversable. Suddenly he stopped, for he had caught the words: "Madame the Countess Altamira and Senora Carmina d'Aguilar."

The Count de Lerma, who had striven to prevent this, was chagrined; the Duke d'Uzede, who had done all in his power to accomplish this, was secretly delighted; and the king, who had been longing for this hour, was filled with joy, and hastened to receive the countess and her lovely niece. The king did not raise his eyes to the face of the charmer till they were in front of him, and when he did so, he started, for Carmina d'Aguilar he had never seen; it was not she.

The Duke d'Uzede and the countess, who were narrowly watching his face, were disconcerted and astonished by the paleness which fell upon the king's face, and the air of surprise and disappointment he wore. They could neither account for it, for had he not seen her and been apparently delighted with her? had he not urged—nay, even commanded her presence at court! It was beyond their comprehension. The Duke d'Uzede was undone; the countess was angry and annoyed, and Carmina looked tranquilly around, admiring the dresses, and above all the dancing, which had recommenced.

The next day the king was dispirited and fretful, and the Duke d'Uzede trembling for fear he had lost the little influence he had gained over the weak, amorous monarch. In his utter despair, he went to his father, the Count de Lerma, and he it was who opened the way to his son for renewing his influence.

"I know all," he said. "There is in the house of the countess a young girl, companion of her niece, and named Alitea; a young orphan, daughter of an officer killed in Ireland, and brought up by Don Juan d'Aguilar. It is she that the king has seen, and mistaken for the niece."

Uzede was completely stunned at the news, as well as at the discovery that his father had learned his machinations and schemes, though he was a little re-assured by these words of his father:

"Both of you have been mistaken. The countess whom I detest, but whom you like, is very well; and if you have not paid your court to her, do so, if not on your account, at least on mine. It may be useful."

"Yes, my father; I will try—I will obey."

"Try and find out who this young girl is—this Alitea, her principles and her character; whether by vanity, by fortune, or by ambition, she could be led away."

"What would you do, my father?"

"Finish gloriously what the countess has planned but been unable to accomplish. If the king is really captivated, as I think he is, it will be much easier to yield to him than contend. It will soon be ended, and in a few more days, there will be no more doubt."

"You think so?"

"I am sure. Go, gather all the information you can, and come to me as soon as possible."

The Duke d'Uzede, bewildered, sought the countess, and the minister his sovereign.

Lerma found the king, pale and suffering, and incapable of any action. He explained to the king that it was only a short disappointment he suffered, for he had found the young girl he loved, and he should soon see her; and he related to the weak monarch all he knew of Alitea.

The king instantly recovered his spirits, and declared that he had full faith in his prime minister. Thus the influence of the Duke d'Uzede was weakened, the ambitious, wicked countess frustrated in her evil designs, and poor Alitea, an orphan, with no one to protect her, made the object of ambitious designs and vile plots.

The Duke d'Uzede hastened to apprise the countess that the king's favorite was no other than Alitea. The countess was perfectly furious in her anger, and swore to defeat the Count de Lerma. She went instantly to Alitea, and with an affectation of goodness and indignation, she related to her what plots were made against her, and warned her to be careful.

Alitea was astonished, and declared there must be some mistake, for she had never seen the king, nor he her. Where could he have seen her? She knew not, and told the countess that she had never seen any one without the countess's knowledge, save Don Augustin de Villa-Flor. Carmina had gone out, and she received him the evening madame was ill.

"What do you say?—the Senor Don Augustin de Villa Flor?"

"Yes."

"O heavens, that was the king!"

And the countess turned pale with rage, for she now knew there was no mistake, and all hope was gone; and Alitea turned pale with apprehension, for she felt as if from that moment all hope of peace was gone. Her eyes were opened in that moment, and she saw, as if by second sight, all the plans of the countess, and she knew that by thus innocently frustrating her schemes, she had made a bitter, unrelenting, implacable enemy. Boldly Alitea spoke, denouncing her plans, and received bitter insult in return. She had done all for her own good and aggrandizement. Alitea looked at her with scorn, as she answered, proudly:

"I am not the king's favorite, and never will be—never; sooner will I die."

At these words, in spite of her rage, the countess was filled with hope. She realized what she in her wickedness had not dreamed of, that the young girl before her regarded with scorn and hatred what many would deem an honor. She at least would not yield or further the plans of the Count de Lerma.

With a flow of haughty words, Alitea warned the countess about carrying out her schemes any more. She would watch over her sister, and denounce, if necessary, the false countess to the world and to the queen.

The countess left, rage in her heart and her head full of schemes of vengeance. She met on the stairs a page with a bunch of exquisite flowers. She questioned him as to their destination, and received in answer: "They are for Senora Alitea."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE GIRL AND THE MINISTER.

ONE day the Count de Lerma presented himself at the hotel of the Countess Altamira.

"Pardon, senora. My presence here, without doubt, appears to you audacious."

"It will appear to us only agreeable, senor," replied the countess, less irritated by his visit than impatient to know the reason.

"His majesty's order will excuse me," said the count. "I come in the name of the king to bring a message, and in my name to repair an injustice."

He turned then to Alitea, and paused a moment. In looking at her beautiful, regular features and brilliant eyes, and seeing the proud forehead and charming air of her whole person, he understood the passion of the king, which seemed no longer so absurd and extravagant, and his sole fear now was, that such a being should obtain mastery of the king and weaken his power.

"Senora," said he, to the girl, "you are an orphan. Your father, Diego Lopez, was a brave soldier, sergeant in the Spanish infantry."

Alitea bowed in the affirmative, and the countess made a gesture of astonishment.

"Diego Lopez was killed under the walls of Baltimore, at the time of the expedition of Don Juan d'Aguilar in Ireland. His majesty, who knew not of these circumstances, learned them from me. The recompense that should have been given to a brave soldier belongs of right to his daughter, and I have proposed to the king for her an honorable establishment," and he glanced at the countess,—"a worthy marriage for her and her angust protector."

"A marriage—to me!" said Alitea, astonished.

"Yes, senora. The Duke de Santarem, one of the richest and most noble lords of all Portugal, asks your hand."

"An old man," said the countess, with disdain; "I knew him formerly."

"The one you knew is no more," said the count. "His son, the Duke de Santarem, is young, is a handsome, brilliant cavalier, immensely wealthy, and owns a beautiful chateau in the environs of Toledo, a hotel at Madrid, and gives all, together with the title of duchess, to whom he chooses."

All this appeared so beautiful, so loyal, so wonderful, that the countess knew not what to think; a reason, beyond the happiness of Alitea, there must be. Accustomed to the intrigues of the court, she understood the motive of the count, but she could not comprehend how the Duke de Santarem could consent to it; for he belonged to one of the first families in the kingdom, and without taking into consideration the brilliant position, this marriage alone offered to Alitea the rank and advantages which the countess herself enjoyed.

Alitea, pale and immovable, expressed neither joy nor surprise, but seemed plunged in deep reflection, from which she aroused herself by saying:

"I thank you, senor count, as well as his majesty, for the honor which he does me in troubling himself with my future," and a slight tone of sarcasm was discernible in her voice; "but in an affair so important and grave, one cannot decide immediately, and I ask of your excellency time to reflect upon it."

"That is just, senora. How much time do you ask?"

Alitea seemed to calculate, and answered:

"I ask ten days, senor."

"Impossible, senora. Think of the Duke de Santarem, and of the king even, who expects a prompt answer; and I implore you—"

Alitea, without taking any notice of the prayer of the count, replied coldly and in the same tone: "I ask ten days."

"But meanwhile, senora—"

"Not a day less," said Alitea.

The count bowed almost to the earth with respect; then saluting the two other ladies, he left the hotel of Altamira. An instant after, they heard his carriage roll away from the hotel, and the countess, seeing the sang froid of Alitea, said to herself, spitefully:

"In truth, if she had been a favorite sultana for six months, she could not have spoken to the minister with a dignity more insolent and royal."

Without saying a word to the countess, Alitea left the room, followed by Carmina, who said to her:

"What is your idea?"

"My idea for myself," replied Alitea, quickly, "would be to refuse."

"And how do that, without offending the king and his minister?"

"I don't know. I have ten days before me. God will help me to some good thought."

Alitea then went into her own room to reflect at leisure, but as soon as she was alone, she locked the door and seated herself at her secretary, and began to write.

While she writes, we will give the reason the Count de Lerma had for wishing this marriage. He sought for a way to fulfil his promise to his august master—that of bringing Alitea to court.

The Count de Lerma had received, some days previously, some very important despatches from Don Fernand d'Albayda, dated from Lisbon. There had been some light revolts which he had promptly quelled. He had not thought it right to take up arms against the poor peasants who were not guilty, but only against those who had been the prime movers and abettors of these troubles, the Count de Pombal, the Marquis de Atulaza, and the Duke de Santarem. He had proofs against the first two, and hoped to obtain them against the Duke de Santarem. The Count de Lerma, in answer, ordered Fernand to send the Duke de Santarem to Madrid, well escorted, and use every effort in the meantime to obtain proofs of his guilt.

The Duke de Santarem, young, handsome, wealthy and ennaïed, had aided the Count de Pombal and the Marquis de Atulaza merely for the sake of having something to do, and had not thought of the evil consequences until he was sent to Madrid, before the prime minister.

The Count de Lerma accused him of conspiracy, and told him he need not deny it, for he had sent to Don Fernand for the proofs which he had in his possession. The young duke was frightened, for he had no good reason, nothing to plead in his favor. He bowed his head, and murmured words about clemency and royal pardon.

The Count de Lerma told him that he would pardon him upon his promising never to meddle again in affairs of state, to calm his wildness and to marry, Lerma to choose his wife. All this Santarem promised, happy to save his head at any cost.

The young prisoner was conducted back to his dungeon, a damp place, very little like the beautiful, luxurious apartments belonging to the count. "Ily Saint Iago!" cried he, "prison for prison, I would rather marry the infanta of Congo."

The young man was in this state of mind, when he was summoned anew before the minister.

"The king has thought of two things in your favor," coldly said the Count de Lerma. "He gives you Madrid for a prison, and chooses for your wife Alitea Lopez, a young, beautiful girl, without a fortune. Your full and entire pardon depends upon your conduct. If it is what it should be, you will, without doubt, be re-instated in his majesty's favor; but if there are any complaints of you, if you dare again to revolt against royal authority—"

"Heaven preserve me from it!"

"The proofs of your first rebellion will always be preserved, and will be produced, and the prison which you now leave will instantly re-open for you. You will never leave the prison walls."

"I promise to be faithful and true henceforward."

"Very well. I will go and give the king an account of our conversation."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the first chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

SKETCHES IN SIERRA LEONE, WESTERN AFRICA.

We present on the two pages following a series of sketches representing scenes in Sierra Leone, a country of Western Africa, on the Atlantic coast, where the British government have established a colony of free negroes, sending them, from time to time, such slaves as their cruisers had captured, and blacks from various sources. Though the establishment is almost three quarters of a century old, still the wild and improvident habits of the colonists have thrown many difficulties in the way of the British authorities. But a good deal has certainly been done. The first picture represents an "Egg-gu-gu," or itinerant magician, with a couple of musicians beating time to their dancing, on a sort of tamborine, before a group of spectators, some decently clad, others half-naked, like the women on the right, who are balancing loaded calabashes on their heads. Probably in no part of the world does superstition have more extensive and baleful influence than in Africa. The women of Sierra Leone particularly reverence these itinerant impostors, whose pretensions are prodigious, and who even claim to be familiar with departed spirits, and to procure their presence! The "Egg-gu-gu" in our picture wears a cloak with rows of cowrie-shells, forming a square before the face, and two eye-holes to look through. The second picture represents the interior of a colonist's kitchen, with its rude utensils, the fire-place being only a heap of stones, and the proprietor blowing the embers into a blaze. The next picture shows us the process of lambooning a house. On the frame-work of the roof, a native workman is applying the broad palm-leaves, which form the thatching. This is termed "lambooning," though la bamboo is used in the construction. Our next picture represents Freetown, the principal place of the colony, from the Pademba road. The scenery is quite pretty. The house at the angle of the nailed enclosure is a specimen of the better class of dwellings; the thatched houses are the ordinary habitations. The large building is Christ Church, built by the natives, of stone. Various characteristic figures are introduced. The British barracks are on the hill, indicated by a flag. On the right, a group of women are washing clothes in the stream, where a couple of sable picaninies are disporting themselves.

[For continuation, see page 69.]

EGG-GU-GU, ITINERANT NECROMANCER AND MUSICIAN.

INTERIOR OF KITCHEN.

BAMBOOING A HOUSE.

FREETOWN, SIERRA LEONE, PADEMBIA ROAD.

WATERLOO MARKET.

Above is a view of Waterloo Market, with groups of natives, and pigs, sheep, etc., scattered about the foreground. The town of Waterloo is next in importance and size to Freetown. Our next engraving represents the interior of a piazza, with a hammock swung for that shady repose which is so grateful in warm climates.

roofs. A group of idlers are collected about a couple of dancers, one of whom furnishes the music with a rude kind of drum. The Sherbro are quite remarkable for the beautiful texture and patterns of their mats, hammocks, and other articles of a similar manufacture. An extremely interesting spot on the western shores time eligible for their particular pursuits, could scarcely have been chosen; the little village occupying a small clearance completely surrounded by trees and shrubs of luxuriant growth, within the limits of a tongue of land which projects into the sea, and which affords them immediate access at the point to a natural wharf of

INTERIOR OF PIAZZA.

We now come to an exterior view of an African kitchen, which is octagonal, and thatched. The proprietor is pounding maize in a large mortar, with his poultry grouped around him. The building reminds us of some of our corn-barns. In the last picture, "Sherbro Village," the houses are all circular, with conical palm-thatched of the colony, about seven miles from Freetown, has been selected by a few families of this nation, where they are chiefly engaged in fishing, and in a petty traffic with the canoes which pass along the coast. A more romantic locality, and one more in accordance with their predilections for shade and retirement, and at the same rocks; and on one side of it to a fine sandy beach of a long bay, abounding with fish. From the peculiar character of the scenery, combined with the national costume and mode of constructing their houses, so different from the prevalent practices in the colony, the casual visitor might imagine himself in the far interior.

EXTERIOR OF KITCHEN.

SHERBRO VILLAGE.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE LAKE.

BY JOHN CARTER.

Speak like a friend, thou placid lake,
I know thou hast a voice;
I hear it when the zephyrs gay,
Upon thy rippling bosom play,
As if thou didst rejoice.

Speak like a friend—my youthful song
Had caught thy joyous strain;
And I have come from far away,
And wandered many a night and day,
To hear it once again.

Fair lake, thine image dwelt with me
Along my desert way—
How sad the songs we used to sing,
How sad to hear thine echoes ring,
Mid rage and decay!

Speak like a friend, and tell me all—
Where are my playmates gone?
Say, where are all those faces dear,
That used to smile around me here,
Where now I stand alone?

Tell me how many rest in peace
Beneath the willow's shade—
How many battle with the world,
Upon its stormy bosom hurled,
Till love and memory fade.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

AUNT ALICE'S FIRST OFFER.

BY EMMA CARRA.

"COME, Aunt Alice," said Mary Tracy, "don't you remember that you once promised to tell us something about your first bean?"

"O, yes, so you did," said Elvira Congdon, with a joyous smile; "and this is just the evening for telling stories. Only hear how the wind whistles around the corner and makes the old well-sweep creak and groan as though they were having a mighty conflict."

"I hear it, dear, and it makes me creep all over, for it always reminds me of poor sailors, and what a dreadful hard time they must have on the water such bitter nights as this. But put down the curtains, girls, and pile on a little wood, and then you can sit down here by the stand, and I guess I will try to redeem my promise, for I see you don't intend to forget it."

"I guess we don't, aunty," answered Mary, bounding from the narrow-backed chair in which she sat, and skipping gaily towards the green rush curtains that shaded the window-panes.

The task of shutting out the storm and the darkness was an easy one in the little sitting-room at the farm-house, for there were but two windows in it to let in the air and sunlight; and yet they were enough, for the light of love that ever beamed within made everything about the old homestead look cheerful. The two youthful cousins, Mary and Elvira, had come from the city to spend Christmas with their aunt, and well did they enjoy the contrast between a fashionable home amid the whirl of excitement and the quiet old farm-house with Aunt Alice to entertain them.

"Now for the story, aunty," said Mary, returning and seating herself on a low stool so close to the old lady's elbow that the end of her slender knitting-needle became entangled in the puffs of the city beauty's dark brown hair.

Aunt Alice gave a look around the room to see if all was right, then making room on one end of a long cricket where her feet were placed, she beckoned for the other niece to come nearer and take a seat there, and when Elvira complied, she commenced:

"Well, girls, I always loved a sailor, and I do to this day. I know that there are some bad ones among them, but that makes no difference with me, I love sailors still, and I have often thought it was strange that there wasn't a great deal more done for their happiness, when on shore, than there is. Now, in your great cities, while they do everything to make the great deeds of a landsman live forever, poor Jack, as they call him, who has worked and done so much, at the risk of his life, for his home and his country, is left to be buried without even a tombstone. But about my first bean.

"I was about sixteen, then, and father always went over to Newport just before Christmas, to take a load of poultry, and this time, about a month before he started, I was busy as usual clearing up the supper table and putting things to rights, when he looked up to me, and said:

"Alice, hurry and get your work done up and go to bed, child; you sit up too late nights."

"I dropped everything, and looked up into father's face, and in a moment I thought something was in the wind, but I couldn't tell what; so I flew round, and in a very short time I had left my shoes by the fire to be warm for morning, and was lying in the little canopy-topped bedstead, in the bed room off from the great room, by the side of sister Betsey; but I couldn't sleep—I kept thinking father wanted to say something to mother about me, and I had left the bed room and the great room door ajar. After a while, I heard father say to mother:

"Ruth, I guess you had better fix Alice up a little, and I will take her over to town with me to spend a week or so with cousin Angeline. She has asked me a great many times to bring her over, and I suppose that you can spare her now about as well as any time."

"Well," answered mother, "I guess I can. What do you think of having her stay over there the rest of the winter, and go to school?"

"Just as you have a mind to, Ruth," replied father, and then added: "Don't go to fixing her up with finery to make her proud—one or two calico gowns are enough."

"I didn't hear mother's answer, but I knew well enough that if I went to spend the winter in Newport she wouldn't let me go looking worse than other folks—she had too much pride for that. I don't know what more they said, for I was so overjoyed at the prospect of going over to town that I forgot everything else in a minute, in the calculations I began to make of what I should wear and how I should look and how very lady-like I would try to be, and all that. I declare, I was so delighted that I could hardly keep from going right out and telling them that I had heard everything and wanted to begin to make preparations right away; but then I knew it wouldn't do, for father, though a kind man, was one that didn't allow us children to have a great deal to say about how things should be done in the house. I saw they intended to keep my going a secret from me until the time of starting, so I thought I would be even with them and make strange of all I saw in regard to preparing me for the journey. The next morning, mother said to me:

"Alice, I want you to hurry knitting those white, lamb's-wool stockings, because—"

"Because what, mother?" inquired I.

"Mother looked just as if it was hard work to keep a secret, but she went on with her weaving, and I couched with my spinning, and there was no more said then; but the next week, Miss Reeves, the dressmaker of the neighborhood, was hired, and I had two or three new dresses made; and then mother went up to the village and bought me a new bonnet and a new pair of morocco shoes and a pair of gloves, and I don't know what all."

"Can't you hurry a little, aunty, and get to where the bean comes in?" said Elvira, growing rather impatient at the old lady's manner of detailing so minutely.

"O, certainly, dear, but then you shouldn't hurry a body. Bless me, how it does storm! It is just the right kind of a night to tell you about the doings of that winter. Well, the morning I left home Miss Reeves whispered in my ear that she never see me look so handsome before, and told me that all the way I must ever dress my hair was to keep my curls back with a fillet, and then added:

"Alice, if you are going to stay over there all winter, I'll bet you'll catch a bean."

"Lor! such a thing had never entered my head, for father wouldn't even let sister Betsey and me talk about them at home."

"Well, cousin Angeline, I have come again," said father, two days before Christmas, laying a large, fat turkey on the oak table, "and this time I have brought Alice with me, and if you have got a spare bed for her, I guess I'll leave her here to go to school this winter."

"Aunt Angeline looked pleased (I always called her aunt, although she was father's cousin), and said she could board me, and she might just as well have added she could board a dozen more, for it was a large, old-fashioned house, with spacious rooms and a great front door-yard. It stood near the water, so near that I could hear almost every word said by those on board the vessels as they passed in to the shore and made fast to the wharf. Aunt Angeline, from the first day of my arrival, gave me a large, square chamber, overlooking the water, and there by the window, after school hours, I used to sit with my feet on a little tin foot-stove and my mantle wrapped about me when it was cold, looking out to see the vessels rock on the waves as they lay at anchor over by Coasters' Harbor and near the old fort; and sometimes when the mornings were pleasant, I used to open the window and let the warm sun and the frosty air mix together in my chamber, while I studied and listened to the heave yo! of the sailors as they hoisted and lowered the cargoes. One day I brushed every curl separately over a wheel-pin I found in the garret of aunt's house, and dressed myself with more than common care, for there was going to be company at the school that day, and then I seated myself at the open window of my room. It was a very mild day for the season, so the sailors were very busy on the wharf, and the captains and mates were stepping hurriedly about hither and thither, and then I heard hoarse voices sounding as if they were on the water; but I couldn't see the speakers, for a large ship, with her sails spread out a drying, shut out a seaward view from my window, but in a few minutes the peak of a bowsprit rounded in, and then a large stranger ship came sweeping up to the wharf. I closed my book, and scarcely knowing what I did, while I gazed on the different ones that left her deck and came up the street, I sang, in a low voice, the Sailor's Welcome Home. Presently a young man stopped beneath my window, and looking up with a sad face, he said, half aloud:

"Alas! that song is not for those who have no home."

"I stopped singing, and I suspect I must have looked very much confused, but he didn't seem to notice it, and after a moment's pause he said, respectfully:

"I am a stranger here—will you please to tell me where I can get a boarding-house?"

"At first, I thought I would shut the window and leave him without an answer, but a second look into his handsome sunburnt face made me less bashful, and I answered:

"I heard Aunt Angeline, in this house, say the other day that she would take some good boarders if she could get them."

"Captain Gilmore, I think, will vouch for my good conduct, miss, if she wishes further proof than my words," answered the sailor.

"I only smiled, for somehow I didn't feel just like talking to him any more, nor did he speak to me again; but looking around he spied the brass knocker, and walking up to it, I soon heard it ring through the entry, and then I heard a tiny trip through the entry with her high-heeled shoes on, and open the door. The young sailor or mate of the large ship told his errand, and I heard Aunt Angeline question him pretty closely about what kind of a ship he sailed in, and who was captain, and so on; and then I heard her say:

"Well, if you sailed with Captain Gilmore come right in; he never would allow anybody on board of his ship that was not of the right sort."

"And then the young sailor was shown to a chamber over the further part of the sitting-room. In a few moments I saw him go back to the vessel and take out, with the aid of another, his sea-chest, and bring it towards the house, and then I closed the window and went to school."

"At noon when I entered the sitting-room, there sat the sailor. His name was Edwin. Well, no matter about remembering his last name, for they didn't call everybody Mr. then as they do now. There was also another young man, who appeared to be four or five years older than Edwin, and rather handsomer; but I should have thought Edwin was handsome enough if I hadn't seen him. O, such eyes as that other one had! His name was Maurice, and he was the second mate of the same ship with Edwin, the Albastross. I never shall forget how I rushed into the house the first day they took dinner at aunt's. I had been snow-balling with Lucy Carter, and aunt said my cheeks were as red as a penny; and Lucy had snatched off my hood, and then left my hair all powdered with snow. Just as I had reached the outer door, that opened into the sitting-room, Lucy was coming towards me with a fresh supply, so I rushed in with a triumphant laugh, for the moment forgetting everything else but my escape, when I slipped on the polished floor and fell headlong, partly into Maurice's lap and partly into the fire, I believe, for I felt so ashamed I thought my face was going to blaze."

"Why, how red your face is now, Aunt Alice," said Mary.

"Well, I suppose it is, for la! what a figure I must have cut. But Maurice seemed as cool as the snow that was clinging to me, and lifted me up so gracefully, and placed me in a chair and apologized for being in the way, that I could hardly eat any dinner for thinking of it. Well, several days went by, and I didn't say much to aunt's boarders nor they to me, especially Edwin, and yet I would almost always catch him looking at me, and so I would Maurice, too, and thus things went on; but pretty soon we all began to get better acquainted, for aunt was a very sociable woman, and she asked the young men a great many questions about foreign parts, and got them to tell a good many stories in the evenings, for they seemed to like to stay at their boarding-house better than anywhere else. A number of weeks went by, and the truth is, girls, and I might as well own it at once, I lost my heart."

"Was it Edwin you loved, Aunt Alice?" inquired Elvira.

"Well, I liked him very well, and should have loved him a great deal better, if Maurice had not been there. But, as I have said, he was so handsome and so polite, and seemed always so attentive to me, that I couldn't help loving him. Edwin was good, but I thought he was too bashful. One evening Aunt Angeline went to meeting and left me to clear up and keep house. Uncle Anson, her husband, promised to stay and keep me company, but la! you know what men are—he filled his pipe and went over across the way to speak with one of the neighbors, and I didn't see any more of him till after aunt got back, which was late, for ministers in those days didn't say all they had to in twenty minutes. Well, I had just got cleared up and drawn the stand near the fire and taken my books to study, when Maurice came in alone, for both young men went out after supper, and aunt expected they would go to meeting. Edwin did go, but Maurice said he had a head-ache, and so he thought he would come home. I never believed his head ached. Well, I was sitting there alone when he came in, and he drew his chair near mine, and then he began to tell me all about the beautiful countries where he had been, saying I might put away my book that evening, for he could give me more information by talking than I could gain by study; so I closed the book and listened. He told me all about Scotland, and described the barren battle-fields of Culloden, and many famous places of which I had never heard; and then, with all ease, he seemed to step across to England, and afterwards told me of feats he had witnessed in Asia, and that he had once been on board of an African slave ship, and—in fact he told me so much, all of which was new to me, that I got so bewildered that I thought he must have been everywhere and read all the books in the world; but it puzzled me to think how he could have known and seen so much and he so young, for he did not appear to be more than twenty-six or seven. When my wonder was at its height, he took my hand, and said:

"My dear, wouldn't you like to see all those beautiful places, and visit castles, and look on the lords and ladies that live in them, and be dressed as beautiful as they, and be loved by one who is brave and wouldn't be afraid to stab anybody that ever spoke an unkind word to you? And he drew from beneath his fine blue roundabout a small poniard, with the handle all glittering with jewels."

"At first, I thought I would spring from my chair and run into the street, but he quickly pushed it into its sheath, and said, coaxingly:

"Don't be frightened, my girl; nothing shall harm you where I am. That is a neat little thing I bought in Havana, and I thought perhaps you would like to look at it. Why, they are as common among the Spanish ladies as their fans or scented pocket-handkerchiefs. Would you not like to go to Spain?" he went on; and I told him yes, for I always had a great desire to travel. "Well," said he, 'if you will consent to be my bride you shall see all those places and have plenty of gold to dress yourself like a lady;' and he placed his face close to mine, and with his coal black eyes looking full at me, repeated: 'Say, my dear, will you consent? Say but yes, and we will keep all a secret up to the very hour we are married, and then I will surprise your aunt and all the rest by the wealth I will show them.'

"I don't know what I said, or whether I made any answer, for this was a strange situation for me to be placed in. Now I remembered the words of Miss Reeve about my catching a beau, and I was so confused I don't know what I should have said or done if he had not read my thoughts, and said, carelessly:

"Well, never mind about an answer now, Alice; to-morrow evening will be time enough; only don't repeat that I have said anything to you about becoming my little wife."

"I promised that I would not, and at this instant the door was opened and Edwin entered. He glanced first at me and then at Maurice, and I could see that he was not only surprised but displeased, to see Maurice sitting so near me. I didn't speak, but as Edwin came near the fire Maurice did, and with a look I shall never forget, said to Edwin:

"Do you not know, young man, that sometimes a person's room is better than his company?"

"I was thinking of the same thing," answered Edwin, drily, and then added: "Strangers ought not to make too free with the inexperienced. That girl is scarcely more than a child."

"And what is that to you?" said Maurice. "If she were not here, I vow I would make you bite the dust."

"Perhaps not," answered Edwin, coolly.

"A few more excited words were spoken by Maurice, and then I saw that jewelled dagger drawn from its sheath and the owner spring towards Edwin; but he did not reach where he stood, for quicker than I can tell you, Edwin drew from beneath his jacket a pistol, and said, in the same calm tone:

"Advance another step and you have seen your last hour of life. I have seen enough since we picked you up from that raft, alone in the sea, to convince me that you are not what you pretend to be—an honest man."

"O, I thought I should have fainted! I couldn't speak. Edwin, seeing my distress, came to my side, and said:

"Don't be frightened Alice; you shall not be harmed, neither shall he if he will put up his weapon. I would never shed blood unless actually compelled to do so in self-defence."

"Maurice slowly sheathed his weapon, and muttered through his teeth, looking at Edwin:

"You shall pay dearly for this. I'll settle with you some other time."

"As you like," answered the other; then replacing his pistol, he took a seat near the fire, while Maurice for a few minutes strode the floor, and then Aunt Angeline came in.

"Nothing was said of the past, for I was still too much frightened to talk, and, besides, I didn't want aunt to know about it. In a little while Uncle Anson came in, looking rather excited.

"Have you heard the news, boys?" said uncle, addressing the boarders.

"Nothing in particular, sir," answered Edwin.

"Well," continued uncle, "there is a rumor that that little low craft that has laid off in the harbor for a few days is a pirate."

"I have never liked the looks of her," said Edwin, "and I told Captain Gilmore so to-day. She is too rakish a looking craft to be an honest one."

"No one seemed to notice Maurice but me, and it seemed to me that he had suddenly turned into a demon, for his face changed from white to red and red to white so quick that you could hardly see how the change came; and his eyes, that I had thought so handsome, seemed to me now like great red coals of fire; but I said nothing, while uncle went on talking about the strange vessel that had made its appearance within the harbor. When Maurice saw that I observed him, he tried to smile, and then remarked:

"O, nonsense, about that ship being a pirate; it is only some old woman's gossip; then rising, he went out, and in a few moments I heard him go to his room."

"In a little while uncle went to bed, and then, when aunt went out in the kitchen to make preparations for morning, Edwin said to me, in a low tone:

"I wouldn't have much to say to Maurice, Alice, for he is a stranger to us all. I have always been sorry that I did not oppose his coming here to board."

"You are a stranger too," said I.

"True," answered he, sadly; "I am a stranger, with none very near of kin living, but yet there are those living on the Narragansett side who knew my parents and grandparents well, and besides, I have sailed with Captain Gilmore for a good many years, and he has often told me he will testify to my good behaviour. But Maurice we picked up a few months ago on a raft in a very destitute condition. He said the vessel in which he sailed as chief mate, had been cast away, and he, with five others, made them a raft on which he had floated for several days, but the rest had perished. Our second mate was sick at the time and died a few days afterwards, and as we were rather short of hands, and Captain Gilmore was satisfied that Maurice was capable, he offered him the berth, which he accepted; but there was always a something about him that I did not like, and I have tried to avoid a quarrel with him, but to-night,—well, Alice, he must let you alone, at least, till you know more about him."

"At this moment aunt came in, and then Edwin bade us good night with such a pleasant voice and smile, that I began to wonder how I could have thought Maurice the handsomest. I said nothing to aunt about the occurrence of the evening, and half an hour later every light in the house was put out and all in bed.

But I could not sleep, so I got up, and wrapping my mantle around me, took a seat by the window. Presently I heard some one go gently down the front stairs, and on looking out from behind the curtain in the darkness, I saw, from the side window, a man standing in the garden near the old back porch. It was a rough place, but the doors were fastened; and with no shoes on, I went softly down the back way and into the porch, and through the cracks I could hear every word that was spoken on the outside. Presently Maurice and his companion came around very near to where my ear was at the crevice, and the first words I could catch were:

"I knew the craft as soon as I put my eye on her, although she has been painted since that morning I got adrift from her when we lowered the boat to pick up the cook. I suppose he went to the bottom."

"Yes," said the other, "and we all expected you had. But how did you escape?"

"Maurice here confirmed all that Edwin had said respecting his being picked up by them, and then he added:

"I was coming on board again to-night if you had not come after me, to let you know that you had better lay off outside of Point Judith to-morrow, as the cursed gossips here have got a story about that you are a pirate."

"Well, they can't prove anything if they come aboard, for all is as nice as a merchantman," said the other, scarcely above a whisper, but still close enough to the crevice for me to hear.

"Where is Nell?" inquired Maurice.

"O, she met with an accident just out of sight of land—guess she is a few fathoms below the surface. But say, aunt you going to join us again?"

"Yes, but I have a little job I want to do here first."

"What is that?"

"Put a knife into the first mate of the Albatross and get a trim little rustic there is here on board of our craft, and then I don't care how soon we are off for other climes. But mind, you all sign a contract that this little girl is mine and mine alone; for you see we are going to be married before she comes on board, and then if any of you dare to make free with her, why, you know I had as lief throw a brand into the magazine as overboard. Too bad about Nell—you might as well let her live; she would never have brought out anything. She was half crazy, so she could have passed with some of you for a deranged daughter taking a voyage for her health. But come, you had better go back now, for as I have seen you I won't go aboard to-night; if any one comes to inspect, mind how you behave, and show the right kind of papers."

"No danger but we will. But hark! I thought I heard some one breathe."

"Pshaw, then, everybody in this house is asleep long before this or I should not be here; besides, as near as I can find out, this old porch is not very often visited at this season of the year—that is why I told you to come round here and wait till I come out."

"I did not stay to hear any more, for I felt sick and faint, and scarcely knowing how I got there, I once more reached my chamber, but I did not go to bed. I hastily finished dressing myself, and then I stood thinking what it was best to do. At first I thought I would step down to my aunt's bed room and arouse her and my uncle, but then I knew she would be frightened, and perhaps in the confusion that would follow, Edwin would rush out to see what was the matter and be murdered by the pirate before he could be made to know his danger. So I resolved not to stand for ceremony, but to seek the chamber of Edwin and warn him to be on his guard, and then I would step down to uncle's room and tell him that I had overheard a conversation between one of the men from the suspicious ship and Maurice. So going through the long upper entry, I stopped at Edwin's door and listened to see if I could hear him breathe; but I could not, and directly I saw some one approaching. I was so frightened by all that I had seen and heard, that I could not help giving a slight scream, but Edwin whispered, for it was he:

"Don't be afraid, Alice, for it is I."

"I then in a whisper told him what I had heard, and he quickly answered that he had seen the meeting between the pirates; for as he could not sleep he had arisen and looked from the window, and when he saw a man loitering about the house he had left his room to see what he would do, but he was not near enough to hear what they said. At this moment there was a flash, as if from a pistol, at the further end of the entry, and then a ball went whizzing past our ears, but in the darkness, the bullet that was intended to send death, harmed nothing but the wall beyond."

"In an instant uncle and aunt rushed to where we were, but Maurice's room was empty, and a window being open, we concluded that he had been aroused by my low shriek, after returning to his room, and when he found that his deeds were known, he fired the pistol and then leaped from the window to the ground. There was no more sleep in the house that night, and the next morning the suspicious looking vessel was gone, and I suppose Maurice went with it, as there was a small boat taken from the wharf that night, and it was found floating near where she anchored, and we never heard from him afterwards. It was a good many years before I ever told Aunt Angeline or anybody else about my first offer,—what Maurice had said to me about being married and going with him, for the very thought of it frightened me so."

"But what became of the young sailor, Edwin?" said Mary and Elvira.

"O, he got married."

"Why didn't you have him, Aunt Alice?"

"I did."

There were a few moments' silence, and then Mary said:

"Why, I didn't know that Uncle Charles was ever a sailor, and besides, his name isn't Edwin."

"Yes it is, Mary,—Charles Edwin. Well, I suppose no one would hardly think now that your uncle was ever a sailor, but you must know that was a great many years ago, and when he married me he left off going to sea. But there is his step. Go hold the light, Mary—it is slippery outside."

In a moment more a handsome old gentleman entered, and Aunt Alice received him with the same kind of smile she did before his hair was silvered.

So good by, reader. I hope you have been as well entertained with Aunt Alice's story as were the city cousins.

CHILD OF THE REGIMENT.

First came a body of generals and other officers, their cocked hats and plumes, their drawn swords and golden medals glittering in the sunlight; then followed the band, with the drum major and his imposing baton. How the clear notes of the trumpets, the long roll of the drums, echo through the vast streets as the multitude passed on! The heavy steady tramp of thousands of men makes the solid earth shake beneath our feet; as they descend the hillside we see regiment after regiment filing around, and the cold sharp points of the bayonets glitter like the dragons' teeth from which their prototypes sprang forth. The little vivandiere too! Look at her; in her tight military jacket and trowsers, and her incredibly little boots; slight and agile, but upright as the stiffest of the soldiers, she marches behind the band, her tiny feet keeping a mocking time with the heavy tread behind. With one hand in her breast, the other on the dagger at her side, her black, bright eye and sun burnt complexion, beautifully regular features, and her careless, fearless look, she seems the very genius of war; as graceful as a young panther and as dangerous. But let us not wrong the vivandiere. Many a dying and wounded soldier has thanked God for the glass of eau-de-vie from that little keg at her back. On the long march and the bloody battle-field she is often the only one who thinks or cares for their wants. No wonder the poor fellows love and even respect her—the only thing near to remind them that there are in the world such things as wives, and mothers, and sisters.—Notes in Marselles.

PERFUMES AS PREVENTIVES OF MOULDINESS.

Mouldiness is occasioned by the growth of minute vegetation. Ink, paste, leather and seeds, most frequently suffer by it. A clove will preserve ink; any essential oil answers equally well. Leather may be kept free from mould by the same substances. Thus Russian leather, which is perfumed with the tar of birch, never becomes mouldy; indeed, it prevents it from occurring in other bodies. A few drops of any essential oil will keep books entirely free from it. For harness, oil of turpentine is recommended. Alum and resin are used to preserve bookbinders' paste, but ineffectually; oil of turpentine succeeds better; but, by small quantities of oil of peppermint, anise or cassia, paste has been preserved for several years. Dr. Macculloch recommends the addition to the flour and water of some brown sugar and a little corrosive sublimate; the sugar keeping it flexible when dry, and the sublimate preventing it from fermenting, and from being attacked by insects. A few drops of any of the essential oils may be added to the paste when it is made. It dries when exposed to the air, and may be used merely by wetting it. Seeds may also be preserved by the essential oils; and this is of great consequence, when they are sent to a distance. Of course, moisture must be excluded as much as possible, as the oils of otos prevent only the bad effects of moulds.—Family Friend.

WIT OF FRENCH RASCALS.

A trick was played off a few days ago, at the Fair of Breagne. A well-dressed gentleman sauntering about with a valuable gold-headed cane in his hand, was stopped by a wretched looking man, who had dragged himself painfully along on crutches, and piteously implored charity. The gentleman, moved to compassion, generously gave the beggar a piece of silver. "How can you be so foolish," cried a man standing by; "that fellow is an impostor, and no more lame than you are. Just lend me your cane for a minute, and by means of a sound thrashing I will convince you of the truth of what I say." The gentleman mechanically let the man take the cane, and the beggar, throwing down his crutches, ran off as fast as he could. The other, amidst roars of laughter from the by-standers, ran after him menacing him with the cane, and so they ran a considerable distance, when they turned aside into the town, and were seen no more. The gentleman waited for some time, expecting to see the man return with his cane, but the expectation was in vain. It was then clear that the whole scene had been an affair concerted between a pair of adroit rogues. The gentleman had nothing for it but to walk home, feeling very foolish at having been so victimized.—Saturday Gazette.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

PRESENT CIRCULATION 69,000!

No like publication has ever attained to so large a circulation in so short a period of time as has BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY. This is not alone because of its wonderful cheapness—which, as the New York Tribune says, is next to giving it away—but also on account of its fresh, original, and entertaining character. Its stories and sketches, while they absorb and deeply entertain the general reader, also cultivate a love for all that is good and beautiful in humanity, exercising a cheerful and happy influence over the home circle.

Its pages are edited with great care and experience, and its varied contents are calculated to provoke in the mind of the young an inquiring spirit, and to add to their store of knowledge. Its foreign gossip is of the most readable and choice character, its wit and humor department is void of all vulgarisms, yet is mirth-provoking in the extreme, while each number contains tales, sketches, poems, and miscellaneous articles from more than TWENTY different regular contributors, affording a rich basket each month of the gems of mind and the beauties of thought.

Let no one fail then to realize how much pleasure may be purchased, how much innocent and useful enjoyment may be insured to the family circle, how much intelligence obtained, and how many leisure hours rendered valuable and agreeable, by enclosing ONE DOLLAR as below, and receiving the Magazine for a whole year. M. M. BALLOU, PUBLISHER AND PROPRIETOR, No. 22 WINTER STREET, BOSTON.

CORNER OF WASHINGTON AND BOYLSTON STREETS, BOSTON.—THE OLD BOYLSTON MARKET.

BOYLSTON MARKET, BOSTON.

We present on the preceding page a very spirited representation of a very busy part of our city, a view taken at the corner of Boylston and Washington Streets, and drawn expressly for us by Mr. Champney. We are taking great pains to obtain local sketches, which are not only of present interest, but hereafter will be of the greatest value. Our numbers should be carefully preserved and bound for future reference, and will be found to repay the trouble amply. How much would we not give to have a glimpse of this very locality as it appeared forty-six years ago, the date when Boylston Market was first opened to the public! The Market House remains unchanged, but all else is altered. The fashions, too, have changed altogether. Boylston Hall, seen on the right of our picture, was so named in honor of Nicholas Ward Boylston, Esq., an opulent and eminent citizen. It was first opened in 1810. The proprietors were incorporated February 27, 1809, and the foundation of the building was laid in the following April. The land belonging to the corporation was formerly owned by Samuel Welles, Esq., of whose heirs it was purchased by Mr. Joseph C. Dyer, and by him sold for $20,560. Such has been the rise in the value of land, that it is now worth probably a quarter of a million. The building cost $39,000, exclusive of the cupola, which was built by private subscription. The clock was a donation from Mr. Boylston. The large hall over the market was quite a marvel in its day, and is still considered, in spite of some of the mammoth halls, a spacious place. It has been used for various purposes. Concerts have been given here—thousands of light fantastic toes have tripped over its boards. While the present Trinity Church, in Summer Street, was in process of erection, the society used it as a place of worship. Mr. Wyseman Marshall, for a time, gave a series of dramatic representations here. The market has always been well supplied, and many of the old house-holders of the South End have purchased their provisions here from the date of its erection. Though presenting no image of the bustle which surrounds Quincy Market, the exterior is still an animated place, and Mr. Champney has by no means exaggerated the crowd of buyers and sellers on the sidewalk. To the left is seen the track of the horse railroad, which curves into Washington Street at this place. The cars are seen further on, and the omnibuses, which are still running. The building with pillars, on the left, now occupied as a furniture store, was formerly used for the Boylston Bank. The whole picture is spirited and effective.

THE NEW ARMORY AND ARSENAL, NEW YORK CITY.

We present on this page two pictures from the pencil of Hill, drawn expressly for the Pictorial, representing the exterior of the new Armory and Arsenal at the corner of White and Elm Streets, New York city, and the interior of the large drill-room, with a regiment going through their exercises. The area of this building is 131 feet on White Street, and 84 on Elm. The material is a blue stone. The building is two stories high, the first 13, and the second 30 feet. The windows are very narrow, being only 18 inches wide; so that, in case of assault by a mob outside, the building could be defended successfully by fifty men, always supposing the attacking force to be without artillery. Its style is Gothic, and on the three corners of the building towers are placed; there will be five doors on White Street, and one on Elm, which are made of boiler iron. It is built on piles driven into the ground. It is a very handsome edifice, and is constructed on the very best plans for defence. On the centre of the roof is erected a large flag-staff, by which communication from this building to the arsenal up town may be carried on by signal telegraph. It is used as a receptacle for the artillery of the First Division of the New York State Militia. The lower story is the gun-room; and the upper a drill-room, and rendezvous, in case of riot. It is the largest drill-room in the country, affording ample space for a whole regiment to manoeuvre; and here the crack regiments of New York learn a great deal of that efficiency for which they are so celebrated. The corps represented in our picture is the 12th regiment, one of the first in the division, and containing some of the best companies. Among them are the Baxter Blues, Independent Guards, Lafayette Fusiliers, City Blues, City Musketeers, Tompkins 11th's, Baxter Guard, and others equally celebrated, not forgetting the famous Black Rifles. It is an acknowledged fact, that in no city of the United States is there a better military spirit than in New York. Very many of the officers devote as much time to their military duties as if they were in the regular service, and the drills are frequent and efficient. The parade of a New York regiment is a sight well worth witnessing. No regular troops surpass them in steadiness and precision. They execute the manual in a style that cannot be surpassed, and their marching and manoeuvring challenge the most critical. The New York troops embrace every arm of the service. Some of the New York companies have visited this city, so that all our citizens have had an opportunity of judging to what extent our enlogisms are just. We trust in future to chronicle many more of these visits; for nothing is better calculated to keep up a generous spirit of emulation, and break down absurd sectional prejudices. New York and Boston should be fast friends and neighbors. The interchange of military visits and courtesies has already been productive of excellent results, in increased good fellowship and fraternal feeling.

PERFIDY OF POLICE.

In the last century, a merchant of high respectability, in Bordeaux, had occasion to visit the metropolis upon commercial business, carrying with him bills and money to a very large amount. On his arrival at the gates of Paris, a gentle-looking man opened the door of his carriage, and addressed him to this effect:—"Sir, I have been waiting for you some time. According to my notes, you were to arrive at this hour; and your person, carriage and portmanteau exactly answer the description I hold in my hand. You will permit me to conduct you to the minister of police, Monsieur de Sartines." The gentleman, astonished at the interruption, and at hearing the name of the lieutenant of the police mentioned, demanded to know what Monsieur de Sartines wanted with him; adding that he never had committed any offence against the laws, and that he could have no right to interrupt him. The messenger declared himself ignorant of the cause of detention; stating that when he had conducted him to M. de Sartines, he should have executed his orders. After some further explanations, the gentleman permitted the officer to conduct him accordingly. M. de Sartines received him with great politeness; and, after requesting him to be seated, to his great astonishment, he described his portmanteau; and told him the exact room in bills and specie he had brought with him to Paris, where he was to lodge, his usual time of going to bed, and a number of circumstances which the gentleman had conceived could only be known to himself. Monsieur de Sartines having thus excited attention, put this extraordinary question to him:—"Sir, are you a man of courage?" The gentleman, still astonished at the singularity of such an interrogatory, demanded the reason why he put such a question, adding, that no man ever doubted his courage. M. de Sartines replied: "Sir, you are to be robbed and murdered this night! If you are a man of courage, you must go to your hotel and retire at the usual hour; but do not fall asleep. Neither will it be proper for you to look under the bed, or into any of the closets. You must place your portmanteau in its usual situation near your bed, and discover no suspicion. Leave what remains to me. If, however, you do not feel your courage sufficient to bear you out, I will find a person who shall personate you, and go to bed in your stead. After further explanation, which convinced the gentleman that M. de Sartines's intelligence was accurate, he refused to be personated, and formed a resolution literally to follow the directions. He went to bed at his usual hour; at half past twelve (the time mentioned by M. de Sartines), the door burst open, and three men entered with a dark lantern, daggers and pistols. The gentleman perceived one of them to be his own servant. They rifled his portmanteau, and settled the plan of putting him to death. The gentleman, hearing all this, was under great perturbation of mind. At the moment the villains were preparing to commit the horrid deed, four police officers, acting under M. de Sartines's orders, concealed under the bed and in the closet, rushed out and seized the offenders with the property in their possession, and in the act of preparing to commit the murder. Thus the perpetration of the atrocious deed was prevented, and sufficient evidence obtained to convict the offenders. M. de Sartines's intelligence enabled him to prevent this robbery and murder; which, but for the accuracy of the system, would probably have been carried into execution.

INTERIOR OF THE NEW YORK ARMORY, WHITE STREET.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

I AM LONELY.

BY G. M. DUNN.

I am lonely—I am lonely,
With thousands round my way;
And my weary heart is sinking
'Neath its burden day by day.
My feelings and my sorrows,
My cares are all my own;
And thus though crowds are round my path,
Still I am all alone.

I am weary—I am weary
Of the heavy load I bear:
This load of bitter sorrow—
This heavy weight of care.
O, must I ever struggle thus
Along life's dreary road,
Till death with gentle hand shall take
From me this galling load?

I am mourning—sadly mourning
That my cherished hopes are o'er,
Which o'er my life a radiance shed
That it may know no more;
They have perished like the flowers,
Which beneath a summer sky
Expand their silken leaves, but fade
When winter draweth nigh.

I am longing—I am longing
For the hour when death shall come
To bear me to that better world—
That fairer, brighter home,
Where grief and sorrow come not,
And tears are known no more:
But joys like fadeless flowers bloom
Upon that radiant shore.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

MY PATIENT.

A PHYSICIAN'S REMINISCENCE.

BY WALTER DANFORTH.

It was late in the evening of the 25th of April, 182-, that a letter was put into my hands bearing in large characters on the envelope the words "private and confidential," and franked by Sir Graham Welburne, M. P. It ran thus:

"DEAR DOCTOR,—My travelling carriage will be at your door at ten o'clock to-morrow for the purpose of conveying you down to my house, about ten miles from town, where your services will be required. Let me implore you not to permit any engagement short of life or death, to prevent you from coming at the time and in the manner I have indicated. Your presence is required on matters of special importance, and I may add of special confidence. I shall, if possible, meet you on the road, that you may be to some extent prepared for the duties that will await you.
"I am, etc., etc. GRAHAM WELBURNE."

This communication, as the reader will imagine, threw me into a maze of conjectures. I anticipated being introduced to some scene of distress, and from the special confidence intimated in the baronet's note I could conceive of nothing but family discord as the occasion of it.

I made every arrangement, and without intimating to my wife my destination, jumped into the pea-green chariot and four the moment it arrived, the next morning, and was presently whirled out of town at the rate of twelve miles the hour. I did not meet Sir Graham as his letter had led me to suspect. On reaching the park gates, the reeking horses were drawn up, the groom behind leaped down, opened the carriage door, and with a bow told me that the baronet wished me to alight at the gates and walk up the avenue to the house. Of course I acquiesced, full of amazement at the apparent mystery which attended my movements. I walked up the long avenue, ascended the steps which led to the hall door, and even pushed it open without encountering a soul. On ringing, however, an elderly servant appeared, and inquired respectfully "if I was the doctor." I answered in the affirmative, and she said Sir Graham was waiting for me in an adjoining room. I thought I perceived something unusual in the countenance and manner of this woman, as also in the appearance of the groom who attended me from town. I was soon, however, in the presence of the baronet. The room was lofty and furnished in a style of elegance. Busts, statues and valuable paintings graced the sides, together with a noble library, containing, I should judge, several thousand volumes. I had merely time to cast a hasty glance around me, when Sir Graham issued from a door at the further end of the library, and advancing towards me hastily, shook my hand with cordiality. He wore a flowered, green velvet dressing-gown, and his shirt wrists were turned down so as to cover the sleeves. I had never seen a finer figure or a more expressive countenance, the latter, however, was clouded with a mixed expression of sternness and anxiety.

"Doctor," said he, in a low tone and with considerable agitation, "I have sent for you on a most melancholy errand. I have infinite confidence in your experience and secrecy, of both of which I am unfortunately compelled to avail myself."

He paused, and looked full at me. I bowed, and he continued: "You may have heard surmises about Lady Mary and myself. We have occasioned considerable speculation recently, I believe. I now find that the time has arrived when I must explain all. You have met her ladyship occasionally, I believe?"

I replied that I had.

"Did you ever observe any peculiarity in her deportment?"

I looked, at a loss to understand him.

"I—I mean, did you ever observe anything peculiar in the expression of her features?"

"Certainly not."

"Doctor," said he, in a voice of great agitation, and grasping my arm with nervous energy, "there is no time to lose. One word will explain all. It is horrible torture to me, but I can conceal it no longer. You must be told the truth at once. My wife is insane!" He gasped rather than spoke the last word, and instantly covered his face with both his hands, his whole frame shaking with agitation. We were both silent for a moment,—I with amazement, and he from the intensity of his emotion.

"Do you use the word in its literal, its medical sense?" said I, finally.

"Yes, I do. I mean that I am wedded to a mad woman!"

I implored him to restrain his feelings, which he finally succeeded in doing to a certain extent. Arrangements were immediately made for me to see the unhappy Lady Mary. I visited her in the drawing-room, alone, Sir Graham refused to accompany me. I conversed with her nearly half an hour. As far as I could judge from appearances, the lady was as perfectly sane as I considered myself. I could detect no wildness of the eye, no incoherence of speech, no peculiarity of deportment, nothing but an air of anxiety. At the expiration of the half hour I returned to the library and to the baronet.

"Well, doctor, am I right or wrong in my awful suspicions?" inquired Sir Graham, trembling from head to foot, as we stood in the bow window of his library.

I shook my head and informed him of the substance of the conversation which had passed between us. He sighed deeply, and covered his eyes for a moment with his hands.

"Is she ever violent?" I asked.

"No. Would to Heaven she were. Anything but this dreadful monotony of melancholy madness. The dreadful conviction forces itself upon me that I must separate from her. I can scarcely control my feelings at the thought, the maddening thought that my sweet wife must be banished from my bosom, from her home, and become the inmate of a—of a—" He ceased abruptly, apparently overcome by the dreadful suggestion.

"Doctor," he continued, after a few moments' pause, while a wild smile shot across his features, "I know I am acting imprudently in disclosing a secret to you unnecessarily; but I know it will be safe with you!"

I bowed and listened in breathless wonder. My flesh crept all over as he continued. I had been from the first the dupe of a madman. His eye was fixed upon me with a fiendish expression. I was almost deprived of utterance, and was startled back to consciousness by a loud laugh from the baronet. He was pointing at me, with his hand and finger raised so that they almost touched my face, with a derisive air.

The secret of Sir Graham was a pretended discovery of a new method of converting useless substances into tallow for the purpose of making candles, which when carried into effect would yield him a revenue of forty thousand pounds a year. That the king had employed every means to compel him to disclose it, and because he could not, he had sent spies to watch his movements, and if possible discover cause sufficient to arrest him for high treason! All this shocking nonsense he told me in a serious, energetic tone of voice.

"But," he continued, "I have not disclosed this great secret to you for nothing. It became necessary that I should develop a new source of independence; and thank Heaven it is found at last! Both you and the world will ere long hear much of the causes which have induced me to apply myself to the development of this new source of wealth!"

I allowed him to ramble on as he pleased, devising, meanwhile, in my mind the best measures to pursue under these unfortunate circumstances. I thought it on the whole, best not to alarm his suspicions by any overt act, but to take my departure as quickly and as quietly as possible, and on reaching London to communicate with his brother-in-law, Mr. Cavendish, with whom I had a slight acquaintance, and take measures to secure the safety, not only of the baronet, but also of his unfortunate lady.

"Well, Sir Graham," said I, "I must leave you, for I have many engagements in town."

"Mind me, doctor," said he, abruptly, his features assuming a strange expression; "with reference to Lady Mary, I will have no violence used!"

I assured him not, with unaffected amazement. We walked together, arm-in-arm, down to the park gates, and as I stepped into the carriage, the baronet said, with strenuous emphasis:

"Of course, doctor, I hold you personally responsible for whatever measures are adopted, and shall await your return with anxiety."

I jumped in rather hastily and the chariot drove off.

"Hallo! hark ye, fellow! Stop! stop!" shouted the baronet. "Stop or I'll fire!"

The postilion, on hearing these last alarming words, instantaneously drew up. I looked through the window and beheld Sir Graham hurrying towards us, fury in his features, and a pocket-pistol in his right hand.

"Good Heavens!" I exclaimed, "what can be the meaning of this extraordinary conduct, Sir Graham?"

"I suspect you intend violence against me, doctor."

"Against you; against anybody! You are dreaming, sir!"

"Ah, I see farther into your designs than you imagine. You wish to extract from me my secret for your own exclusive advantage. So mark me, if you come again to the hall you shall not return alive!"

He strode haughtily away, waved his hand to the postilion, and we soon lost sight of the unhappy lunatic.

During the next few weeks, I visited, together with the most eminent physician in London, the family of Sir Graham almost daily. His malady broke out into violent paroxysms, rendering restraints of a very severe character often necessary. His bodily health continued to improve, but in his eye was the expression of settled insanity. His case assumed a different aspect almost daily, and I confess, that with the experienced physician to whom I have alluded, I began to think that there was little reasonable hope of his recovery. But he did recover, and in a most singular manner; and in order to explain the cause of his recovery, I must detail briefly the reasons of his aberration, as I subsequently ascertained them through the public prints.

It seems that very soon after his marriage his solicitor suddenly travelled to the continent after him, to communicate to him the startling, but to the baronet, ridiculous intelligence that a stranger was laying claim to all he held in the world, of title and of fortune. He treated the information with contemptuous indifference, and the solicitor left him, entirely re-assured by the baronet's confidence. Nothing more was heard for some months, until one evening, as Sir Graham was dining at his club, a letter, purporting to come from the solicitor of the person preferring the claim, was placed in his hands, stating the stranger's whole claim, and finally roused the baronet from his lethargy. Several passages of it tallied strangely with some passages of Sir Graham's family history. He instantly consulted his solicitor, by whom his worst suspicions were aggravated. Not that the lawyer considered his client's case desperate, but he assured him that a harassing and ruinous litigation and public exposure were inevitable. This sense of danger pressed upon Sir Graham's feelings to a fearful extent. He anxiously concealed from his lady the terrible jeopardy in which everything he possessed on earth was placed, and the constant effort and constraint, the withering anxiety, the long continued apprehensions of ruin, at length disordered and finally overthrew his intellect, leaving him as I have already described him—the ruin of a once accomplished and gifted man. To support his claim, every quarter was ransacked for evidence by the zealous attorney of the new man, and often in a highly indelicate and offensive manner. This was the condition of things when I was sent for by the baronet. The contest respecting the title and estates went on as rapidly as possible. The stranger's pretensions consisted of an alleged earlier right under the entail.

On Monday, just two months after I was first called to see Sir Graham, the trial of the important cause which was to decide the proprietorship of his title and possessions came on. The baronet was in court, notwithstanding his malady. He could not have been kept away without employing violence. Great interest was excited, and the court was crowded at an early hour. I occupied a seat by the side of Sir Graham. The counsel took their seats—six in the interest of the baronet and three in that of his opponent. A special jury was sworn. The judge took his seat on the bench, the case was called, and the witnesses summoned. The junior counsel for the plaintiff rose to open the pleadings. He was proceeding in his statement of the case when his client's attorney was conducted through the immense crowd with the assistance of an officer, and made his appearance within the bar, pale and agitated. The plaintiff had been found dead in his bed, on that morning, having died from excesses committed at a tavern dinner on the evening previous. He died single, leaving no heirs, and there was of course an end to the whole matter, which had been attended with so much misery to us all. As I observed before, I was sitting beside the baronet. He watched all the proceedings with the intensest interest. On hearing the announcement of his adverse claimant's death, he rose up, and with a shriek which re-echoed through the court-room, fell again, senseless, into my arms. He was borne out into the air, and on recovering, was no longer a lunatic. His prostration was, however, complete. The relaxation from the constant tension of muscle and excitement of nerve to which he had been for weeks subject, left him as weak as a child. But he gave unequivocal evidence of his restoration to reason, and in six weeks afterwards I had the satisfaction of beholding one of the most brilliant and accomplished gentlemen I ever knew enjoying complete health, and restored once more to society and the companionship of his beautiful wife.

A HEROIC WOMAN.

In the year 1786, the Grand Master of the Knights of Malta sent as a present, a costly bracelet of rubies to Madame Frenoy, a French lady of great beauty, in token of her extraordinary and gallant conduct when an Algerine corsair attacked the vessel in which she was a passenger. This lady was in a polacre, bound to Genoa, and the Algerine, coming alongside, poured in a broadside, and grappling with her, a number of the Algerines boarded her, sword in hand. The crew were about to submit to the enemy, when Madame du Frenoy snatched a sabre from a wounded sailor, and wielded it with astonishing courage and effect. The crew, animated and inspired by such an unexpected example of female valor, fought with enthusiasm, killed several of the pirates, and drove the remainder back to their own vessel. When this lady reached the shore, she was everywhere greeted with acclamations by the populace. The Marquis de St. Christophe waited upon her, and with his own hands placed a crown of laurel on her head, and a portrait of her was taken for the queen of France.—Sat. Gazette.

HOW TO GET RICH.

It is amusing to read the advertisements in the papers, which hold out great inducements for an immediate fortune. But few persons will be found simple enough to enclose even a "three cent stamp," which, in some cases, is all that is required to gain the desired information. The more grasping sages, however, are content with nothing short of a "dollar," to allow them to unfold the "secret" which, once possessed, opens the way to riches. Beware, young men, of these delusive baits, and remember that success is but the result of well-directed industry. This truth lies at the foundation of every fortune, which yields the highest satisfaction to its owner.—Lij: Illustrat.

[Translated from the French for Ballo's Pictorial.]

THE ANIMATED PICTURES.

BY ANNE T. WILDER.

Among my college friends, there is one who has become rich,—a common event, you will say. Perhaps so; but what is more, this friend is neither a rogue nor a simpleton; and what is better still, he continues to visit me, though I have no other equipage than the omnibus of the quarter. In fact, Arthur Lebel is not an ordinary man. He has never received prizes for themes; he reads Dante, and not Paul de Kock. So, at the Bourse, he passes for a poet or an idealist, designations evidently identical, and which are applied indifferently to all those who do not believe that everybody has dined when they emerge from Vefour's restaurant. However, Arthur Lebel gives balls and earns a hundred thousand francs per year, and he is therefore at heart an estimable man, who wants only a little selfishness to be a man of the world.

I went to see him a few days since; he gave me to read a letter received the night before, in which a young painter was recommended to him, who desired a place in his office; the demand would have appeared extravagant to any one else.

"Have you given him the place?" asked I.

"Of course; he needed it."

"And do you know him?"

"I saw him this morning."

"A copy of the portrait of Van Dyck, I suppose. Long hair, a red beard, and his coat buttoned up to the throat?"

"Not at all; a young man, blushing like a school-boy, scraping the floor with the tips of his toes, and looking for courage in his hat; sad, and a little pale, for he is just recovering from a severe illness."

"I understand you; one of those sublime simpletons of twenty years, who look upon life as an epic poem, pass in the world for stupid because they cannot make up their minds to be only witty, and who dare not eat at the table of the fortunate, for fear of appearing poor or badly brought up."

"We will verify this, for he dines with us to-day."

"Then I will remain."

The young artist arrived exactly at the appointed hour; there is nothing like the punctuality of people who have no watch. Arthur Lebel had the good sense not to introduce us to each other, so that we had no commonplaces or falsehoods to say; dinner was announced, and we seated ourselves at the table. The young man seemed at first unwilling to look, or hear, or speak; nevertheless, after the first course, he began to see, at the second he listened, at the dessert he recovered his speech. We interrogated him then, and he told us his story in a few words.

When very young, he dreamed of those artists of olden time, who, after having labored sixty years neglected or despised, died leaving a name which became a religion, and had wished to take up the cross like them, that he also might be worshipped after death. But his courage had failed at the very outset.

"Who knows whether labor would not have given it to you?" said Lebel.

"O, no, sir, for it was not weakness but ardor which ruined me. I could not regulate the study of art at will; as soon as I touched it, it carried me away. It was like the passion of a gambler. Art was for me the tunic of Nessus; hardly had I clasped it around me than it clung to me, and I could take it off only with my flesh and blood. My reason nearly gave way in the struggle."

"How! this illness from which you have just recovered?"

"Was the effect of the fascinations of painting."

"We both rested our elbows on the table, as if to signify that we were awaiting the story, and the young man resumed, slightly blushing:

"The hallucinations of music are often spoken of, but the ecstasies into which we may be thrown by painting are not so well known. More than one traveller remembers that, when in Italy, after having long admired the composition, design and coloring of some great master, the canvass suddenly seemed to become animated, and the personages detached themselves from it like phantoms. I had myself several times experienced this fascination, but it had always been brief, and, so to speak, voluntary. I had given myself up to it as to a dream which we know to be a dream, and by which we allow ourselves to be enthralled; a species of scenic representations which the imagination sometimes gives within us, and at which we are present as spectators.

"One evening, after having long studied a skeleton and drawn it in every posture, I had surrounded myself with works on physiognomy, and was seeking to penetrate the secret of this science which gauges the heart by the countenance. I was absorbed in the comparison of the observations made and the results obtained by different authors; my application was as entire as human application can be. No remembrance came to disturb me; for, a stranger to the world, occupied for several months with my studies alone, my mind had become like those shaded and motionless waters which reflect all objects in their lowest depths. Two o'clock in the morning suddenly sounded from the distant clock; this sound seemed to break the charm which separated me from the exterior world, and I aroused myself from my long reverie and looked around me.

"My lamp, without my noticing it, had insensibly grown dim, and was almost extinct. Surrounded by a brown hulo, it cast a reddish light which illuminated my attic with singular hues, like those of the setting sun. My skeleton, with a Greek cap over its ear and a Turkish pipe in its mouth, grinned in a corner that horrible smile which the painters of the middle ages have expressed with so much energy; limbs of plaster, suspended from the ceiling, waved in the night winds, and in the distance, a faint hum, a few dying murmurs, were heard, the last sounds of the great city about to fall asleep.

"While my attention had been sustained, I had not perceived my fatigue; but once aroused from my meditations, I felt something like the swimmer who, on quitting deep water where he has long been sporting without growing weary, suddenly feels his limbs relax and the languor of exhaustion seize his whole being. It seemed as if my attic was vacillating around me; my head swam, my hair seemed cold, and my feet lost sensation. Almost immediately I was seized with a dizziness which surrounded me with a thousand fiery circles. I saw the books on my table dance, the skeleton extend his hand to a bust of Niobe and begin to waltz with it; my little tubes of colors sprang upon my palette, forming grotesque quadrilles, and my pencils, arrayed in symmetrical rays, began to revolve like artificial suns around my easel.

"Bewildered, I closed my eyes and gave myself up to a sort of half swoon, during which everything was in confusion before me. I cannot tell how long this singular situation lasted, but after a long crisis, like that which a sick man experiences before he comes out of the delirium of a fever, everything cleared up, and I found myself standing in the middle of my room.

"It was broad day. The sun was throwing long rays on the paintings that encumbered my narrow apartment, and it seemed to me that each had assumed an expression of life which I had never before remarked. The canvass moved—the outlines became more decided. I found myself standing opposite the portrait of my great aunt, who, with her eyes cast down and her fan half raised, seemed to be playing modestly; her mouth suddenly trembled, and I heard these words fall from her lips:

"Speak to my parents, sir!"

"I stood with my head forward, motionless, bewildered, not knowing whether I was dreaming or not, when a voice behind me said:

"What do you think of me?"

"I turned; it was the portrait of my cousin, the sub-lieutenant, who, with his head and shoulders projecting, his glossy moustaches and eye as blue as porcelain, had addressed to me this question. I had not yet recovered from my surprise, when a thousand other questions, a thousand other exclamations resounded in my ears; all the portraits suspended to the walls of my attic were speaking.

"I sat down in terror, and cast around me a bewildered glance. I was nevertheless wide awake, I distinctly recognized my attic, I inhaled the morning breeze and the fragrance of my heliotrope; all this was not a dream. I continued, however, to hear the voices of my portraits, to see the canvass agitated and alive. The prodigy was so clear, so indisputable, that by degrees I became accustomed to it. The most singular fact ceases to surprise you when once established, for the evidence compels you to accept it. I rose again and walked a few steps around my room, listening to the fifty voices which mingled, were confounded, and incessantly recommenced the same phrase or word. One would have thought it a reunion of tame parrots or a circle of the fashionable world.

"Accursed painters," exclaimed I at last, 'who have given their pictures but a single idea!'

"And turning towards two indistinct portraits which time had nearly effaced:

"O my father, and my beloved mother, why did not the pencil reproduce your whole souls in your smiles, instead of nailing to your lips some merely civil phrase? And you, my pretty Theresa, could not that German dauber have given your mouth some expression besides that eternal ah! of polite astonishment?"

"At this moment my eyes fell on a little miniature, the masterpiece of a great artist; it was the portrait of my dearest friend and all which remained to me of him. An animated hue passed over his lips, they opened and spoke vaguely of the profound melancholy of earth, of a better world where life does not deceive; then recalling affecting remembrances, he recited to me in a low tone some verses written upon a woman whom he had loved and lost. Already his tremulous voice softened, and I felt two tears glisten beneath my eyelashes, when the exclamations of my family portraits redoubled and aroused me, in spite of myself, from my emotion. I shook my fist at my great aunt, my uncle and all my cousins, crying out to them to be silent, but uselessly; the sweet voice of my friend was lost amid their noisy sentences.

"O, who will deliver me," exclaimed I, 'from these organ-pipes which emit but one sound and deafen me! Why have I not here, instead of these coarse imitations, the poetic conceptions of our divine masters!'

"Suddenly a thought seized me.

"The museum! the museum! I could pronounce only these two words, and was overcome with joy. O, to hear the voices of the Virgins of Raphael, the Christs of Titian and Corregio, the Holy Martyrs of Dominichino. Thy shepherds, O Poussin! the gay refrains of thy shepherds, chanting beneath the groves of Arcadia, beside a tomb overgrown with ivy! Silence, miserable portraits—silence, stupid echoes! 'The museum! the museum!' And I rushed into the street to hasten to the Louvre.

"On going out I ran against a porter who was carrying a large picture with its head down. It was the beautiful marchioness whom I had seen a few months before, asking alms for prisoners and orphans. Her month was half open; I thought she was about to pronounce some holy word. I stopped, already edified, when she uttered a name which made me start. It was that of her dressmaker.

"I recommenced my race, still under the dominion of the same hallucination. On passing by the stall of a picture-dealer, I heard lamentable cries from old, smoky pictures, which filled the narrow shop. A Naiad, by Boucher, stationed at the door, was weeping over her powdered coiffure, exposed to the dripping from an cave-trough, and a shepherd in rose-colored satin, by Watteau, demanded to re-enter, exclaiming that he was afraid of the horses.

"I hope the museum is not closed," said I, redoubling my pace; 'I hope they are not already preparing its halls for the exhibition, and rolling up a Salvator Roma to give place to an M. Cabassol. Especially do I hope they are not repairing the irreparable galleries. For there are two things in Paris on which one can never rely—the streets, which are constantly being repaved, and the public edifices, which are always closed. But no, everybody is entering freely to-day; it is a day of public admission.'

"I followed one of my neighbors who had just introduced himself with the passport of a foreigner and a piece of thirty sous. I showed my card, I pressed both hands of the door-keeper; but for the delay I should have entranced him. I mounted the stairs, and the whirlwinds of sound began to reach me; I approached and the door opened. No human tongue can ever express what I experienced. There was a tempest of voices enough to craze me. Discordant songs, foreign languages, forgotten axioms, the accents of all ages, threats, prayers, loves, contests, sounds of heaven, sounds of the sea, all these rolled confusedly through these vast saloons like a hurricane! I stopped, pale, haggard and trembling in every limb; I was like a traveller led by night to a forsaken spot, who finds himself suddenly at a dance of witches.

"Meanwhile the desire to penetrate these galleries prevailed over everything else; as on a battle-field, the firing, the clashing of arms, the neighing of the horses and the smell of blood influence you, so this tumult, these murmurs, these songs which intermingled and resounded through the halls, attracted me in spite of myself.

"O, if I can only reach the Italian gallery!" I thought I.

"And at last resolving upon an effort, I closed my ears with both hands and began to run. No misfortune happened to me in traversing the French gallery. I heard only a dull and monotonous buzzing, like that of a dozen water-mills; these were the Romans of David reciting tirades from the tragedy of the empire; but on arriving at the Dutch school, I slipped; one of my hands left my ear, and a hundred clamorous voices penetrated my brain. On the right, on the left, it was only abusive language and the songs of drunkards; I was in the midst of the paintings of Teniers. I turned, but the Naiads of Rubens beckoned to me with rude laughter. Everywhere around me I perceived only handsome soldiers proudly resting on their left sides with caps over their ears; great noblemen with full faces. It seemed as if I had been transported to one of those cabarets of Amsterdam, where the exiled princes and ruined gentlemen of the age of Louis XIV. learned practical philosophy between a pot of beer and a bar-maid. But what especially struck me in the midst of this tumult, was to see the young artists tranquilly seated and painting, while the attendant, with his hands behind him, was slowly pacing the gallery and recommending me not to run so fast.

"At the first instant I heard only a lively and mocking marmur. The Cupids of Albano were pointing to the Angels of Raphael, who were concealing themselves, ashamed, beneath their wings. But as I advanced, the murmurs increased. In vain I turned on every side, I perceived only women! on the right, on the left, above, below, there were only rosy mouths talking or singing, coquettish heads nodding, velvet cheeks blushing to be seen, soft looks which summoned one to approach. Only it seemed to me that, at intervals, a ravishing melody rose from all the pictures, and a harmonious echo resounded through the long gallery; but that lasted only a moment. Almost insensibly the noisy confusion returned, and then there was an inexplicable mingling of religious thoughts and profane exclamations, a grotesque conflict between heaven and earth, an eternal debate between God and Satan.

"This tumult, less noisy than that of the Flemish school, was even more painful. The ear was not wounded, but one experienced a sort of inward headache; it was like a sound within the soul. All emotions, all interest, awoke and struggled for the mastery; one felt himself at once a pagan and a Christian. The conflict between mind and matter was transferred from the pictures to myself. I was then uncertain, palpitating, not knowing which to listen to of these opposing voices which called me with equal sweetness; I would have paid with the rest of my life for a little order and peace; I cried with fury:

"Silence, Cupids! silence, miserable Olympians! Let me hear thee, O Christ! Speak to me, Mary, mother of angels, star of Paradise!"

"And I went from one picture to another in despair; I threw myself at the feet of the beautiful gardener's wife; I extended supplicating hands to the archangel Michael; I conjured Raphael himself, who contemplated me with head inclined. He was perhaps about to reply, when I felt a hand laid on my shoulder. I turned; I was surrounded by soldiers to whom the attendant was pointing me out. I attempted to escape them, but the same instant a dizziness made everything disappear, and I fainted. When I recovered consciousness, I was in an insane hospital, and was told that I had been deranged for three months. All was then explained to me, and I comprehended that I must renounce painting."

"And this was doubtless a great sorrow," said Arthur Lebel; "you passed six weeks at least in cursing the fate which compelled you to quit your sun to descend to prosaic life?"

"I passed six weeks in learning arithmetic, and at the end of that time procured a letter of recommendation to you."

I took the hand of the young artist and pressed it in mine.

"Sir," cried I, "we shall be friends. You have not mistaken enthusiasm for genius and have preferred possessing common sense to being a great man! God protect you! you are a rare soul. As for happiness, be not anxious, you will find it; for you have sought it as Christ has told us to seek the truth, with a simple heart."

JAMES R. ANDERSON.

MR. JAMES R. ANDERSON.

The accompanying portrait, drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Charles Barry, is from a photograph taken for us by Messrs. Meade Brothers of New York, and is presented as an excellent likeness of Mr. Anderson, one of the first actors of the age. During his recent engagement at the National Theatre in this city, he won new laurels, and added to that popularity which he already enjoyed in our critical community. Mr. Anderson is a native of Edinburgh, Scotland. He is in the prime of life, and has a fine and expressive face and a commanding figure. Liberally educated at the high school in Edinburgh, and afterwards studying under Dr. Ferguson, he chose the stage as a profession in early life, resolved to qualify himself, by hard study, for the commanding position he long since attained. In the process of developing his powers and familiarizing himself with the requirements of the drama, he confined himself for a long time to the provincial boards of England, Ireland and Scotland. After figuring as a leading actor, he became manager of a theatrical circuit, and conducted it with great spirit and success for several years. In 1837, while supporting Mr. Macready in a star engagement, he made such an impression on that eminent tragedian, that he offered him a prominent position at Covent Garden Theatre, London. Mr. Anderson immediately accepted the proposal, and, after a brilliant debut, became a permanent favorite with the metropolitan audience. In the plays of Shakspeare, which Mr. Macready produced with the original text, and at a great expense, Mr. Anderson shared with him the applause of the public. Although the part of Claude Melnotte was written expressly for Macready, yet when Mr. Anderson assumed it, the critics admitted that he was superior to the original representative. We first saw him in this part, and although we have seen many performers in the same role, we are still of the opinion we then held, that Mr. Anderson is the best Claude Melnotte on the stage. The fire, fervor and vigor he throws into it, realize the author's idea, and sweep away the spectator in a flood of sympathy, fairly drowning those moral objections to the dramatist's creation which intrude themselves on the mind when the part is entrusted to a less exalted interpreter. A critic said of his unexampled success in this character: "It was not that Mr. Anderson's conception was superior to Macready's, but that he has what that finished gentleman cannot claim—youth, fire and spirit! qualities essential to the character. Macready, who, as a polished artist, has no superior living, acted the character. Mr. Anderson not only acts but looks it." Under the late Madame Vestris's management of Covent Garden, Mr. Anderson was for three years a leading attaché of the house, and when Mr. Macready left for the United States, he took the parts which he vacated, both in the old drama and in the new pieces written for Macready, with complete success. With the memory of Kean yet fresh, and with that of Macready undisturbed, for a young actor, following so closely in their footsteps, to create enthusiasm by his conceptions of Hamlet, Othello, Macbeth, Romeo, etc., was indeed a triumph; nor can we wonder that, years ago, Mr. Macready predicted that he would one day be the greatest actor in England. On the eve of his first visit to the United States, a few years since, he played Hamlet, the most difficult character in the range of drama, before the queen and such an audience as a royal visit to the theatre always assembles, in a style of excellence that electrified the house and drew forth the warmest eulogies of the press. His first tour in this country was a series of triumphs. He visited all our principal cities on the Atlantic seaboard, at the west and the southwest, and everywhere proved attractive. The critics were all but unanimous in his favor. His subsequent engagements have been even more successful. Mr. Anderson's versatility is very great, his repertoire embracing some of the strongest contrasts of character on the stage. He possesses, in an unrivalled degree, the power of identifying himself with the character he assumes, and of completely fascinating, magnetizing, as it were, the attention of an audience, no matter how diversified in taste and character. This is because his impersonations bear the stamp of truth—and truth, in the dramatic art at least, never fails to produce an impression. The most unthinking observer recognizes the image of feelings, passions and emotions, which are a part of his own heritage. Mr. Anderson never forgets himself for a single instant on the stage, or rather, to speak more correctly, he forgets himself entirely throughout the character he assumes. There are no moments when Anderson the actor is before us—it is always Hamlet, or Othello, or Melnotte, or Benedict, as the case may be. And when an actor succeeds in producing this impression of reality on his auditors, he generally influences those engaged with him in the business of the stage. Mr. Anderson is supported during his present tour in the States, by Miss Agnes Ellsworth, a lady, who, though she has not long been in the profession, we believe, yet possesses great histrionic power, enhanced by the effects of an attractive person. During their New York engagement she was eminently successful. During his present visit, Mr. Anderson has appeared before us in the character of a dramatist, a "sensation" play, entitled "Clouds and Sunshine," being his first offering in this line. It has been somewhat severely handled by some of the New York critics, but it produces the effect for which it was evidently written—being pre-eminently an acting play.

JAFFIER ALEE MOHAMMED,

THE REIS OF KEYERPOOR, UPPER SCINDE.

This gentleman on this page, not remarkable for his beauty, but got up in a style of gorgeous oriental magnificence as to costume, is quite a noted character, and has lately produced an immense sensation in England by his presence and by his disputes with the East India Company. The question at issue between this prince and the company is of a simple character, though it appears likely to cause protracted disputes. The prince, enjoying no longer an independent sovereign authority, has a claim to a pension from the British Indian Government. But this claim is not of an indisputable character. It was promised by the East India Company, in 1800, to the heir apparent of the state, which had been absorbed into the British dominions, and was regularly paid to him and to his son and successor until 1849, when the recipient died without male issue, leaving no will. His two daughters, however, had married the sons of an Indian noble, with the understanding that they should inherit the property of their father-in-law, and that one of them should succeed to his title. The question is, whether the deceased prince had the right to make such an agreement. However, only one of his sons-in-law, the subject of our present notice, survived him, and he put forth a claim to his late father-in-law's pension. For several years the matter was litigated between the prince and the authorities in India and in England, and in 1844 he visited London to plead personally his own cause. It does not appear that the company has acted, in this case, with generosity or candor, as the representative of the dethroned family. The prince, like Ali Morrad, of Khayrpore, appears once more to urge his case upon the justice and the good feeling of the English public. He is a noble looking, fine man, right royal in his mien, but evidently something the worse for suffering from mal-treatment at the hands of the East India Company, who lopped off about $450,000 a year of his income, and left him about $600,000 a year, which he now possesses, and which enables him to seek justice for the wrong that has been done him, to visit England and Ireland, and behold what is to be seen in these countries. His hair has become gray—not from age, but from troubles. His age is not more than forty-five years. We understand it changed its color in one night, in consequence of the fright and annoyance caused to him by the East India Company. He wears an emerald ring on his finger, "the Mountain of Fire," which is valued at £40,000; and his sword-bearer, a Poloechee, of the name of Poloo—a smart, wiry Eastern—carries the famous sword of Tamerlane, the conqueror of India, which the Reis values at $100,000, and which is an innocent looking scimitar, in a shagreen scabbard, elaborately enamelled in grand style, and the temper and power of which are said to be unparalleled in the entire armory of the East. His blade is as sharp as that of a razor, and cuts its way through every obstacle without much effort on the part of him who uses it. He is a Mohammedan in religion, and strict in the observance of the Prophet's rules; and, at night, his faithful sword-bearer, the Poloechee, sleeps across the door of his bed-chamber, whilst he guards his highness, and safely protects the inestimable sword of Tamerlane. With regard to the sword, we should state that the blade throughout is curiously watered in a most admirable manner, and that figures and names engraved on it are nearly worn from age—but the weapon, though innocent looking, is, at the same time, true and trusty. And what affections must his highness centre in it, when he values it at the price of a large Irish estate! and the emerald ring at the cost of two Irish estates! The sword fully bears out the character given by writers on India, of the great value, and beauty, and temper, of steel blades made in ancient times in the East. His highness is most anxious to convey as many inventions as possible into his kingdom, and for that purpose he has ordered an electric telegraph from London, with which he intends to connect his fort with his capital. He is particularly anxious on the subject of flax manufacturing and lace—but the former chiefly, as Scinde, in which Keyerpoor is situate, is a great flax growing country, sufficient to afford sufficient flax to England and Ireland for the purpose of linen. The Reis is resolved to prosecute his suit against the East India Company for the loss sustained by the spoliation he has suffered. He speaks the Persian tongue, and but few of his suite speak a word of English. His revenue arises chiefly from coal tax, fishery tax, and tax on land, and, as we have above stated, he now possesses about $600,000 a year. The action of the Reis and of the queen of Oude in coming all the way from India to seek redress at the hands of the British government, shows that they are not altogether behind the age in smartness.

THE BEGGARS OF PARIS.

A singular race of beings are the apparently miserable wretches who implore your charity in the streets of Paris, with an authorization from the police prominently displayed to all beholders. Often the mutilated creatures, who have just excited your pity and benevolence, return to their homes, throw their crutches and bandages aside, and many miracles are accomplished in an instant. The lame walk easily, the blind see, the one-armed have both limbs sound again, the hunchbacked lose their deformity, and wooden legs are kicked into a corner! A blind man was long stationed against a wall on the Boulevards. A young woman, in going to her daily occupation, passed the spot every day, and regularly gave the beggar a son in passing; but one day, through preoccupation or forgetfulness, she gave him nothing. No sooner had she passed, than the "blind man" called out: "Ha! you have forgotten me to-day, kind lady!" Another beggar, "afflicted" in like manner, receiving a copper from a gentleman, said: "My good sir, couldn't you give me another in place of this? It's a Belgian son, and don't pass here!" On the quay Malaquais an old fellow was for some months in the habit of seating himself, with a dog attached to a bit of string. The man exclaimed at every moment: "Pity the blind, if you please—pity the blind!" At length a policeman observed that the beggar had as good sight as anybody, and took the cheat before the commissioner of the quarter. "Why do you beg?" demanded that functionary. "You can see as well as any man." "But sir," replied the fellow, "I never said I was blind. I only cried—pity the blind!—and I meant my dog, which is as blind as a bat. Examine him." The rascal's wit saved him from punishment. You see that the beggars of Paris are as much given to knavery as those of any other part of the world.—N. Y. Picayune.

THE REIS OF KEYERPOOR, UPPER SCINDE.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ARCHITECT.—The Coliseum at Rome was erected by the Emperor Vespasian.
CHIEF.—An introduction of that sort to a lady at a ball does not warrant your speaking to her in the street. The recognition must come from the lady.

SPLINTERS.

.... In Philadelphia, where snow is rare, they charge five dol-

FAST AND SLOW

LAMAS—An experiment is being made to naturalize the Peruvian lama in the island of Cuba. The lama is valuable both for its wool and as a beast of burden.

MARRIAGES.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mrs. Mary Searle, 63; Mrs. Lydia A. Rogers, 66; Mr. Dexter Blackman, 2; Mr. Patrick Gargen, 49; Mrs. Nancy Goldburg, 64; Mr. Melville, wife of Mr. Otis Williams, 61; Hannah C. Young, 61; Mrs. Anna M. Smith, wife of Mr. C. W. Smith; Pearson David E. Powers, 81; at Somerville, Mr. Isaac Tufts, 85; Mrs. Harriet L., wife of Henry A. Hill, 37; at Dorchester, Mr. Stephen H. Cleaveland, 45; at Brookline, Franklin O., only son of Aaron Kimball, age 38; at South Malden, Mrs. Lydia Nelson, 91; at Brighton, Mrs. Hannah, widow of the late Rev. Samuel Geob., 66; at Holden, David, son of Jonathan Chaffin, 21; at Oakham, Lorenia Davis, 31; at Worcester, Alvin White, 55; at Stockbridge, Mrs. Sarah W., wife of Hon. John Z. Goodrich—at Amherst, Mr. Seth Smith, 81; at Northampton, Mrs. Elizabeth, wife of the late Moses Bartlett, 85; at Hyndeville, Mrs. Nathan James, the oldest man, and the last Revolutionary soldier to Williamsburg, 91; at New Bedford, Mrs. Apphia, widow of the late Abner Shepherd, 87; at South Dartmouth, Rebecca, 82; at Taunton, Mrs. Charles, 81; at Taunton, Hon. Joshua Green, 77; at Wellfleet, Mr. John Y. Newcomb, 94; at Nantucket, Mrs. Susan, wife of Peter H. Chase, 23; at Hanover, S. H., Mrs. Abigail, wife of Dr. Asa Crosby, 83; at Cincinnati, Ohio, Mr. Jason Meessinger, formerly of Dedham, Mass., 83.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary miscellany of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems by such authors as Hawthorne, Trollope and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable cities, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, and of the building of every modern steamer or vessel there, of the principal ships and steamers of the navy, and merchant service, of the finest and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE

|                             |        |
|-----------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year..... | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " ".....     | 10 00  |
| 10 " " ".....               | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirtieth copy gratis.

Published every SATURDAY, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 92 WATER STREET, BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Bal-more; R. A. Duncan, 192 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roy, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Kingdold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PAST.

BY MATRIN M. BALLOU.

From up the distant corridor
Of memory's crowded halls,
Upon my more than yielding heart
A thrilling echo falls.

Aslant my weary vision,
In twilight's hallowed rays,
Flit shadows soft, recalling
The joys of childhood's days.

A mother's dear voice bleeding
To accents sweet and mild,
Sounds up time's lengthened vista,
As when I was a child.

But, ah! the stern reality
Since then this heart has known,
Hath given to these memories
A joy that's all their own.

THE SUPREME.

Is there a God? All nature shows
There is—and yet no mortal knows;
The mind that could this truth conceive,
Which brute sensation never taught,
No longer to the dust would cleave,
But grow immortal with the thought.—JAMES MONTGOMERY.

FINE SMILE.

As rooted to the rock the yearning sea-weed grows,
And sways unto the tide, and feels its ebb and flows—
So unto reason fixed, yet floating ever free,
In feeling's ebb and flow the artist's life should be.—W. W. STORY.

AN OLD THOUGHT.

Not by appointment do we meet delight
And joy; they heed not our expectancy;
But round some corner in the streets of life
They, on a sudden, clasp us with a smile.—GERALD MASSEY.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

The other day we had a call from Lieut. Derby, United States Topographical Engineers, on his way to Detroit, where his command is stationed. This gentleman is better known to the reading public as "John Phoenix," the nom de plume affixed to those original humorous sketches which have convulsed the millions from the Atlantic to the Pacific. An intelligent whaling-captain tells us, that the bomb-lance, a conical weapon loaded and fired from a gun, must prove very effective in killing whales. Soon after the lance enters the monster, a slow-match affixed to the charge explodes it, and certain death ensues. .... Dr. Kane's book has had a prodigious success. A few days ago not a copy was to be had in Boston for love or money. Childs & Peterson cannot print them as fast as they are called for. .... What a vast amount of merriment and jollity the sleighing season produces! There is joy and exhilaration in the very "tictination of the bells—bells—bells," as poor Poe sang. .... It is said that the Duke of St. Thora, one of the Emperor Faustin's favorite nobles, is visiting the United States on matrimonial thoughts intact. Will any girl play Desdemona to this West Indian Othello? .... Barnum, the great showman, though he failed for half a million, is not discouraged; he is now acting his old part in Europe, exhibiting Tom Thumb, and also a juvenile wonder, Miss Howard. .... Bouquet-throwing is an art. We have seen a prima donna nearly prostrated by a ponderous pile of flowers. And, by the way, why is a lady who lodges up one pair of stairs like another goddess of flowers? Because she's a second floorer (Flora). .... Gibraltar must be a great place for lovers of fruit. You can buy there two pounds of delicious grapes, two pounds of apples, two of peaches, two of lemons, and a basket to carry them in, for twenty-five cents. .... Are persons who thoughtlessly endorse back notes aware that, in case of the bank failing, they are liable for the amount? .... A shop in Hartford has the following monumental inscription:—"Whiskers died here." Who the unfortunate Whiskers was nobody knows. Probably some dandy, who, from his magnificent hirsute appendages, was thus entitled by his admiring friends. .... Rev. James N. Cusick, an Indian Baptist minister, settled over his countrymen of the "Six Nations," at Grand River, Canada West, preaches to over 12,000 red men of the forest. .... The desire for official notoriety is an absurd mania. There were 6000 applicants for the post of messenger to carry the electoral vote of Indiana to Washington. We have known men ready to relinquish a business worth $3000 dollars a year to obtain a $1000 berth under the government. Strange! .... Dartmouth College nobly refused to receive a large donation of Western lands, because their acceptance would impoverish a poor widow. Some corporations grasp all they can, no matter whether it comes to them by genuine or by "rascally" philanthropy. .... The Friends were originally called "Seekers," from their seeking for the truth. One of their prominent members gave them the name of Quakers, because Fox, their founder, admonished them to tremble at the name of the Most High. .... A section of the cable for the proposed telegraph across the Atlantic, was on exhibition in the Merchants' Exchange News Room, of this city, recently. The specimen exhibited is a beautiful piece of workmanship. The cable is now being manufactured in England, and will probably be completed by the middle of next summer. .... Mr. James Anderson, who lately performed an engagement at the National, in this city, is the best Claude Melnotte on the stage. .... Our city is getting to be quite romantic. A highwaywoman lately stopped a lady in the street, and demanded her money or her life. If the lady was properly hooped, the female robber could not get near enough to her to take her life. .... The Boston Athenaeum library has been re-arranged and classified throughout. Mr. William F. Poole, the present librarian, is just the man for the place he occupies. .... Max Maretzek, the wags say, took Madame Anna Lagrange to Cuba because he was bound to Havana. .... St. Paul's Episcopal church, Delham, lately destroyed by fire, is to be rebuilt of stone, so as to defy the devouring element. .... An unsuccessful attempt was lately made to assassinate that crowned despot, the king of Naples. Regicide is not only deeply criminal, but it is an act which always injures the cause of liberty. Walter Savage Landor has lately degraded himself by applauding this crime. .... The Boston Journal says, that a merchant, in one of our large cities, who stops payment and does not owe from $200,000 to two millions, is considered a mean fellow. .... We don't know who it was, but it was a shrewd man who said, "Gravity is the very essence of imposture; it makes us not only mistake other things, but is apt perpetually almost to mistake itself." .... A mournfully interesting piece of intelligence brought by a recent steamer, was the death of Rev. Theobald Mathew, the great Irish temperance reformer, at Cork. We had the pleasure of meeting this gentleman a few years since in private, and were as much charmed by his manners, as impressed by his apostolic mission. .... There are two papers on our exchange list which we consider indispensable to all who are engaged in the cultivation of the soil—the "New England Farmer," published in this city, and the "Country Gentleman," issued at Albany, New York. .... The legend of a Jew ever wandering and never dying, even from the crucifixion of Jesus to this day, has spread over many European countries. This thrilling legend has furnished the theme for pictures, poems, novels and dramas innumerable. .... Glorious are the uncertainties of the law. It appeared, the other day, that a certain culprit would be surely convicted of stealing mackerel. But it appeared that he was charged with stealing sundry barrels of mackerel; whereas the porpoised fish were in half-barrels, and so he went on his way rejoicing. .... Miss Sedgwick, the authoress, lately reported dead, is still living, with a fair prospect of many years of health and usefulness before her. .... The first snow of a season is always welcome. It seems as grateful a tribute to the bare trees and earth, as rain and dew to the flowers and grass of midsummer. .... Shakespeare, the Rev. Mr. Giles tells us, left off authorship at the age of 48, having written 37 dramas, 2 poems, and upwards of 150 sonnets. Many authors have surpassed him in fertility, but one of his great tragedies alone would have rendered him immortal. His later days were cheered by the sun of prosperity, his income being $10,000 a year. .... A bill has been introduced into the North Carolina legislature to "promote matrimony." The introduction of economy in place of extravagance in our social habits, would render all legislation on the subject entirely unnecessary everywhere. .... James M. Beebe, Esq., one of our largest, most enterprising, and most liberal merchants, lately invited a large company to his hospitable mansion in Ashburton Place, to meet Mr. George Peabody, the great American banker. .... An eminent medical authority states, that scarcely a person in fifty is sensible at the point of death; and some physicians aver that they never attended a death-bed where the patient was sensible. .... The School of Design for Women, in this city, is in a flourishing condition. Women are admirably fitted for the art of designing. They are found in England to make superior wood engravers. .... E. H. Derby, Esq. is preparing a memoir of the Derby family of Salem, including a full sketch of the East India trade in Salem, where it originated. .... The fair weather visitants of our seaside resorts learn little of the sublimity of the ocean. Nahant in a winter storm presents a fine field for persons in search of strong sensations. It is rather cool in us, however, to advise trying it. .... We have in this city a young artist of talent and promise, a relative of the great Sir David Wilkie, the Scottish Hogarth. His studio is at No. 15 Montgomery Place. .... Col. Benton was very much pleased with Lowell, Mass., and with the intelligence and condition of the young ladies employed as operatives in the mills. .... There is quite a rage for theatricals in New York this season. Nine regular theatres are in full blast. A distinguished lady of Gotham, smitten with a love for the footlights, lately went to Buffalo and played a week to the consternation of her friends. She has since returned to the usual routine of fashionable life, satisfied with her single plunge into the mysteries of the drama. .... It is mentioned as a remarkable fact, that all the books in the Arabic language are so corrupt and immoral, that there is not one that does not need expurgation before it is fit to be presented to the public eye. .... We have seen some ladies in the street, lately, who were certainly painted. We hope this fashion is not about to rage as it did in the last century. Lady Mary Wortley Montague used to put on paint as thick as plaster on the wall. .... As an illustration of the effects of the credit system in newspaper publishing, we note that a certain paper of fifty years standing had on its books bad debts to the amount of $300,000. It must be either amusing or profitable to do business in this way. .... We are afraid Mrs. Partington is getting noisy. We lately heard of her lecturing "on the street." .... It is found that the improved drainage in only twenty streets in Manchester, England, diminished the annual mortality of the town twenty per cent. Only think of that! Rheumatism, typhoid, and many other acute and dangerous disorders, may be traced almost directly to humidity. .... Very many of the articles in "Household Words" have been attributed to Dickens, on the presumptive evidence of style; but it seems they were written by a young man named Sala, the son of Madame Sala, a theatrical performer, who possesses the wonderful faculty of imitating the style of thought and expression of any writer, so as to deceive the most critical. .... What a wonderful structure the Suspension Bridge over the Mississippi at St. Louis will be when completed! It will be a mile long, eighty-four feet high, and will cost at least two million dollars. .... Dr. Colton, writing to the Boston Transcript about Chicago, says: "There are no old people here—they can't wait to become old." .... It is an attractive feature of the New York hotels, that they give balls during the winter season, with fine music. A New York hotel is a world of itself. .... Albert Pike, soldier, politician, poet and lawyer, intends to relinquish the legal profession, because he has made a large fortune by gaining a great lawsuit. He is a brilliant man. .... How much truth there is sometimes in a single proverbial expression! The Scotch say: "They are never canoe (that is, amiable or good) that dogs and bairns donna like." Children and dogs certainly discover the true character of a stranger at a glance. .... We have been told that a curious Western genius has discovered a method of manufacturing from one dandy, a monkey, an ape and three baboons, with enough of the material left for a small yellow dog. .... There used to be an association in New Orleans, called the "Baked Bean Rangers and Paudowdy Dragoons," from the favorite New England dishes served up in their club-rooms. .... Somebody says, that it is to rainy days we owe the conception of most good thoughts, sayings and doings. .... When a run for specie was made on a certain Irish bank, the panic-stricken billholders were driven from their purpose by being served with red-hot guineas and sovereigns. The president kept up a roaring fire in a grate, and shelled out the specie piping hot. We commend this to some of our own monetary institutions when driven into a corner. .... Dickens told a friend lately, that his most strongly marked characters, such as Squeers, Quilp, the Cheeryble brothers and Little Nell, were portraits from life. .... The Romans, though we are apt to overlook the fact, had registers of politics and intelligence, which were really not unlike our own newspapers in their contents. Many of the ancient gazettes were quite gossipry. .... We believe it was Edward Everett who illustrated the importance of trifles, by saying:—"The nerve of a tooth not as large as a cambric needle will sometimes drive a strong man to distraction!" A musquito can make an elephant absolutely mad. The coral rock, which sometimes causes a navy to founder, is the work of worms. .... How few people in this world know how to use money. Petrarch said of this necessary evil:—"He who expends it properly is its master; he who lays it up, its keeper; he who loves it, a fool; he who fears it, a slave; and he who adores it, an idolater." .... One of the Ravel troupe, we are informed, has turned so many summersets, that he never feels the cold in winter. .... The tragedy of "Lear" was once brought out at the Tremont Theatre during a "star" engagement at very short notice. The gentleman who played Gloucester managed to say something like the author, until he came to the scene where his eyes are put out, and then he was obliged to ask permission to read the rest of his part.

No language is very weak in its natural course, until it runs too far; and then the poorest and the richest are ineffectual equally. The habit of pleasing by flattery makes a language soft; the fear of offending by truth makes it circuitous and conventional.—Landor.

There is hardly anything that shows the short-sightedness or capriciousness of the imagination more than travelling does. With change of place we change our ideas; nay, our opinions and feelings.—Hazlitt.

Choice Miscellany.

SUBSCRIBING FOR PAPERS.

We wish to express it as a mature conviction of our own mind, that one of the best protections for our children against the temptations of city and village life, is the habitual reading of a well-conducted family newspaper or periodical. If you want a child to take an interest in a paper, let it be his paper, sent to his address. In a reasonable time he will get to look for its coming, and feel the want of it, if it does not arrive at the usual time. Soon it will be a kind of necessity, and rather than be without it, he becomes willing to make sacrifices and self-denials for the sake of saving any stray dime or half-dime which may happen to come into his possession. Peanuts and gingerbread, monkey-shows and fire-crackers, are vetoed, and the increment of a quarter of a dollar to a half, and so on, to the subscription price, is watched with an interest and a pleasure which few would imagine; and lo! the germs of an economy and self-denial are planted before we are aware of it, which will grow to health, and wealth, and position.—Journal of Health.

SLEEP.

The unwisest of all economies is time saved from necessary sleep; for it begets a nervous irritability, which masters the body and destroys the mind. When a man becomes sleepless, the intellect is in danger. A restored lunatic, of superior mental endowments, said: "The first symptom of insanity, in my own case, was a want of sleep; and from the time I began to sleep soundly, my recovery was sure." This is a fact that is worth remembering. Let this be a warning to all who are acquiring an education. Every young person at school should have eight hours for sleep out of every twenty-four; for, as the brain is highly stimulated all the time in the prosecution of study, it will break down, just as any other part of the frame, unless it have time for full recuperation. Better, a thousand times, to give another year to the completion of specified studies, than by curtailing sleep, to endeavor to get through that much sooner, at the risk of madness.—Dr. Hall.

THE PAVEMENT OF LONDON.

The pavement of London is one of the greatest marvels of our times. It covers nearly three thousand acres, two-thirds whereof consist of what may be called mosaic work, done in plain style, and the other third of smooth flagging. Such a series of works far transcends in quantity, as it excels in quality, the Appian Way, which was the wonder of ancient Rome, and which would cut but a poor figure as contrasted with one of our commonest streets. The ancient consul's way was but fifteen feet wide in the main, and was filled in with blocks of all shapes and sizes, jointed together and planned only on the surface; the length of its devious course, from north to south of Italy, was under 300 miles. The paved streets of London number over 5000, and exceed 2000 miles in length.—Building News.

THE BRETON WOMEN.

Among the many strange customs which mark the Breton peasantry, there is none more remarkable than that of wearing the hair. For while the men cultivate long tresses hanging down to their waists, and of which they are very proud, the women do not show a single lock; and the girl who might be tempted by the beauty of her cherevel to allow a ringlet to escape from beneath her closely-fitting cap, would not only lose all chance of obtaining a lover, but would be regarded by the young men as a file perdue—that is, a coquettish girl unworthy of their affections. To this strange custom many London and Paris ladies are indebted for the magnificent hair which adorns their heads, but which was grown in the wilds of Brittany.—London Sun.

New Publications.

OLD MOIL AND LITTLE AGNES: or, The Rich Poor and the Poor Rich. By Mrs. MADELINE LESLIE. Boston: Shepard, Clark & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 190.

An interesting story, written with a high moral aim, and liberally illustrated with engravings. The author is very favorably known already by her "Courtships of Wedded Life."

THE AGE OF FABLE: or, Stories of the Gods and Goddesses. By THOMAS BULFINCH. Boston: Sanborn, Carter & Bazar.

A new edition of this admirable work, which has already become a classic, is before the public. It has received universal commendation from the press, and is certainly the most agreeable compendium of mythological fictions ever published.

THE PLAY-DAY BOOK. By FANNY FERN. Illustrated by F. M. Coffin. New York: Mason Brothers. 1857. pp. 266.

This is a beautifully got up publication, to which the authoress's name will give currency. There is an occasional flash of genius in her writings. For sale by Brown, Taggard & Chase.

THE MIND AND HEART: or, Social and Fireside Reading for Children. By WM. B. FOWLE. Boston: Morris Cotton. 1856. 18mo.

Many of the articles composing this excellent reading book are original, and the remainder have been written and adapted. It embraces a great variety of subjects and styles, and must certainly prove a great favorite.

PARLOR DRAMAS: or, Dramatic Scenes for Home Amusement. By WM. B. FOWLE. Boston: Morris Cotton. 1857. 12mo. pp. 312.

The reputation of the "Hundred Original Dialogues for Schools" will ensure this volume a warm reception, while its intrinsic merits will complete its success. These "Parlor Dramas" contain many effective scenes and characters. There are only one or two pieces which might have been omitted to the advantage of the collection.

NEEDLES JACKWOOD. By PAUL CRYSTON. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 414.

To say this story is well-written and interesting would be faint praise, for all Cryston's books are so. It is a work that will take rank among the best of American novels—a work of true art, which, while it will live, contains enough of the elements of popularity to give it immediate success.

NOW OR NEVER: or, The Adventures of Bobby Bright. By OLIVER OPTIC. 1857. 18mo. Boston: Brown, Bazar & Co.

A very clever story by a very clever writer, who is a prime favorite with young readers.

SECOND ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOSTON BOARD OF TRADE.—This valuable statistical document is published in good style, and hands from the press of Moore & Crosby, Water Street.

THE KNIGHT OF THE GOLDEN MELICE. A Historical Romance. By the author of "The Lost Hunter." New York: Derby & Jackson. 1857. 12mo. pp. 473.

We have been deeply interested in the perusal of this story. The scene is laid in America, the date so far back as to be well suited to the purpose of fiction, while the canvass is crowded with characters, historical and imaginary, drawn with much power and success.

NEW MUSIC.—We have received from Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington Street, the "Wheelbarrow Polka," composed and dedicated to Major Ben: Perley Poore, with a vignette representing the major wheeling his apples; the "Sky-lark Quadrilles," for the piano, by Edgardo Linter, "Dance of the Fairies," for the piano, "The First Kiss," a song, and the "Choralist," No. 4, a fine collection of standard choruses, anthems, etc., for the piano forte or organ.—From Henry Tolman we have received "I cannot help but smile," a humorous song, "Invisible Prince Polka," "La Fille du Regiment," waltz, and "Student's Polka."

Editorial Melange.

The book trade is very lively just now, and the publishers find it difficult to supply the demand for many standard works. — A note for $100,000 given Anson G. Phelps, Jr., by his father, before his death, has been declared invalid by the supreme court of New York, for the want of a valuable consideration. — They talk of a bank in Philadelphia with ten millions capital. That will do to commence with. — On her way across the isthmus from California, Lola Montes saved a boy belonging to Walker's army, who was sick with fever, and placed him on her own mule, while she undertook to walk to Virgin Bay. — It is said that a bottle was dug up at Taylorville, Ky., a few days ago, containing $10,000 in old United States Bank notes, said to be genuine. — A young lady at the Female Seminary, Elmira, found a bottle of chloroform, a few days since, smelled of it from curiosity, came near dying, and was only saved by great exertion. — Paul says, "I use great plainness of speech." Archbishop Usher says, "It requires all our learning to make truth simple." — The lighthouse board at Washington has ordered one of the lighthouses in the neighborhood of New York to be lighted with the Breckenridge coal oil, in order to test its quality. The company has offered to supply it at one dollar per gallon. — It is a remarkable thing how much sooner the weather sets in "bitter cold" to those furnished with handsome furs, than to those not so fortunate. — A sale of Durham cattle on the estate of Benjamin Warfield, Fayette, Kentucky, a few days since, realized for the herd of fourteen, $3265—an average of $233 21 each. It was said to be the finest herd in the State. — Six shoots of the Charter Oak are now growing in the yard of a citizen of Washington, D. C., grown from acorns of the venerable tree, sent to the grower by Judge Williams, of Connecticut. — The Baltimoreans are waking up upon the subject of steam navigation, and of a direct line between that city and Europe. — Forgery is not confined to the cities. At Warsaw, Wyoming county, it has just been discovered that Mr. N. N. Olive, of Pike, has failed, after forging notes to the amount of $60,000. — Mrs. J. Stockwell, wife of John Stockwell, an Englishman, residing at Chappaqua, on the Harlem Railroad, lay or full down—it is not known which—immediately before the Albany mail train on its passage, a few days ago, and was crushed to atoms. — William Smith, a mail guard, has been arrested at Augusta, Ga., charged with robbing the mail. A thousand dollars of supposed stolen money were found in his possession. — They have a haunted house at Syracuse, N. Y., in which a large white dog is continually performing strange antics, and the doors and windows slam without hands all night, no matter how securely fastened. Two or three families have been scared away from the house, and the ghostship is apparently well established. — At present, says the South Side, Va., Democrat, there are one hundred and fifty newspapers published in the State of Virginia, the working expenses of which amount to $400,000 per annum. — A railroad from the shore of Lake Superior to the valley of the Assiniboine, is among the projects about to be laid before the Canadian Parliament this winter; the ultimate view being to extend it to the shores of the Pacific. — Messrs. Tuttle & Bailey, Brooklyn, N. Y., assessed for only $1500, instead of $15,000, as they should have been, communicated to the authorities their wish to pay the whole amount, who decided that they had no power to rectify such errors.

LIGHTING CARS BY GAS.—The Chicago Press says the experiment of illuminating cars by gas has been tried on the Chicago and Galena Railroad with perfect success. Under the floor of each car is placed a gas holder, consisting of two tubes, divided into compartments by India-rubber diaphragms. Connecting with the holder is a dry metre, which pumps the air into the holder, and forces the gas through the pipes which connect the holder, up into the car. The holder is filled with gas by attaching the pipe to a main at any station where there is gas.

SATISFACTION.—Sir James Graham once sentenced a poor fellow to transportation, when he should have doomed him to the gallows. Informed of his mistake, he recalled the criminal, put on his black cap, and prefaced the death-sentence by saying, "I beg your pardon, sir." Sheriff S—, of this ilk, when he dropped a man from the gallows, used to take off his hat and say, "Good-morning, sir," and this not ironically, but in good faith!

BLANCHARD'S TURNING MACHINE.—The Secretary of War has issued an order to General Whitney, superintendent of the Springfield Armory, to set up Mr. Thomas Blanchard's original machine for turning gun-stocks, the first ever used in this country, without changing a screw or a particle, in a room by itself, there to remain as a perpetual memorial of this great American invention.

PREMIER AND PRESIDENT.—The salary of the prime minister of England is equal to that of our President—$25,000. The salaries of other English officials are much larger than ours. The governmental machinery of England is enormously expensive, and yet its territory is insignificant when compared to our own.

THE ASHES OF THE GREAT.—A country manager lately got up the tragedy of Virginia, and introduced the ashes of poor Virginia, not in an urn, but in a large coffee-pot with a long spout! His audience burst into a roar of laughter, and the tragedy became a farce.

SINGULAR.—A man the other day saved his wife from drowning, when they were upset in a boat. The danger destroyed his presence of mind!

Wayside Gatherings.

Laura Keene is raising money at her new theatre. The Manchester Mirror says the weather in that city has been conducted on the "let 'er rip" principle.

The Sacramento Valley Railroad, the pioneer of its kind in California, was, at the last accounts, doing an immense freight business.

With the exception of swimming, skating is perhaps the most delightful and at the same time the most healthful of all outdoor exercises for either sex.

In 1842, 1,460,000 squirrel skins were exported from Russia to China in exchange for tea. Most of these skins came from Siberia, and were the quarry of the exiles' traps.

Mr. Thomas Norsworthy, who lately died at the age of nearly ninety-nine years, in Salem, had been married six times, and had thirty-three children.

Ten out of eleven applicants for admission to the bar in New York have been rejected by the examiners. This severity of examination is something quite new.

It is said that England draws from us annually some $500,000 for steel pens. This is strange, when we remember that one of the earliest lessons taught by all Yankee schoolmasters was how to make our own pens.

Theatres in New Orleans are taxed by the State $200, by the city $315, and for the charity hospital $500—total, $1015 per annum. A petition is about to be presented to the legislature to reduce the amount.

The bachelors of Waterbury gave a supper entertainment to themselves and their lady friends, a few evenings since, at the Seville House. Nearly one hundred unmarried gentlemen and ladies were present.

Mole hills are curiously formed by an outer arch impervious to rain, and an internal platform with drains, and covered ways on which the pair and young reside. The moles live on worms and roots and bury themselves in any soil in a few minutes.

Sir George Gore's hunting party are now on their way to St. Louis. They have made sad havoc amongst the game of the plains, having killed over two thousand buffalo, deer and elk, and one hundred and five grizzly bears.

It is said that 100 large ships were built in Maine the last season, whose average measurement was about 1000 tons. Underwriters object to such large vessels, as they are not considered so strong nor so well fitted to contend with the elements as smaller ones.

A resident of Andover, Mass., has invented and patented a table, by the use of which mariners can ascertain their latitude and longitude without going through with the long process hitherto required. This invention, if practicable, will be invaluable to navigators.

A young man in Georgetown, D. C., who last week took four grains of strychnine for the purpose of committing suicide, was saved by the inhalation of an ounce and a half of chloroform. Either of the doses would have killed him, separately—between them both he lived.

A man and his wife are now living in Pawtucket (says the Pawtucket Gazette), who have been the parents of twenty children, nineteen of whom were born in that town, and seventeen of whom are now living. The father is forty-five years of age, and the mother forty.

A new kind of candle has been made at St. Louis, from "paraffine," a tasteless, inodorous, fatty substance, distilled from Breckenridge coal. It is also obtained from the tar of beech-wood. It is said to be harder than spermaceti, gives a bright, clear light, and can be manufactured cheaper than tallow.

The grandfather of William H. Prescott, the historian, commanded the American forces at Bunker Hill, while the grandfather of his wife commanded a British ship-of-war, which bombarded the American works in the same action. The historian has the swords of each at his residence in Boston.

A very pretty girl has been doing a large business at Baltimore, by claiming one person after another for her husband, and extorting $10, $20 and $50 from each to keep the matter silent. When last seen she was going on to Philadelphia, for proof that she was wife to the oldest and richest citizen of Baltimore.

Bellona Arsenal, with 27-1/2 acres of land in Chesterfield county, on James river, fourteen miles above Richmond, Va., was sold recently for $2650. The arsenal was established in 1816, but of late years it has been abandoned on account of the unhealthiness of the location. The various buildings cost the government $175,000.

An important improvement in insuring tension in the strings of the pianoforte, has recently been made in England. The invention consists in the employment of curved or arched bars for the support of the sounding-board and central bridge, whereby the bridge is maintained at such a height as to insure a curve in the strings when at their greatest tension.

A plan for removing scale from the interior of steam boilers by heated air, or highly heated steam, has been patented in London. When the boiler is empty and cold, highly heated air or steam is introduced by a pipe, when, after a suitable time, the scale cracks off and leaves the plates clean. The debris is then blown out with water and steam through the blow-off cock.

A printing-press—the principle of which consists in the employment of a rotating and reciprocating printing cylinder, to which is added a peculiar inking machine and fly which catches the sheets as they issue from the press—has recently been invented. The machine is represented to be simple in its construction. It can be afforded at a low price, and is not liable to get out of repair.

The congregation of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, in Louisville, were considerably startled a few evenings ago, by the Rev. Mr. Newman, the pastor of the church, descending from the pulpit, after closing his discourse, and selecting a young lady, who had consented to become his help-mate, to whom he was immediately joined in the holy bonds of wedlock.

About one thousand dollars, in old Spanish and American gold coin and French silver, was found by a servant girl in the smoke-house of Peter Texter, South Mountain, Bucks Co., Pa. The house has been used every day for many years, without any suspicion of the treasure. It is supposed to have been hidden away by some of Mr. Texter's ancestors, who died without revealing its existence.

From $10,000 to $15,000 worth of furs are annually produced in Chautauque county, N. Y. The mink, which not long since was rated at less value than the muskrat, has now, through the effect of fashion, become a very valuable fur, ranking next to the sable, which is mostly obtained from foreign countries. The mink is still plentifully found in Chautauque, while the martin, some varieties of which are very valuable, is nearly, or quite, extinct in the country.

Foreign Items.

Richard Cobden has published another letter on maritime law. The Parisian doctors have passed a vote of thanks to the Emperor Alexander, of Russia, for his ukase against quacks.

The prices of provisions in Poland are so high that the Emperor Alexander has directed the salaries of the public functionaries to be increased one-third.

A lady residing at Edinburg, Miss Mary Barclay, has agreed to bear the whole cost attending the erection of mission premises at Nagpore, India, for the Free Church of Scotland.

Sir William Don, Bart., the eccentric, or rather, as a Scotch contemporary designates him, the gigantic comedian, is performing with great success at the Theatre Royal, Edinburg.

A short time since there was seen, in the large coining-room at the Paris Mint, ingots of gold and silver to the value of one hundred millions of francs, piled up like firewood in a yard.

At Rhodes, lightning struck a building where an immense store of gunpowder was placed in the vaults belonging to the Ancient Knights, and the whole Turkish quarter was destroyed so completely that only three children were saved.

An interesting discovery has been made in a garden near the Piazza del Popolo, Rome. The owner, in digging a well, struck against a solid mass of stone, which, on investigation, turned out to be a colossal bust of Minerva, with the inscription, "Populus Romanus Augusto Imperatori" carved on it.

Staffordshire, in England, is the great seat of the porcelain and pottery manufactures. No less than sixty thousand persons are employed in the works, and the annual value of the porcelain manufactured amounts to the large sum of ten millions of dollars. Three-fourths of the whole amount manufactured is exported.

Sands of Gold.

Too much sensibility creates unhappiness; too much insensibility creates crime. —Tullyrand.

If there is any person to whom you feel dislike, that is the person of whom you ought never to speak. —Cecil.

As charity requires forgetfulness of evil deeds, so patience requires forgetfulness of evil accidents. —Bishop Hall.

To commit a falsehood is like the cut of a sabre; for though the wound may heal, the scar of it will remain. —Sadi.

Things are sullen and will be as they are, whatever we think them or wish them to be. —Cudworth.

There is small chance of truth at the goal, where there is not childlike humility at the starting-post. —Colridge.

Modesty is the appendage of sobriety, and is to chastity, to temperance, and to humility, as the fringes are to a garment. —Jeremy Taylor.

Many judge rashly, only for the pleasure they take to discourse, and make conjectures of other men's manners and humors by way of exercising their wits. —De Sales.

Every fancy that we would substitute for a reality, is, if we saw bright, and saw the whole, not only false, but every way less beautiful and excellent than that which we sacrifice to it. —Sterling.

Death levels the whole human race; for it is only when he has stripped men of everything external that their deformities can be clearly discovered, or their worth correctly ascertained. —Laudor.

There is no elevation of mind in a contempt of little things; it is, on the contrary, from too narrow views, that we consider those things of little importance, which have in fact such extensive consequences. —Fenelon.

Joker's Budget.

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.—Helping a handsome young lady out of a mud-hole.

Why is a baulky horse like an organ? Because his leading features are his "stops."

To make a workman drop his tools quick, nothing has been discovered equal to twelve strokes of the clock.

The art of keeping still and saying nothing is the true secret of the success of scores of medical blockheads.

A son of the Emerald Isle being asked what brought him to London, said that he came to see "the Invisible Girl."

If the speculator misses his aim, everybody cries out, "He's a fool!" and sometimes, "He's a rogue." If he succeeds, they beseege his door and demand his daughter in marriage.

"Henry, my love, I wish you would drop that book and talk with me, I feel so dull." "A long silence, and no reply." "O, Henry, my foot's asleep." "Is it? Well, don't talk, dear, you might wake it."

A jailor had received strict orders not to keep any prisoners in solitary confinement. Once, when he had but two in charge, one escaped, and he was obliged, in consequence, to kick the other out of doors to comply with the regulations.

"I see that you are out under arms to-day, captain," exclaimed Jeemes, yesterday, to that jolly old tile, Captain Buzzleton, who was attending to the out-door affairs about his premises, in an old coat somewhat torn in the armpits. —Post.

"If I were worth a million of dollars," said one friend to another, one day, "I'd throw that inkstand at your head." "If you were worth a million," was the reply, "you might, with my consent, throw inkstands at my head all day."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it especially a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of five columns size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled set of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $1 per annum. Published every Saturday, by M. M. BALLOU, No. 12 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

COL. SAMUEL COLT.

SKETCHES OF EMINENT PERSONS.

COL. COLT.—The first portrait on this page is a correct likeness of our distinguished countryman, Col. Colt. Although there is scarcely a person in the United States unfamiliar with his name and his inventions in fire-arms, still we have presumed that a portrait of him would not be unacceptable. Although his fame rests on the manufacture of the most destructive of weapons of war, still it is none the less honorable, for the more deadly the arms used in warfare, the briefer will be the strife and the more infrequent will be the collision of nations. Col. Colt, the inventor, is in the prime of life, and has lately been visiting Europe with his newly-wedded lady, and was received everywhere with the greatest distinction. Every one knows how extensively his famous revolvers were used during the Crimean war. He had and has a large manufactory in England, employing a vast body of workmen. His establishment at Hartford, Ct., is on a most extensive scale. Yet it is only about eight years ago that Mr. Colt commenced the manufacture of pistols with a small capital, not exceeding $5000, and a few men, hazarding the little he possessed in what might have been naturally regarded as a doubtful experiment. Now, the estimated value of buildings and machinery forming his establishment is about $1,000,000; nearly 500 men are employed; the pay-roll ranges from $15,000 to $20,000 per month; and from 150 to 200 pistols, widely celebrated for their superior qualities, are completed every day. The buildings are in the form of an H, wholly of Portland stone, the main structure being 500 feet in length by 60 in breadth, and four stories high. Parallel to this is another, 500 feet by 40, and one story high, and the building which connects them is 300 feet by 60. These compose the offices, machine-shop, engine-rooms, blacksmith, iron and brass foundries, store-rooms, shooting gallery, etc. The whole are enclosed by a high wall, with houses for watchmen at either end of the enclosure thus made. There are about 50 dwellings, mostly occupied by workmen. The whole are erected on a tract of land embracing 150 acres, formerly inundated by the Connecticut River, but now enclosed by two miles of strong dyke. The motive power is furnished by an enormous engine, equal to 350 horses. The boilers are two in number, each 30 feet long. The driving-wheel is remarkable for its size, being 30 feet in diameter, and of such accurate dimensions that there is no perceptible variation from a perfect circle in its entire circumference. No gearing is used in running the machinery, belts alone being employed, so that the movement of all is noiseless. For this reason a strange sensation is experienced on entering the immense apartment used for the armory, which presents an unbroken area of 500 feet in length by 60 in breadth, completely filled by machinery, and not less than 200 men engaged in operating it, all in rapid motion; yet comparative quiet prevails. The eye of the spectator can scarcely penetrate the labyrinth of belts and bars and moving forms, or distinctly define an object in the hazy distance. All the machinery in each story is driven by a single continuous drum, extending from one extremity to the other. The larger portion of the machinery is the invention of E. K. Root, the superintendent. The machine-shop is another very extensive apartment, 250 by 60 feet, and containing something like fifty workmen.

HORACE VERNET.—The next portrait on this page, is a correct likeness of the celebrated Horace Vernet, one of the most famous of the modern French school of painters. He is depicted in his working costume. His long face, lengthened by his pointed beard and prominent features, together with the gravity of his expression, reminds us of the "Knight of the Rueful Countenance." But there is nothing Quixotic in the character of Horace. He belongs to a family of painters; his father, his grandfather and his great-grandfather having all been distinguished artists. Horace was born at Paris, in the galleries of the Louvre (his birthplace for an artist), June 30, 1789, and is now old in years, though still youthful in spirit and energy. He attained early distinction, and, disgusted with the coldness of the classical school of David, determined to found one of his own. His taste led him to depict military scenes, and, taking nature for his guide, he depicted the French soldier as he is, not idealizing and denationalizing him as some of predecessors had done. His pictures, the "Dog of the Regiment," "Trumpeter's Horse," "Death of Poniatowski," and similar compositions, gave him universal popularity. In 1819, he began to paint large battle-pieces, and has since painted them by the acre. But though he works on an immense scale and with the utmost rapidity, still all his figures and groupings are thoroughly artistic. Before him, artists have only represented episodes in warfare, but Vernet brings whole battle-fields before us, as in his famous "Battle of Isly," and "Capture of Rome." His Algerian battle-pieces were admirable, and he made his studies for them among the soldiers and in the scenes depicted. His only daughter was married to Paul Delaroche, recently deceased, so that the celebrated line of painters who have borne his family name, is destined to end with him.

ISABELLA II., QUEEN OF SPAIN.—The lady whose portrait we present below, is still young, though she has passed through many vicissitudes of fortune. She is the daughter of Ferdinand III. and Maria, and was born October 30, 1830. The Salic law which excludes females from the throne, was abolished by Ferdinand III., at the intercession of Christina, who expected the regency, and the crown settled upon the feeble Baby Isabella. Three years afterwards, he died, and it was immediately proclaimed to Spain that a baby of three years was their sovereign. The Spaniards, perfectly well aware that not review the political agitations of the realm from that day to this. The Cortes, disgusted with Christina, put an end to the regency, and a child-queen took her place among the sovereigns of Europe. However, the mother, by her influence with her daughter, still managed to exert an unhappy power in the government. When Isabella was only sixteen she was married to her cousin, Don Francisco D'Assis, the eldest son of her maternal uncle, Don Francisco da Paula. The marriage was an unhappy one, the prince being a miserable creature in all respects. Her domestic life was a succession of quarrels, jealousies, estrangements, recriminations and disgraces. Her two infant children perished in the cradle. She was at times cast down into an abyss of perfect misery, at times attracted to every kind of frivolity by her self-seeking mother and ministers. It has always been one of her chief characteristics to be fond of sweetmeats. She would take a packet of sugar-plums to a cabinet council, and distribute them to the councillors of state. She would run down stairs after Espartero and horrify the master of ceremonies by presenting her favorite with a box of candied almonds. She would consult with a famous confectioner upon new species of bonbons, and she even furnished a room with sweetmeats. Tables, chairs, ornaments—all were of frosted or painted sugar. So unpopular did the queen render herself by blindly following the baneful political counsels, and the profligate example of her mother, that she was at one time actually hissed out of her opera box by her indignant subjects. Isabella, in spite of her many radical defects, has some good traits. She is not without talent, is pleasant and charitable, and is the mistress of many accomplishments. If she were not a queen, she would be a blue-stocking and a wit. Although surrounded by the

HORACE VERNET.

ISABELLA, QUEEN OF SPAIN.

this succession had been managed by the crafty and insatiable Christina, were not slow in expressing their discontent. A rebellion broke out in favor of Don Carlos, the younger brother of the late king, whose claims had been set aside by the abrogation of the Salic law. The war waged violently for a long period, and the country was desolated. In England it was thought that Isabella represented liberality and constitutionalism, and it was mainly owing to the diplomatic interference of Lord Palmerston that her pretensions triumphed, while she, unconscious of the conflict that burned around her name, caroled in her nursery-room, and played with the model of the Escorial in sugar. A legion was enlisted in England, with the permission of the government, and these volunteers, under the command of General Sir De Laey Evans, displayed great valor under the royal banners and contributed largely to the overthrow of Don Carlos. A decree of perpetual banishment was pronounced by the Cortes against Don Carlos, and Isabella II. was declared legitimate sovereign of Spain, under the regency of her mother Christina; the latter, however, was from the first unpopular. In this brief sketch we cannetique of the most formal court in the world—a court in which a nobleman was once exiled because he had dared to touch the queen's dress to save her life—she is bold in behaviour—not inelegantly so—and in courage, is a perfect lioness. "If the queen ever should lose her crown," writes a well known writer, "she will certainly have defended it sword in hand, for she fences like Grisier—that famous master of fence—and it is her favorite amusement." The manner in which she employs her time is usually this. She scarcely ever rises early, and, when risen, never occupies herself in the morning except in gossip, and conferences, for the sake of form, with the ministers for the time being, and, at three o'clock, begins to dress, though that is one of the least important of her occupations. Then, ordering a very beautiful and light little equipage, the gift of Queen Victoria, she goes out, generally alone. Sometimes, however, since her recent reconciliation with her husband, she is accompanied by him, who lives in constant fear of her, and always imagines himself protected by a miracle when he re-enters the palace in safety. The unhappy creature is afraid of being assassinated at the instigation of his own wife. But the queen, perhaps unconscious of the contemptible terrors that haunt her husband's fancy, takes the reins and the whip, and dashes along at the utmost speed until five o'clock, when, returning to the palace, she dines, eats very little and very fast, and, as soon as the meal is finished, adjourns to a sort of fencing saloon. There she practises with her sword, and next, being of a restless and indefatigable disposition, mounts her horse, and rides into the suburbs of Madrid. These healthful exercises ended, Queen Isabella assumes a new character, and becomes the pretty leader of the national fashions. Her palace is filled with company; she sings, dances, and carouses, until one o'clock, when the great council meets, and Isabella II. takes her seat at the head of her ministers. She imagines herself in this position, to be governing Spain, whereas it is Espartero, or O'Donnell, who really rules the cabinet. The character and conduct of Queen Victoria of England contrasts strongly and favorably with that of her contemporary sovereign of Spain. The former is universally beloved and respected, the latter neither receives nor is entitled to respect, as a woman or a queen.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. } VOL. XII., No. 6.—WHOLE No. 282.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

THE DOGS OF ST. BERNARD.

The picture on this page depicts a scene in the celebrated pass of the Great St. Bernard, in the Alps, and delineates two of the noble dogs belonging to the monks of St. Bernard, rescuing an exhausted traveller who has sunk in the snow. One of the dogs is licking his hand. He has attached to his body a warm cloak, and around his neck a little keg of wine. His companion is harking to attract attention to the spot. High up among the rocks is seen the Hospice. A monastery existed on the Great St. Bernard as early as the eighth century, but the present hospice was founded

In 962, by Bernard, a member of a noble family in Savoy, who devoted himself to a religious life, and became archdeacon of Aosta. He was canonized for his piety and virtues. The hospice was formerly richly endowed, but now possesses a very limited revenue. The weather at the height of the hospice is cold all the year round. "In the summer of 1816," says Mr. Williams, "not a week passed without the falling of snow, and the ice of the lake never melted. Even in the height of summer, it always freezes early in the morning. The hospice is rarely four months free of snow; the average depth around it is seven or eight feet; at times there are drifts arising to the height of forty feet. Not a bush is to be found near the edifice, and the wood for its fires is obtained from the forest of Ferret, a distance of four leagues. Below, are the stables, store-rooms, and other offices, and the traveller enters the corridor by a flight of steps. The dogs, of which so much has been said, will not fail to be observed loitering at the door, and frequently passing up and down the corridors of the hospice. They came originally from Spain. One of them, named Barry, saved a great number of lives. His remains are preserved in the museum at Berne, and are often regarded with great interest. Another, called Jupiter, was also very successful. In the year 1827, it appears he knew some persons had passed the hospice, and he set out alone immediately to follow them. After some time, his absence was remarked, and one of the inmates, by pursuing his track, found him posted over a drift of snow, where a poor woman and her child were about to perish, both of whom he was thus the instrument of rescuing from death. The traveller will meet with a cordial greeting from the monks, none of whom are aged men. It is said they devote themselves to service at the hospice at eighteen years of age, and that its term is fifteen years. Not a few, however, find the rigors of so great an elevation too severe for their frames, and are compelled to limit it to a proportionately short period. They are aided by several attendants." The saloon generally presents a varied assemblage of visitants. The monks are attired in a long, black tunic, with close-fitting sleeves, and each one wears a pointed cap, surmounted by a tuft, with the simple badge of their order—that of St. Augustine. The fare they provide is plain but abundant. They are unostentatious in their hospitality, and endeavor to make all their guests feel at home. They are required to board and lodge all travellers, and to furnish them with guides in traversing the mountains. In winter, they are obliged by their rules to send every day, no matter how severe the weather, two able men, called Maroniers, trained to mountain life, one towards the Italian side and one towards the Vallois. These persons traverse the route the entire day, keeping the path open, and attended by their faithful dogs. If the maronier meet with any person bewildered or exhausted, or if his sagacious companion indicates by his motions that any person is under the snow, he immediately affords help, or hastens to the hospice to obtain assistance. Cold water, with ice immersed in it, is prepared there as the most efficacious remedy, and the body is placed in it; if this fails in restoring animation, all hope is at an end. The chambers allotted to the guests by the hospitable monks contain each two or more beds, and are always scrupulously clean and neat. The view of the adjoining lonely lake and the hospice, by moonlight, is spoken of by travellers as a deeply impressive scene. Religious services, to which guests are invited to attend, are celebrated at five o'clock in the morning, at which time the convent bell peals through the mountain solitude. About seven o'clock, breakfast is prepared—a simple meal of dry toast, honey and coffee. A parlor, adjoining the dining-hall, contains numerous paintings and engravings, as well as natural curiosities. Many of these have been presented by travellers, and a piano, which is found there, is the gift of a lady. In the chapel of the monastery, which is quite spacious, is a box in which travellers place the sum which they consider a just acknowledgment of the hospitalities they receive, as no charge is made. Whatever surplus remains over the necessary expenses of the establishment, is devoted to the relief of indigent travellers. Bonaparte, it will be remembered, crossed the Great St. Bernard with the main body of his army, in 1800,—a gigantic task, accomplished with remarkable success. The most difficult part was the transport of the artillery and ammunition, and this was personally superintended by the First Consul. The cannon were dismounted and placed in the trunks of trees, hollowed to receive them, that half a battalion might drag them up the steep and perilous ascents, while the other half carried their own and their comrades' arms and accoutrements for five days. The powder and shot, packed into boxes of fir-wood, formed the lading of all the mules that could be collected from a wide range of the Alpine country. Napoleon himself reached the hospice of St. Bernard on the 20th of May, and was received by the monks. As they had furnished every soldier who passed with a luncheon of bread and cheese, and a glass of wine, they received the warm acknowledgments of the great commander. At the entrance of the church of the hospice of St. Bernard, there is a tomb to the memory of Napoleon's favorite, General Desaix, who was killed on the field of Marengo. In the cemetery of the hospice, the bodies are all more or less in a good state of preservation, from their being hardened by the excessive cold to which they have been exposed. The hospice of St. Bernard is one of the most interesting places which the traveller in Europe can visit. The lives of the monks are lives of active benevolence. Excluded from all the pleasures of the world, and yet bearing of its joys and sorrows, its prizes for the ambitious, its excitements and its interests, from the lips of travellers, they pursue the stern path of duty, influenced only by a high sense of responsibility.

THE DOGS OF ST BERNARD

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRIBE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XVII.—[CONTINUED.]

Santarem was led into an elegant apartment, better lighted and more agreeable than the one he left, and this time he awaited, not in fear and trembling, but with impatience for his definite liberty.

The Count de Lerma, during this time, went to Alitea, and we have seen the result of his visit.

The ten days had expired, and the same hour brought the carriage of the count to the hotel of the Countess Altamira. The three ladies were present, as on his former visit.

"I come, senora," graciously said the count, "to hear your answer."

"I am sorry to have made your excellency wait so long."

"Little consequence, senora, if I receive good news."

"In the sense you speak, senor, it is not, for after having consulted well with myself, it is impossible—"

"To accept?" cried the countess.

"Yes, madame," coldly replied Alitea.

It was said that the countess could not explain the conduct of the young girl; but she saw in that moment the count disconcerted in his projects; it was a triumph for her, and she accepted it as such. The count looked at Alitea with a calm, smiling air.

"I do not doubt," said he, slowly, "that during these ten days, the senora has thought of the reasons for and against this marriage; but I believe she has forgotten some which would not permit her to hesitate."

"I do not think so," said Alitea.

"And for myself, I am sure, and if Senora Alitea will permit me, not to advise her, but merely to recall them to her mind, I am persuaded she will instantly change her mind."

"Senora Alitea is very firm, and in spite of all your talents, senor count, I fear your negotiations will be useless," said the countess, with an air of raillery.

"I will not partake of your fears, senora countess," replied the minister, gravely, "and if Senora Alitea would honor me with a private conversation—"

"How, senor," said she, with an air of pique,—"a tete-a-tete?"

"My age does not render that dangerous. It will last but a few minutes. I am persuaded beforehand of the consent of the senora."

Alitea looked at him with an air of doubt, and making a sign for the countess and Carmina to leave her, she said to the minister: "I await your orders, senor."

As he had promised, he remained hardly a quarter of an hour with the young girl, and when he left, the most scrutinizing eye could not detect in his face either the shame of a defeat or the joy of a triumph. He disappeared, after having saluted respectfully the two ladies. The latter hastened to enter the saloon.

Alitea, pale and sad, was so plunged in a frightful stupor that she did not hear them enter, and did not raise her head until Carmina spoke to her:

"Alitea, my sister, what is the matter?"

"Leave me—leave me, I pray thee!"

"Tell me what he has said to you."

"I cannot, my sister,—I cannot."

And seeking to banish the agitating thoughts which occupied her, she rose, pressed one hand across her forehead, pressed the other on her heart, and as if she gained there strength and courage, she said, in a firm voice:

"Let us go; it is necessary—it is my duty. I will marry the Duke de Santarem."

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE WORK OF THE REDEMPTION.

We left Juan following in the suite of the archbishop, a close prisoner. Very sad were his reflections, for he would not renounce his faith; he had promised Alitea that, and he saw before him only the gloomy dungeons of the Inquisition, perhaps even the funeral pile. Sometimes hope filled his breast; Pedralvi was free and would inform his friends, and they might aid him. He did not wholly despond, neither did he hope, but endeavored to keep calm and indifferent. He had already calculated by the direction taken by the carriage that the archbishop was not going to Toledo. He was probably returning to Valencia.

The day began to break, and looking from the carriage, Juan perceived that they had quitted the main road, and had entered a side path or road. The carriage went a few steps, and then stopped. They were nearly at the extremity of the mountains of Toledo, that chain of mountains which commences at the frontiers of Portugal, and traverses Estramadura and a part of New Castile.

The archbishop descended, and supported upon the arm of his grand vicar, climbed a little foot-path, which was cut out among the rocks, with a rapid step. Juan was made to alight, and three men escorted him, following the footsteps of the bishop. All three were armed with escopettes, ready to fire upon the prisoner, should he attempt to escape, and that idea could not enter his head, for on either side were seen only steep precipices. They walked on in this way for nearly an hour.

At last they perceived a little church crowning the mountain. It had been formerly a fortified chateau, built by the Moors. Its walls had fallen to decay, but a large part of it had been renovated, showing still many high towers, very solid, and ornamented with bars of iron. This retreat was called Aigador, from the name of a little river which rose in these mountains. This church was without a parish, and even without a village, for the few wooden houses scattered over the rocks did not deserve that name. The curate hastened to open the gates and welcome the archbishop.

When the bishop was comfortably seated before the fire that blazed in the chimney, he questioned Romero, the curé, as to the progress of the Work of Redemption. The accounts given were good; eight converts, two more than the last months. The bishop gave the curé sixty pistoles to aid in the work. Five Jews the curé had who remained obstinate. For thirty days they had been exhorted in vain; but that was only the first month; in the second he would be more successful.

"I have in attendance," said the prelate, with satisfaction, "a new work for the Redemption, which claims thy cares; I bring another heretic—a Moor."

"So much the better. That will be a change for me."

"It is necessary to have all over for the approaching Easter day."

"God aiding, it shall be, senor."

"Well. I must now rejoin my men and carriage, which I left at the foot of the mountain. I return to Valencia, but in two months I shall come here again. I shall send a good guard from the Inquisition to conduct all safely to Valencia."

To explain the foregoing conversation, it is necessary to say that the archbishop of Valencia, Ribeira, enjoyed throughout all Spain a reputation of great piety. When he passed through the streets of Valencia, people knelt to ask his blessing, and the papal bulls were less respected than the least mandate from the sacred archbishop. The great reputation for holiness was gained by the large number of converts he had made. On all Easter days, the cathedral of Valencia offered a spectacle which people from all the provinces came to see.

A long file of new converts—Jews, Arabs, Protestants, Calvinists, and heretics of all colors and faiths,—formed, in white dresses, carrying candles, an immense procession which traversed the city, and took the sacrament from the hands of the prelate. Each cried "Hosanna!" and each year the ceremony ended with a Te Deum, which celebrated the pious victories of the prelate.

But, in want of other qualities, pride glided into the heart of the sacred archbishop, and finding it vacant, occupied it wholly. The archbishop then took leave of the curé, and the latter, pointing his finger to Juan, made a sign to Acalpuco to take him away.

Acalpuco was an Indian of mixed race, having a Mexican father and Spanish mother. His athletic form and great muscular power made him very valuable in the important place he occupied in the Work of the Redemption.

Juan, conducted by his guardians, passed through the first opening; it was a postern gate closed by a grating; above were written these words:

"Work of the Redemption, founded by Ribeira, archbishop of Valencia, A. D. 1602."

He found himself in a court, surrounded by six towers, which were built of granite. Joining the gates was a double chain of iron, three bars at all the windows and openings, and seemed rather like dungeons for criminals than retreats wherein men were to be converted and led to paradise. Each tower two stories, each story a prisoner. Acalpuco opened the third tower to the right, then vacant, and said to Juan:

"Brother, see your cell; it will open for you when your eyes will open to the light."

And he closed the gate with a loud, harsh noise, leaving poor Sevilla to his reflections. A fatality pursued him. After having been for a long time so poor, unfortunate and abandoned by all, fortune smiled on him; he had found a paternal roof, a family opened their arms to him, a brilliant future was offered him. His personal talents and the riches of d'Alberique would take him into the first ranks; then nothing remained to prevent his marriage with Alitea. Alitea had told him: "Patience and courage, and all is gained."

But patience fled and his courage nearly left him when he saw all his dreams destroyed, all his plans overturned by a fatal chance—his meeting with Captain Josef Baptista. The first thought which presented itself to his mind was this: How leave his prison? By force? Impossible. By ruse or address? He saw no way. One hope he had, but it was almost gone. After having taken Juan and met with the archbishop, Captain Josef Baptista, in ordering Juan to dismount from his horse, had laid the purse given Juan by Yezid upon the saddle, and Juan had seized it, thinking that in his prison it might be useful. When left to himself, he opened the purse, but it contained not enough money to open his prison doors. Sixty to a hundred reals—about twelve dollars—was not enough to seduce his goalers, or buy the conscience of the curé. He was in the midst of these reflections, when he heard a small door, leading to the interior of the tower, open, and saw the head of Romero appear. The curé said to him, in a parental tone of voice:

"My son, I am charged by Heaven which blesses me, and by the Acalpuco who pays me, to convert you to the true faith. Are you disposed to be an apostle?"

"No, my father, not while I remain in these walls. Set me at liberty, and we shall see."

"That is not the question. Are you disposed to open your eyes to the light and your ears to the truth?"

"When the gates of this prison are opened."

Again the curé exhorted him to open his eyes upon the true path to heaven; but Juan remained deaf to his words, telling him to leave him, he needed not his cares. And the curé retired.

The next day he returned; the same proposition, the same response. The curé Romero, without being disconcerted, without fatigue, without showing the least impatience, spoke for half an hour by his watch, not a minute more or less. When he had finished, he said to his penitent: "After spiritual nourishment, bodily nourishment."

He sounded a bell, and a good repast was set before Juan.

For many days, everything passed exactly the same. The captive remained alone from morning until evening, seeing only the cure, who unclosed the little door at half-past eleven, spoke without stopping till twelve, when he re-closed the gate and went to dinner. Juan was at a loss how to occupy his days, so long and solitary. The interior of his prison offered him no great distractions. He had already many times made an inventory of his furniture: a bed, a table, a wooden couch and a kind of praying desk, of a singular form. This praying desk was of iron, and seemed to hide some resort which he sought vainly to discover. He gave it up. Raising his eyes, he perceived, fifteen or eighteen feet above his head, a little dormer-window, closed by iron bars. This window was on the opposite side of the room to the door of entrance, and of course did not open upon the court. The poor prisoner was seized with a desire to look out. To reach fifteen or twenty feet was not an easy thing. Juan placed the table upon the bed, upon the table the couch, and upon the couch the praying desk, and at the risk of breaking his neck, he mounted the pile of furniture bravely. He could now look from the window. In the distance he perceived the mountains; but his tower was built upon a kind of platform, opposite to the church, and in the space between, the grass grew only in little spots, and was much trampled by feet, showing that it was the most frequented place, perhaps even the great place of that miserable village. When he raised his head to the window, a bird, perched upon one of the bars, flew away, affrighted. Gazing round, Juan saw that he had his nest beside the window, and he knew he would return. Hereafter he would feed him. Juan was no longer alone; he had company—a friend. Yet many days must pass in their dreary monotony before he could get used to this life.

Each morning the curé appeared at the same hour, and made the same exhortation—an exhortation which Juan was obliged to listen to and knew by heart. At last, the thirtieth day after having for thirty times repeated his sermon, the curé said to him:

"Brother, are you converted now?"

"No, my father."

"Do you wish to receive the baptism?"

"No, my father."

"You are not, then, more enlightened?"

"Not any more than before."

The curé smiled good-naturedly, declaring it was not the fault of the laborer, but of the soil, and he would leave him till the next day, when further means should be taken for his conversion.

The following day, at the usual hour for the appearance of Father Romero, the little door remained closed, but the principal door opened, and a monk, dressed in brown, entered. It was the ferocious Acalpuco, armed with a sort of whip composed of long leather thongs, furnished at the end with little pieces of iron. The cure had used gentle means, and as he had failed, severer means must be tried. If he would pronounce only one word, swear that he was converted, he would be spared the lash.

"You will have my death to reproach yourself with; for, although you kill me, you will hear nothing from me."

"That we shall see," said the monk; and he stepped towards Juan, to seize him and strip him of his clothes. He was so strong and vigorous, and his adversary appeared so weak, that there was little doubt which would triumph.

Juan felt a cold sweat cover his forehead. That moment recalled all the sufferings of his younger years—the horrible treatment of Captain Josef Baptista and his lieutenant, Camilo. To-day, as then, he could expect aid from no one; but to-day he had feelings of honor and dignity.

CHAPTER XIX.

JUAN AND THE MONK.

JUAN had fully decided to die rather than to submit to the indignity of the lash, and he had chosen a place on the wall against which he would throw himself and break his head, when an idea came to him, a last means of safety, and he risked nothing by employing it. He drew from his pocket a small pistol which Yezid had given him, and which luckily had not been taken away, but was unfortunately unloaded.

"If you take one step towards me," said he, to the monk, "I stretch you at my feet!"

The monk stopped and turned pale. Juan, looking at him proudly and firmly, and still pointing the pistol at him, made him tremble in every joint. He understood that in spite of his herculean strength, the brother redeemer was a coward, who, though caring little for the flesh of others, cared much for his own. Juan called to him in a menacing tone: "Give up your arms, or I fire!"

The monk threw at his feet the discipline with iron points, with which he was armed. From that moment, Juan was master and Acalpuco slave. But he had not frightened him enough; it was probable that, in leaving the dungeon, the monk would give the alarm, and a force would be collected, and himself overpowered. The prisoner lowered his pistol. The brother redeemer breathed more freely; color returned to his pale cheeks.

"You have a bad trade, my brother."

"It is necessary to live."

"You are paid very well, then?"

"Very little. All the benefices are for the curé Romero; all the trouble for us."

"And for your prisoners."

"I did not say that," eagerly cried the monk. "But they can leave here when they wish; they have only one word to pronounce, and they are sent to Valencia, to the palace of the archbishop. There they are well treated, well fed until Easter time, when they have nothing to do but take the sacrament; while we, obliged to remain in this place, from which we cannot go without incurring the anger of the archbishop, and of course that of the Inquisition; we have only a moderate salary."

"How much?"

"A real per day, and food like that of hermits and anchorites—bread and onions."

"Truly," said Juan, "you ought to complain."

"More than you, my brother. You have at least good wine, and we drink only water. Sometimes on Sunday, when the prisoners are docile and the work given not too hard, we can descend to the hotel or inn at the foot of the mountain to refresh ourselves, after the fatigues of the week; and even then we must be economical."

